at Kilkenny of the larceny of a certain £5 (Bank of Ireland) note, which he had passed to a respectable merchant, one Mr. Hackett, of that city in the course of business, who, through his assistance, procured change therefor in single £1 notes; likewise in the course of business, from another respectable merchant, Mr. Kerwick. The constabulary called upon the latter, who submitted his cash-box to them, out of which the prosecutrix selected and identified the stolen note; and subsequently, after the conviction, the going Judge of Assize made an order to have the £5 note given to the prosecutrix; and whether, in view of the facility so promptly afforded in the administration of justice in this case, and the injurious effect in future of losses accruing in similar cases, and especially having regard to the decision in R. v. Stanton, 7 C. and P. 431, whereby it would appear that the law in the case is doubtful, the Government will recoup Mr. Kerwick for his loss?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that it is the case that a man was convicted for the theft of two £5 bank-notes, one of which was traced by the police as having been paid by the prisoner to Mr. Hackett, who obtained change for it from Mr. Kerwick. The Judge did order that the stolen notes should be returned to the owner, who prosecuted. Mr. Kerwick's case is admittedly a hard one; but I am advised that there are no funds at the disposal of the Government out of which he could be recouped.

POSTAL DELIVERIES.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he can explain why letters from Ireland are not delivered in Southport, Lancashire, Newcastle, Staffordshire, and other English towns on Sunday mornings, while letters from other parts of the kingdom are duly delivered on Sundays in those places; whether complaints have reached his Department on this subject; and whether arrangements will be made to secure equal facilities for the delivery of mails from all parts of the kingdom?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to say that there is no train at present running by which Saturday night's letters from Ireland could be brought into either of the towns named in time for Sunday morning's delivery. So far as I am aware, no complaints respecting the communication have reached the Department; but the matter shall be kept in view, in order that advantage may be taken of any opportunity that may offer of improving the service.

ARRESTS AT NEWBRIDGE.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the following statement in the Daily News of 20th February:—

"Twenty-nine more workmen were arrested to-day in Clongorey for building houses for the shelter of evicted tenants. The arrests were effected by a force of 100 policemen, and the prisoners were brought handcuffed to Newbridge, and were detained in the Bridewell until 6 o'clock, when they were discharged under bail to appear at Newbridge Petty Sessions to-morrow week. The district has been greatly excited by these arrests;"

whether it is a fact that on a previous day 14 other tradesmen and labourers engaged in similar work were, with Mr. Everett, their foreman, arrested and brought to Newbridge police barrack; whether these men at the time of their arrest were working on land from which tenants had been previously evicted, or on land still in occupation of tenants; why were they handcuffed, or did they show any disposition to evade arrest; and on what ground or by whose authority were the forces of the Crown so employed?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have asked for information, but I have not yet succeeded in obtaining it.

MR. CAREW: I will repeat the question on Monday.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): What was the charge against these men, and what authority had the police for arresting them?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will cause inquiry to be made.

THE LATE RICHARD PIGOTT.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what amount of money belonging to the late Richard Pigott was sent over, or brought over, to this country after his suicide in Spain; and what has become of that money; and whether certain notes, which had been in the possession of Richard Pigott after he had given evidence before the late Special Commission, were traced by the police to Mr. Soames, or to some other person connected with the Times in the proceedings before the Special Commission?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that the only money found on Pigott after his death and brought to this country consisted of a very small sum in silver and copper. I presume that the second inquiry refers to a remittance received by Pigott's housekeeper on the 23rd of February, 1889, and presumably posted by him on the 22nd. It contained a £10 note, which it was ascertained had been paid to Pigott by Mr. Houston in September, 1888, and a £10 note and a £5 note which Mr. Soames had drawn from the bank, one in August and the other in September, 1888.

MAJOR LE CARON.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Reports of Le Caron to Mr. Anderson, which were paid for with public moneys, and which were lent to Le Caron, are now in safe official keeping; and whether Le Caron has received any further money from the Government since he gave his evidence before the late Special Commission?

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I should like to ask whether Le Caron was employed for the first time by the present Government; or whether he was passed over to them as a legacy by their predecessors?

MR. MATTHEWS: All the material facts connected with Le Caron were stated in his evidence before the Special Commission, to which I will refer the hon. Member. In reply to the question on the Paper, I have to say that I am informed that the documents which were placed at the disposal of Le Caron for the purpose of enabling him to give his evidence have all been returned to Mr. Anderson. The answer to the second question is in the negative.

MR. LABOUCHERE: May I ask whether, considering that Mr. Anderson surrendered the letters to Le Caron without permission from the Home Office, the right hon. Gentleman thinks that the documents are in safe official keeping with him?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think I am in a position to show conclusively that there was no breach of confidence.

MR. COBB: Did I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say last Session that Mr. Anderson had kept no list of the documents; and, if so, how could he know that Le Caron had given them all back?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no recollection of Mr. Anderson making any such statement.

THE SALFORD GAS FRAUDS.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in view of the opportunities for further corruption afforded thereby, he proposes to cancel or alter a prison rule under which a person who is charged with bribing a corporation official, who has been convicted of embezzling public monies, is allowed to have access to the person so charging him without the intervention of a third person; and, whether, as a matter of fact, the Prison Board have forbidden Mr. Ellis Lever to have further access to the prisoner except in the presence of a third person?

MR. MATTHEWS: When Mr. Rhodes and his client, Mr. Lever, saw the prisoner it was in the presence and hearing of a warder, permission having been obtained on the grounds I stated yesterday. The Prison Commissioners have since refused to allow a second interview of any kind, unless a statement made to them by the Town Clerk of Salford can be refuted—namely, that the prisoner could not possibly in any sense be a witness for the defendant, and that a further interview would be greatly opposed to the interests of justice. I am now considering with the Prison Commissioners what general practice shall be adopted in future with regard to visits by solicitors and others.

THE POST OFFICE AT MINGSHALL NEW VILLAGE.

SIR WILLIAM PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he will replace the post office at Mingshall New Village, Wolverhampton, which has now for two months been without even a clearance box, causing great inconvenience to a large population?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I find that the person selected to conduct the post office at Mingshall has just declined the situation. It will be necessary, therefore, to select another person, and I have given instructions for this to be done, and the office to be re-opened with the least possible delay.

ALLEGED PERJURY IN THE COUNTY COURTS.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his Honour, Judge Seymour, stated publicly in the County Court at Hexham, on the 7th inst. :—

"That he had heard since the 1st of October last more deliberate perjury in the County Court than during a lifelong career in Civil and Criminal Courts in Assize in London ;"

whether Judge Chalmers, of Birmingham Court, also recently declared publicly his conviction that the atmosphere of the court was steeped in perjury, and that he went "Home occasionally absolutely in despair as to whether he had been doing justice or injustice, owing to "the terrible amount of hard absolute lying that occurs in that court :"

and whether he will introduce some measure to check the perjury that is thus officially stated to be prevalent in England?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have no information as to what was said by Judge Seymour; but I am informed by Judge Chalmers that he did make a statement in the sense of the words quoted, and that he was alluding especially to petty cases in his urban County Court. In the more important cases above £20 he stated that there is a marked decrease of perjury, and in his country districts there is a distinctly higher respect for truth. I am not prepared to introduce legislation on the subject. The law provides already an adequate punishment for perjury, ranging from imprisonment up to seven years' penal servitude.

Sir William Plowden

LORD WOLSELEY AND THE QUEEN'S REGULATIONS.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the publication in the current number of Harper's Magazine of the article on "The Standing Army of Great Britain," by Lord Wolseley, constitutes an infraction of the last sentence of paragraph 11, section vi., of the Queen's Regulations, which runs as follows :—

"Officers and soldiers are prohibited from publishing or communicating to the Press without special authority, either directly or indirectly, information relative to the numbers, movements, or operations of the Troops, or details regarding fortifications, armaments, or experiments made in connection with military matters. They are not to attempt to prejudice questions under investigation by the publication, anonymously or otherwise, of their opinions."

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am inclined to think that the article in question does constitute an infraction of the Queen's Regulations; but, independently of that consideration, Her Majesty's Government are of opinion that members of the Headquarters Staff are bound specially to abstain from discussing in public questions connected with the War Department. I have been in communication with Lord Wolseley on the subject, and he informs me that the article in question is more than a year old. I am quite sure that it was far from his intention to violate any rule on the subject, and that such a case is not likely to recur.

STATE-AIDED SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that teachers in every State-aided school in Scotland keep a roll made up daily, and summed up weekly, showing the total weekly average attendance, and the weekly average attendance of infants, and of children in each of the six standards, and in Ex. VI. in their school; and that the number of fee-paying schools in Scotland, in which fees may be charged under paragraph 7 of the Minute of the Scotch Education Department of August 26th, is only 44, and belong to a much lesser number of School Boards; whether there is any good reason why the teacher in each of these 44 fee-paying Schools should not be able to give by return of post the particulars as to attendances in their schools, set forth in the Motion for a Return as to Fee-Paying Schools (Scotland), which appears on the Notice Paper of to-day; and whether the Government will consent to this Return?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Buteshire): As I informed the hon. Member yesterday, certain items of information requested in the Return for which he proposes to move are not in possession of the Department, and the rules as to registration do not require that the Registers should be so kept as to enable School Managers to give the attendances according to standards, the children being classified in the Registers according to sex and age. Such information could not be given without very considerable trouble to the staff of the schools. But as we are anxious to give to the hon. Member all the information in our power, we shall without delay communicate with the authorities of the schools, with the view of ascertaining whether this information can be given; and, if so, we shall be prepared to give the Return in the form he desires.

IRISH BUTTER.

MR. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the correspondence and articles which appeared recently in the Irish Press, alleging that the values of Irish butter are materially reduced owing to the depreciation of the standard of the brands affixed to the butters inspected in Cork Butter Market, which is regulated by the provisions of a recent Act of Parliament; and whether any Government Department in Ireland has the power to hold an inquiry into the matter and to enforce any necessary reforms?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will make inquiry if the hon. Member will put down the question again.

IRISH JUDICIAL RENTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in Ireland tenants who have had judicial rents fixed, and who hold under statutory terms, have no votes in the formation of Drainage Boards, though tenants holding for terms of 40 years possess the right to vote; and whether, in view of the general indisposition of landlords, whose tenants have had fair rents fixed, to assume any pecuniary burdens in respect of land improvements, and the fact that a judicial tenant's interest is practically perpetual, the Government will assent to a Bill so amending the definition of "proprietors" under the Drainage Acts as to give to statutory tenants the same rights under these Acts as tenants who hold under leases of which 40 years are unexpired?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the hon. Gentleman is in error in supposing that tenants holding for terms of 40 years possess the right to vote on Drainage Boards. The qualification is an unexpired term of 40 years. At present the burden consequent upon the execution of drainage works falls in the first instance upon the landlords. It would not be fair to give to the tenants the right of imposing this burden. If this difficulty were got over, I see no objection in principle to giving tenants the right to vote on Drainage Boards.

MR. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman give his assent to a Bill for the transference of the burdens from the landlords to the tenants?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot promise until I have seen the Bill.

CATHOLIC CONSTABLES IN IRELAND.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the fact that, on the 29th June and 15th August last, two holidays in the Catholic Church, the Catholic constables under the orders of Sergeant Clare (station sergeant at Kevin Street in the Dublin Metropolitan Police) were prevented from hearing mass, being at an early hour taken to the Phoenix Park and drilled there?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I answered this question yesterday, but I will repeat what I said. It is not the fact that Catholic constables were prevented from hearing mass by being taken at an early hour to the Phoenix Park.

MR. M. HEALY: The answer of the right hon. Gentleman is that it was not so. My informant says that it was, and in face of this conflict of testimony will the right hon. Gentleman afford facilities for a Departmental inquiry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am informed that mass was celebrated as early as 6.30 a.m. at a Catholic chapel within a few minutes' walk of the barracks, so that there was ample time for Catholic constables to have attended if they had been so disposed.

MR. M. HEALY: Did the men receive information that if they did not attend mass at 6.30 a.m. in the morning they could not attend at all?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not aware.

THE IRISH LAND ACTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is the case that the Government have recently been collecting statistics as to the number of tenants in Ireland excluded from the operation of the Land Acts, as holding under lettings wholly or mainly for the purpose of pasture; whether, if so, the information collected will be published; and whether the Government are now willing to relax the law excluding this large and important body of Irish tenants from the right to have their rents revised by the Land Courts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have been collecting information relating to agricultural holdings, but not for the purpose stated.

CORK LONG LEASEHOLDERS ASSOCIATION.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a recent resolution of the Cork Long Leaseholders Association, pointing out the grievances under which tenants excluded by the length of their leases from the benefits of the Land Act of 1887 labour; whether he can give any information to the House as to the probable number of such leaseholders in Ireland; and whether, in view of a general scheme of land purchase, the Government will now consent to admit such tenants to the right of having their rents fixed by the Land Courts?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received resolutions from this Association and others, but I have no information as to the number of leaseholders in the country, nor do I think it possible to collect it. There is no relation between the scheme of land purchase and the fixing of judicial rents.

Mr. M. Healy

MR. J. M'ENERY.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if it be a fact that Mr. John M'Enery, editor of the Limerick Leader, was arrested in the City of Limerick yesterday, on a charge of simply publishing a report of speeches delivered at a meeting of the local branch of the National League, on 3rd February last, of that city, without editorial comment; and if, in view of recent decisions of the County Court Judge of Waterford on such publications, such a prosecution is legal, and ought to be persisted in?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): This question relates to a prosecution which is now pending, and it would, therefore, be obviously improper for me to say more on the subject than that, assuming the facts to be correctly stated in the question, this case will afford an additional opportunity of ascertaining whether the view of the law attributed to Judge Waters is in accordance with the law as authoritatively laid down by the Exchequer Division in Ireland.

STRIKES IN LONDON—CONDUCT OF POLICE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the alleged interference by the police with "pickets" during the recent dock strike and the gas stokers strike; and whether, in so doing, they were acting under orders, or on their individual responsibility?

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has not been called to any particular alleged interference by the police with pickets during the recent dock strike or gas strike. If the hon. Member will put a question on the Paper specifying date and place I will make any further inquiry that he may desire.

THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES—CONFERENCE AT MELBOURNE.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether it will be practicable to procure and present to this House Papers and Correspondence affording an account of the Conference held in Melbourne for the purpose of inaugurating closer union among the Australian Colonies?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): During the preliminary negotiations which have taken place in Melbourne no points have arisen requiring a reference to Her Majesty's Government, and there is as yet no correspondence to present; but it is expected that a Report of the proceedings will arrive in March, when it will be laid on the Table of the House.

IMMIGRATION OF FOREIGN PAUPERS.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, with a view to reducing the immigration of Foreign paupers and their competition with the wage-earners of Great Britain and Ireland, Her Majesty's Government will take measures to provide for a record of the names, sexes, ages, occupations, Nationalities, and destination of all alien steerage and deck passengers arriving at ports of the United Kingdom and not in possession of through tickets to other countries, under the provisions of the still running Alien Act, as recommended by the Select Committee upon the Immigration of Foreigners in 1888 and 1889; and if, also, British Consuls at European seaports will be instructed to direct special attention to the collection of information on the subject of the emigration of destitute persons to the United Kingdom?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is it not the fact that the evidence reported on by the Select Committee referred to shows that there are scarcely any foreign immigrants who are in receipt of pauper aid?

MR. HOWARD VINCENT: In consequence of the intervention of the hon. Member opposite, I must ask my right hon. Friend if his attention has been drawn to paragraphs 3, 4, 6, and 7 of the general conclusions of the Committee, which state shortly—(1) that the better class of foreign immigrants only arrive in transit to other countries (chiefly America), but the poorest and worst class remain here; (2) that the distribution of these poor aliens, both as regards localities and trades, is such that the pressure occasioned is out of proportion to their numbers; (3) that they work for less wages and longer hours than British workmen, and are very dirty and uncleanly in their habits?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I quite agree with the hon. Member for Northampton that in this connection the word "pauper" is a misnomer, because a pauper is a person who is in receipt of Poor Law relief, and I believe that many of these persons cannot be so described. On the other hand, as they are of a very poor class and work for very low wages, their competition may drive our own people to obtain Poor Law relief. Therefore, I think that both the hon. Member for Northampton and my hon. Friend behind me are in the right. With regard to the question on the Paper, the Government feel the great importance of the whole subject, and we are making the necessary inquiries and arrangements to carry out, as far as possible, the recommendations of the Select Committee as to a statistical record, including a statistical record such as is described in the hon. Member's question. There are some difficulties in the matter; but the best use will be made of the existing materials and powers, so that the Government and the public may be informed on the subject. With regard to the last part of the hon. Member's question, the British Consuls at the principal European seaports in proximity to this country have been directed by the Foreign Office to collect information as to the emigration of destitute aliens to the United Kingdom, which information will be published in due course.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Have the Government the smallest intention of enforcing the provisions of the Alien Act as they stand?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: As far as it is necessary to obtain the information recommended to be obtained by the Select Committee.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the provisions of the Alien Act require every person, without reference to his means, to lodge with the officer his name and a certificate of his coming into the country, to state when he is going to leave it, and to get the certificate before leaving?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not mean to imply that the provisions of the Act will be universally enforced; but, of course, it is obvious that this kind of immigration takes place practically only at certain ports, and the powers of the Alien Act, as far as they are necessary and as far as they can be put in force without great public inconvenience, will be put in force.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S. E., Rugby): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government propose to take any step as to the Report of the Special Commission, after the decision of the House has been taken upon the Resolution of which he has given notice?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I can only tell the hon. Member that the question has neither been raised nor considered by Her Majesty's Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman, has the Treasury asked for, and been furnished with, a list of the witnesses, or of any of the witnesses, before the late Special Commission; and, if so, with what object; and whether, before any Vote for the expenses of these witnesses is asked for, he will give an assurance that Members will be furnished with a list of the witnesses in regard to whom moneys are to be paid?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No application has been made to the Treasury for the payment of the expenses of the witnesses. The Treasury has no information on the subject.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Perhaps the First Lord of the Treasury will answer the second part of the question?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I can hardly undertake to give an assurance that Members will be furnished with a list of witnesses in regard to matters on which we have no information directly or indirectly.

MR. LABOUCHERE: What I want to know is this. Does the right hon. Gentleman, or do the Government, contemplate paying for any witnesses who came before the Special Commission?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: We certainly do not contemplate making any expenditure, or asking the House to incur any expenditure, when we have not been asked to do so.

*MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the officials of the Library have no information as to the Report of the evidence given before the Special Commission to which he referred yesterday, and which the right hon. Gentleman described as being different from that given in the daily newspapers, and can the right hon. Gentleman state in what manner access to that Report can be obtained?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I was led yesterday into a mis-statement in saying that the evidence taken before the Royal Commission was in the Library. I was under that impression when the right hon. Gentleman opposite requested that it should be furnished. I regret that I was led into a mis-statement. The evidence I referred to is the evidence which has been printed by order of the Royal Commission, consisting of 11 volumes. There is no other evidence or Report. That evidence will be placed in the Library with as little delay as possible, and I regret that it has not already been placed there. I am asked a question as to furnishing the evidence to Members who desire to have it; every exertion will be made by the Stationery Office to place it within the reach of hon. Members as soon as it can be furnished.

*MR. WALLACE: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend that his Motion with regard to the Special Commission shall be postponed until the evidence has been a reasonable time in the Library, or has been furnished to Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I anticipated that some questions would be asked by hon. Gentlemen opposite on this subject, and I intended to say that, as I find it probable that the discussion on the Address will not be entirely concluded this evening, the Government will not ask the House to consider the Resolution of which I gave notice on Monday. And further, communications have been made to me that it would be inconvenient, under the circumstances of the case, to hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway that the debate should be entered upon at an early day next week. The circumstances of the case are, in my humble judgment, urgent; and therefore I propose to come to some understanding in the course of the evening as to the day on which the debate will be taken, and to make a statement on the subject before the adjournment of the House to-night. I should hope that it will be possible to take the Supplementary Estimates in the course of next week, and in that event I should have to give notice of a request to the House to give facilities for that purpose; and if the day were a convenient one for the consideration of the Motion of which I have given notice I should probably fix it for Monday, the 3rd of March. But I desire to make that arrangement so as to meet as far as possible the convenience of Members in all parts of the House.

MR. M. HEALY: Is the House to conclude that the Chief Secretary will introduce his Bill before the debate on the Report of the Commission?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That must depend on the course of public business. I have stated that it is absolutely necessary that we should have a certain amount of Supply before the end of the financial year; and I should not be justified in allowing next week to pass without taking some Supply, if we are not able to take the whole.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Will the speech of the Attorney General be included in the volumes?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am informed that it is included in the volumes.

THE BLIND, DEAF, AND DUMB.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD (Queen's County, Ossory): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce legislation having for its object the amelioration of the condition of the blind and deaf and dumb; and whether such legislation will be in general agreement with the recommendations of the Royal Commission, as embodied in their Report just issued?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government do hope to be able to introduce legislation having for its object the amelioration of the condition of the blind, the deaf, and the dumb, and, speaking generally, the proposed legislation will follow the recommendations of the Report of the Royal Commission.

MR. W. A. MACDONALD: Am I to understand from the reply of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government are not in a position to undertake legislation at once?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I cannot add to the answer I have already given. I hope it may be possible to introduce a Bill during the present Session.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the measure relating to Friendly Societies, mentioned in the Queen's Speech, will relate solely to societies and companies to which Section 30 of "The Friendly Societies Act, 1875," is applicable?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Bill relating to Friendly Societies has only recently been drafted, and it is impossible for me to give any pledge as to what form it may take before it is introduced. It will follow generally the line of the Report of the Committee of last year.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

MR. G. O. MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether an opportunity will be afforded for discussing the Western Australia Constitution Bill before it is read a second time or referred to a Select Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will endeavour to give the right hon. Gentleman the opportunity he desires; but at present it is impossible to say when the Bill will be taken.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Is the Under Secretary for the Colonies aware that there is now in London a deputation of colonists from Western Australia for the purpose of giving evidence on the Bill; and whether arrangements can be made so as not to detain them in this country longer than is necessary?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I am aware of the fact, and it is a reason why the Bill should pass a Second Reading as soon as possible.

CHARITABLE TRUSTS (RENT-CHARGES).

Return ordered —

"Of Rent-Charges subject to Charitable Trusts in the counties of Warwick and Worcester, returned as paid in the Reports of the Commissioners for inquiring concerning Charities, 1819-37, and not now paid (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 309, of Session 1889)." — (Sir Walter Foster.)

MOTION.

GLEBE LANDS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Mowbray, Bill to amend the Law relating to the occupation of Glebe Lands in England, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Mowbray, Mr. Childers, Mr. Talbot, Mr. Tomlinson, and Mr. Channing.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 160.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [20th February] [see page 774], proposed to Question [see page 128].

Question again proposed "That those words be there inserted."

Debate resumed.

(4.15.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I do not intend to detain the House by repeating the remarks which I was making last evening when the debate was adjourned. I have only one or two remarks to add to what I have already said. It will be in the recollection of the House that last evening I mentioned the fact that the Home Secretary finds it necessary to devote his time and take under his control the management of hackney carriages in London. Whenever a grievance is felt, instead of the Local Authorities being able to look into it, it is necessary for a correspondence to be entered into with the Home Office; and if any alteration of the law is desired we have to request the Home Secretary to receive a deputation, which necessarily takes up much valuable time, which would be much more profitably devoted to matters of Imperial importance. This illustrates the absurd way in which local matters in London are conducted. If the control of the hackney carriages were given to the Local Authority in London, one advantage which I am confident would result from it is, that the cost of the licences would be reduced, and be brought more into proportion with what it is in some of the large provincial towns, where, under local control, the cost was much less. In London the cost of a licence is £2, whereas in the large provincial towns it ranges from 5s. downwards. Consequently, the man in London with only one vehicle and a couple of horses is placed at a great disadvantage. There is also the great question of the control of the police, in which the Metropolis takes great interest. At present there is an amount of tension existing between the police in London and the people which it is most desirable, for every reason, to put an end to as speedily as possible, and that can only be done by intrusting the Local Authority with the control of the force. As an illustration of how we suffer in London from this circumstance, let me refer the House to the strike known as the Silvertown strike, which occurred just at the end of the year. There was a collision between some of the strikers and the police; the facts were communicated to the Home Secretary, and he was asked for an inquiry so that the whole question might be thoroughly thrashed out; but an inquiry was refused, and the men still think—I do not say whether they are right or wrong—that the police exceeded their duty. In a provincial town the matter would have been thoroughly sifted by the Watch Committee in the course of a few hours. If it were found that the police had not exceeded their duty, they would have received the renewed confidence of the people; and, on the other hand, if it were found that they had exceeded their duty, they would have been called to account. Then, again, there is the great subject of the housing of the working classes, in reference to which I am glad to see that the Government have introduced a Bill. It is a large and complicated question, and one that requires to be speedily dealt with before the problem becomes so great as to make it almost impossible for any authority to grapple with it. The same remarks apply to the question of the consolidation of the sanitary laws, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman when he introduces the Bill on that subject will, at the same time, give us some consolidation of the authorities who have the management of those laws, and remedy the state of chaos which exists at present. In conclusion, I would urge the Government to give us the necessary adjunct to their Bill of 1888 by establishing the proposed system of District Councils, and so perfect the machine of local government in the Metropolis that we may be able to deal effectively with those great social questions which so deeply affect the welfare of the people.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I think it is important that it should not be supposed that the desire to substitute District Councils for vestries in the Metropolis is altogether confined to one side of the House. We Conservatives are in favour of this change. But I do not think that the most eager Representative of London would contend that the creation of District Councils is of such urgent importance as the extension of land purchase in Ireland or the question of tithes throughout Great Britain. Nor can I believe that any hon. Member opposite thinks that the creation of such Councils, taking a London view of the matter, is of such importance to the people of London as the consolidation of the sanitary laws, or as a measure dealing with the housing of the working classes in the Metropolis. I would urge upon the Government, when they deal with the latter question, to give the most careful attention to the problem of re-housing the very poor, who are displaced under Acts of Parliament, or through the development of estates in Central London. Our object should be to prevent a geographical separation between the rich and the poor, and to ensure that even in rich districts the poor shall be able to find convenient and suitable homes. I deny the statement that the Conservative Members of the Metropolis are in the habit of abusing the County Council, and I think that the worst enemy of that body is the man who seeks to give to it a particular political colour and complexion. The way in which the elections for the County Council were fought by hon. Gentlemen opposite has certainly tended to deprive that body of the confidence it ought to enjoy throughout London. In too many cases the majority of the Council has sought to use it for the purpose of promoting the principles of that narrow and acid Radicalism of which the hon. Member for Shoreditch is a typical representative rather than of furthering the good administrative work it ought to do, independent of parties, for the benefit of the people of the Metropolis. A complaint has been made that Conservative Members have not spurred the Government on to legislation in these questions. If they have not done so, it is because they do not believe the Government require it. They have already given London a great central administrative body, and are quite able to judge of the necessity of reforming the local subordinate bodies. We are, therefore, quite content to trust to the good intentions of the Government in this matter; but hon. Gentlemen opposite may rest satisfied that if the Government show any indisposition to do what is necessary for the welfare of the people of London, the metropolitan Members on the Ministerial side of the House will be as anxious as other hon. Members to urge them forward.

*(4.30.) MR. CAUSTON (Southwark): I congratulate the House on at last having heard the voice of a London Conservative Member. The hon. Member who last spoke seems to think that the Government require no stirring up. I was going to condole with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in the fact that his professed desire for progress in London reforms is not supported by hon. Gentlemen behind him, for out of 47 Tory Members for London the hon. Member for Chelsea is the only one who has ventured to address the House, notwithstanding that four out of the small body of 12 Liberal Members have found it necessary to urge on the Government to action. London wants—and sooner or later will have—extended powers for its County Council; it also requires District Councils. The hon. Member said just now that the question of District Councils was not an urgent one. I dissent from that. I say, on the contrary, that it is most urgent. I hope that we shall have District Councils for each Parliamentary Division. It may be difficult and heavy work to carry out such a reform, but it will have to be faced, and Ministers must realise that it must be thorough and complete, and that no tinkering or repairing of the present system will be satisfactory. If we have District Councils for each Parliamentary Division great benefit will result. It will simplify our system of registration; the list of voters can be arranged to do for County Council, School Board, and Parliamentary elections. The change, too, would infuse more life and energy into local work; an efficient system of Home Rule in the different localities would encourage men of business capacity and position to come forward to assist in the work of the District Councils. With regard to such matters as the housing of the poor, we know how inefficiently that work is now looked after by the vestries. This and other matters of equal importance renders it necessary that we should have these District Councils as soon as possible. Then, again, with regard to the extended powers of the County Council, we want to have at least all the powers which any of the large municipalities in the Kingdom have. If there is one thing on which the City of London prides itself—and justly so—it is its police force. I venture to say there is no better body of police in the world. If the City of London is competent to control its police, surely the elected representatives of the rest of London are equally capable. We also desire powers in regard to the supply of gas and water and electric lighting, which we believe will be most beneficial. It will be more economical, and will get over many difficulties which now exist, especially with regard to water supply, if these matters are placed in the hands of an elected body. If the Government will bring in a Bill to give the County Council control over open spaces it might be passed almost without discussion on this side of the House, and the bad blood which exists in connection with public meetings in these places would be avoided. We want to prevent such disturbances as those which occurred in Trafalgar Square. I hope that the Government will soon bring in their Bill with regard to the housing of the poor, so that Londoners may have an opportunity of considering it, in the same way that they have been able to do the Bill introduced by the hon. Member for Hoxton and other London Liberal Members. With regard to District Councils, they have been promised and are expected, and this state of uncertainty is doing a great deal of harm in London, making the present Local Bodies rather careless in the way in which they discharge their duties. If, therefore, the Government do not really intend passing a measure on this question they ought to say so, in order that other steps might be taken to improve the present unsatisfactory state of matters. Again, I say that London is very anxious to have District Councils.

*(4.38.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I should like to say one word of protest against the speech just delivered. It is rather a strong order to say that because we do not speak on them we have no interest in matters affecting London. It is because we are inundated with everlasting speeches from a small handful of Radical Members that we cannot get on with the real business of the Session, and pass the measures which Parliament has assembled to deal with. Two measures in the Queen's Speech affecting the public health of the Metropolis and the dwellings of the working classes are more important than any number of speeches such as we have heard from the other side, and I rise to protest against the course taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should also like to point out with reference to the keen desire of hon. Gentlemen that the County Council should get possession of gas and water and other undertakings that 10 years ago these very Gentlemen prevented the Water Companies from being bought up at a sum immensely less than they are now prepared to pay for them. In 1880, when a measure for this purpose was brought in, it was opposed tooth and nail by the Radical Party, and on that Bill the Government were thrown out, and if now we buy up the Water Companies we shall have to pay millions more than we need then have paid. I venture to hope that hon. Members will cease speaking and let us get to the business of the Session, so that some practical good may be done for London.

(4.40.) MR. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): I entirely agree with the sensible and practical speech we heard yesterday from my hon. Friend the Member for the Horsham Division of Sussex. I hold with him that these discussions are not only useless, but also mischievous, and I think the debate should be cut short and the Government allowed to proceed with the measures they have announced an intention to introduce. But I wish to say one word of—if I may use the expression—respectful remonstrance to the Government. I hope that they will not unduly strain the allegiance of their Conservative supporters. We are not all Tory democrats, and some of us feel apprehension, if not dismay, at the announcements which have been made from the Government Bench. For instance, I was not agreeably surprised when I heard the First Lord of the Treasury announce, and other right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury Bench corroborate the statement, that it is intended to deal with the question of District Councils. I am aware that legislation respecting it is inevitable; but, in my opinion, at present it is decidedly premature. Hon. Members opposite have told us that the agricultural labourers are yearning and pining to take a share in the management of their own affairs. Now I have lived among labourers all my life, and I say that the evidence points in an exactly contrary direction. They are satisfied with the legislation brought in creating the County Councils, and wish now to be let alone, so that the Councils may have a fair opportunity of getting into good working order. I only wish to point out to the Government that they ought not to bring forward legislation which they know is opposed to the often-repeated conscientious convictions of Members of their own party.

*(4.43.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax only did himself and his Amendment justice when he spoke of it as of a comprehensive character. For my own part, I do not think that I ever heard an Amendment proposed which better deserved that description. The measures specified by the right hon. Gentleman would, if dealt with, be found quite adequate for a whole Session, and, indeed, would form no meagre programme for a whole Parliament. I was very much struck with what has often occurred to me on hearing speeches from hon. Gentlemen opposite, both in the House and the country. It is their extreme interest in and desire to press forward when they are in Opposition measures which they entirely neglect when they are in power. There is nothing, I think, more remarkable than the sudden importance and urgency assumed by questions which, when hon. Members opposite have the power to deal with them, they altogether neglect; and, really, to hear right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite speak on such subjects as local government and allotments, it would almost seem as if they are the party which has persistently dealt with those questions, and the supporters of Her Majesty's Government are the party who have always stood in the way. As a matter of fact, it is notorious in the House and the country at large that for the great reform of local government or the legislation on allotments, the Conservative Party, and the Conservative Party alone, are to be thanked. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian had the opportunity for a very long series of years of dealing with every one of those burning questions which are now advanced by right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite, but somehow or other he went out of office without having dealt with any one of them.

An hon. MEMBER: Because you opposed them.

*MR. RITCHIE: Because we opposed them! I think I shall be able to show that though many promises were made in the Queen's Speech during the term the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian was in office, the performance was very meagre, many of the Bills promised not even being introduced. I have no fault to find with the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman accompanied his Amendment. He contented himself with drawing attention to the absence of measures without going into details; but that example has not been followed by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who have discussed the several questions in very minute detail. The hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division is very anxious that the Government should introduce some simple Bill on local government. The Government are very anxious to introduce a simple Bill on various matters connected with local government. But what is the invariable practice when such Bills are introduced?

Hon. Members endeavour to attach to Bills of that kind Amendments of every conceivable character, and debate them at very considerable length. The introduction of a simple Bill by no means implies that it would be simply dealt with by the House. What simplicity means in the minds of hon. Members may be gathered from some of the suggestions made in the course of this discussion. The hon. Member for the Rugby Division, for instance, wanted the Government to introduce a Parish Councils Bill. Let us see what is his idea of a simple Bill.

MR. COBB: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I did not say it would be a simple Bill.

*MR. RITCHIE: I did not accuse the hon. Member of saying anything simple at all. It was the hon. Member for Ilkeston who invited us to introduce a Bill which he said might be a simple one, but I desire to see if it is possible to deal with the suggestions of hon. Members in such a Bill. The measure suggested is a Parish Councils Bill; but, according to the hon. Member for Rugby, the Bill should deal with Charitable Trusts, Poor Law, School Boards, the liquor trade, and churchyards. No doubt if hon. Gentlemen opposite were allowed to have their way, they would deal with these questions very simply, but in all probability they would not find the supporters of the Government assenting parties to the proposals of hon. Gentlemen. With regard to London, the Government are aware their legislation is not complete; and when the opportunity arises, the Government are as anxious as hon. Gentlemen opposite to proceed with that legislation; but according to hon. Gentlemen opposite, they will have to deal in a London Bill with lodgers, charities, Poor Law, Asylums Boards, gas, water, Extra Parochial Authorities, hackney carriages, and police. No doubt the Government have had offers of assistance from hon. Gentlemen opposite if they will attempt to deal with these matters, and one hon. Gentleman has appealed to hon. Members on the Government side to give the Government the necessary amount of "steam." It is not "steam" the Government want, but time. With regard to boundaries, the hon. Member for Halifax asks why the Reports and schemes provided for in the Local Government Act have not been obtained from the County Councils. Those provisions were introduced into the Act of 1888 with a view to the formation of District Councils, and in order to provide for the difficulties which would then arise from overlapping boundaries. Until District Councils are set up, no difficulty of that kind can arise. The revision of boundaries involves large questions of adjustment of property and compensation. It is far better to wait rather than to run the risk of having a second rectification, which might be necessary after the District Councils are established. It is very difficult to deal with these matters unless under the impetus of a strong and urgent necessity, and at present no such necessity exists. With regard to the question of the division of rates, to which the hon. Member for Carnarvonshire referred, the Government do not admit at all that that is a subject which finds favour only on the other side of the House. The Government entirely agree there should be a division between the owners and the occupiers, provided there is proper and adequate representation of the owners. They are anxious to deal with the subject when time and opportunity can be found; and when the Committee dealt with that subject they dealt with it in connection with the proposal that there should be an adequate representation of the owners. We are anxious to deal with that when we can, and to deal with it in a way which will promote the adequate representation of owners. I pass on to say a few words in connection with the criticisms on the general question. I do not propose to follow them into details in reference to the various matters which have been discussed. I do not think it is right to occupy the time of the House on such an occasion as this by going minutely into details. But, Sir, there have been some severe criticisms on the conduct of the Rural Sanitary Authorities which have proceeded from the hon. Gentleman opposite. He denounced all the Sanitary Authorities because he said they were inefficient. We admit that Boards of Guardians do not always do what they ought to do in matters relating to the public health, but the hon. Gentleman knows as well as we do that we sometimes have as much trouble with the Municipal Authorities in boroughs in regard to the public health as we have with the Sanitary Authorities in counties. With reference to the conduct of the Sanitary Authorities on the question of allotments, it has been said that we have acknowledged that the Bill has been a failure. We do not recognise anything of the kind whatever. To say that the Allotments Act has been a failure, or that the Sanitary Authorities, as a rule, are unfit to carry it out is, I think, a great exaggeration. I do not wish to go into the question now ; it can be more properly discussed on another occasion ; but I say that there are few Acts of Parliament which have come more fully into operation than the Allotments Act. Now, Sir, I have alluded to the comprehensiveness of the right hon. Gentleman's proposals, which include District Councils in England, Parochial Councils, parochial schools, secondary District Councils, organisation of the powers of local government in Ireland, and also the question of the sale of intoxicating liquors.

*MR. STANSFELD : The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to interrupt him for a moment. I thought I very clearly stated that I did not wish it to be imagined that any Government, however strong and however full the time at its disposal might be, would undertake to deal with the whole programme. What I regretted was, that not one of the subjects had been referred to.

*MR. RITCHIE : But the right hon. Gentleman thought it was essential that he should include the very vast and important measures to which I have referred in his Amendment, so that he might obtain the support of all those Members who desired to see one or other of the measures proceeded with. The first part of the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman expressed regret that we have 'not been enabled to complete the system of local government we have set up. The Government are entirely in accord with him ; we are extremely anxious to proceed on similar lines to those on which we have already proceeded, and we have derived immense satisfaction and encouragement from the manner in which the measures we have passed are being worked at the present time throughout the country. It is a matter of great gratification that on all hands it is being acknowledged that the country gentlemen have come forward to perform duties which we had hoped that they would come forward to perform in a public-spirited and patriotic manner. I have no hesitation in again repeating the pledge which has been given by my right hon. Friend the Leader of the House, that, if we can obtain the time which is necessary, we shall only be too pleased to produce, even in this Session, measures dealing with the question of District Councils. The right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that the time at our disposal is extremely limited, and, although I am quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman himself has no intention whatever of limiting our time, yet he will see that the mere fact of a Resolution of the comprehensive character of that which he has brought forward has unquestionably taken away from us some of the possibilities of dealing with the question which he is so desirous should be dealt with. Although, as I have said, the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is not intended for anything of that kind, and does not have a very serious effect, yet he will readily understand that the multiplication of Amendments on the Address does very gravely hamper the power of the House to deal with subjects of importance, and takes away from the disposal of the House weeks at the beginning of the Session when all of us are most anxious to get forward to the work. I remember perfectly well last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian giving to us some very good and very sound advice with reference to proposals which should be advanced in the Queen's Speech. He rather found fault with us last year for putting forward such a large programme, and he warned us that the result would be an inevitable and large sacrifice of innocents at the end of the Session. Well, Sir, I was not surprised at the right hon. Gentleman giving us that warning, because his experience must have shown him how very dangerous it is to overload the Queen's Speech with proposals to the House of Commons. Now, I have taken the trouble to go through the Queen's Speeches from 1881 to 1885. I find that a measure for London government was promised in the Queen's Speeches of 1882 and 1883, and in neither of these years was it introduced. It was introduced in 1884, and abandoned. A measure of local government was promised in the Queen's Speeches of 1882 and 1884, but never was even introduced. So it was with reference to Welsh education; a measure for Welsh education was promised in 1882, 1883, and 1884, but never proceeded with, and so it is with the vast number of other measures which were proposed in various Queen's Speeches. Now, we prefer the right hon. Gentleman's precept to his example, and when we were settling the questions to be put forward in the Queen's Speech, which we felt with a fair amount of assistance from the House of Commons we should be able to deal with, it did not at all imply that we might not introduce other measures if the House afforded time and assistance without which, of course, it would be impossible to proceed. And it may be possible even now, in this Session of Parliament, to deal with District Councils either for the country or for London. Measures are prepared on both subjects, and nothing would give us greater pleasure than to receive the assistance of the House in passing them, but it is our duty to deal with the questions which we have to consider, in the order of their relative importance. We have given local government in one year to England, and in another year to Scotland, and we consider we are bound to endeavour to carry out some of our pledges this Session in reference to Ireland. We regard these as important questions with which we are bound to deal, and we have placed them in the Queen's Speech in the order of their importance. Looking to the immense interests of the Metropolis, and to the interests of the working classes, we shall introduce measures not only for the consolidation and amendment of the law with reference to the sanitation of the Metropolis, but also a measure with regard to the housing of the working classes. With the other measures of a social character which are now in the Queen's Speech, no one, I think, will find fault. I venture to think that hon. Members, as a whole, will agree that there is hardly anything in the Queen's Speech that they would desire to omit. Now, Sir, the hon. Member for Aberdeen drew our attention to some pledges that were made last year in connection with the Allotments Question in Scotland. I repeat the pledges in precisely the same words as we then gave the House. The hon. Gentleman referred to a promise which we gave to deal with the question of allotments in Scotland this year. I am afraid it is impossible to go beyond the promise then made, though I can assure the hon. Gentleman we are very desirous of legislating for Scotland according to the wishes of the people of Scotland so far as we consider them just and right. I find that the promise given by the Lord Advocate hardly compares with the account of it given by the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Gentleman says the Lord Advocate has failed in his promise in connection with some Harbour Authorities of Scotland. The hon. Gentleman will see from the pages of Hansard that the pledge given by my right hon. Friend is not quite in the terms he thought it was. I conclude, as I began, by saying we do not at all put ourselves in opposition to hon. Gentlemen opposite in reference to the desirability of completing the work we have begun. We are anxious to go on with it; but I appeal to them, looking at all the circumstances, whether it is possible to deal with so many large and complicated subjects as those which we are invited to consider. While keeping our promise to hon. Gentlemen opposite, we shall enlarge our programme as we deal with the questions as to which we have measures prepared, and as to which we are extremely anxious to complete our work. Without time it is impossible for us to do what hon. Gentlemen and right hon. Gentlemen ask.

*(5.15.) MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Mr. Speaker, there is only one part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech on which I wish to make an observation. But before doing so, I must say that I was very much disappointed at the somewhat Party tone which he contrived to infuse into his observations. Especially he accused hon. Members behind me of having attacked the Government in regard to omissions in the Queen's Speech, and of endeavouring to make some Party capital for themselves out of those omissions. He exempted my right hon. Friend near me, and of all the people in the world exempted the London Members, although the London Members were particularly found fault with by his own friends behind him. The right hon.

Gentleman proceeded to say, you must remember that it is the Conservative Party, and the Conservative Party only, who have given the country this great benefit of local government legislation. I was greatly disappointed to hear that from the right hon. Gentleman, because I do not hesitate to say that these measures of local government on which he prides himself so justly would not have been carried except by the active and self-denying and loyal support of Members on this side of the House.

*MR. RITCHIE: No, no.

*MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: The right hon. Gentleman has always admitted it.

*MR. RITCHIE: I have not said one word to detract in any way from what I have previously uttered as to the assistance we received from him and right hon. Gentlemen opposite in passing the proposals of the Government. My remarks were addressed to the question of the introduction of those measures.

*MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Quite so; my answer to that would be that when we were in power we must hesitate about introducing such measures because we knew they would be opposed by right hon. Gentlemen. That has been our experience, whereas he is perfectly aware that the further he goes in this matter the more strenuous will be the support on this side of the House. I will pass from that and go to my point which I said I rose to speak to, and that is the question of Scotch allotments. I thought the right hon. Gentleman did not do full justice to the actual state of the case on this subject; it was not a mere casual term, not a random word or two in the course of the debate. I do not wish in the least to pin the right hon. Gentleman to anything which he said in that way, but the state of matters was this: There was a considerable feeling among the Scotch Members in favour of a provision not only for allotments, but for ground for building, especially in the case of the fishery populations. My hon. Friend the Member for Leith put on the Paper an Instruction to the Committee which was withdrawn as being somewhat out of order, and then he put clauses on the Paper. These were also objected to, and thereupon the Government themselves put on the Paper certain clauses with a view to giving to Scotland something like the same legislation in regard to allotments which had been given to England. But the Government discovered that that has not nearly all that Scotland wished: and that if they were to proceed with these clauses there would be a great loss of time, that possibly the Bill might not pass in its full shape, or might be lost altogether from want of time, and therefore the Government voluntarily proposed that these clauses should be put off to this Session in order to save the time, and to save the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman said—I have the words here, and nothing could be stronger or more explicit than the promise he gave. He said the Government would endeavour to frame a measure which would be satisfactory to Scotch opinions generally, and said—

“We shall, of course, keep our promise, and if we can see our way to introducing such a measure next Session, we shall be extremely glad to do so. We hope we may be able to introduce that measure and carry it next Session.”

Of course, there is a phrase which begins with “if,” but it merely represents such contingencies as are often covered by the initial letters d.v. It was only in a contingency which we cannot contemplate that they would not see their way to such a measure. I am perfectly certain the right hon. Gentleman wishes to keep any engagements he made. We have always in these matters acted in good faith, and in perfect confidence that not only any engagements would be fulfilled, but that there is a desire to do what Scotch Members wish to see done, and therefore I cannot but express the hope even now that the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues will reconsider the matter. I can assure him that, although we are not prepared to swallow wholesale any measure on account of the pressure of time, still I am perfectly certain that if there was a measure of a satisfactory kind introduced, there would be no waste of time, and no unnecessary discussion by Scotch Members.

The House divided:—Ayes 181; Noes 254.—(Div. List, No. 6.)

Main Question again proposed.

*(5.40.) MR. A. ACLAND (York, West Riding, Rotherham): I beg to move as an Amendment to the Address, paragraph 16, at the end to add—

“And we humbly express to your Majesty the regret of this House that as free education in elementary schools has been granted in Scotland no reference is made in Your Majesty’s Most Gracious Speech to legislative proposals for giving similar advantages to the rest of the United Kingdom.”

I think it will be admitted that there was a good deal both of surprise and regret not only in the House, but also in various parts of the country that this subject has not been mentioned in the Queen’s Speech. Circumstances certainly led people to expect that it would be mentioned, and that Scotland having already obtained free education—and we are always behind Scotland in the educational race—the subject might be dealt with in this country. In his speech at Nottingham the Prime Minister said he had felt strongly on the subject of giving to England what had been given to Scotland, and he added that, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had the money, no doubt he would do it. Well, Sir, we certainly heard with regret what the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) said on the subject after the Address had been moved. I was speaking to a very strong supporter of Her Majesty’s Government the other day, and he said it was a great misfortune that the subject was not to be dealt with this Session, because this year we know we have a surplus, and next year there may be none. When the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury said the subject had only been under discussion for a few months, he could hardly have thought of what he said. We are bound to remember the history of this question. Twenty years ago it was taken up in Manchester and Birmingham and in many other places, and when the late Mr. Forster passed his Bill in 1870 there were many who wished that education should then be made free. Three years later the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. John Morley) wrote one of the best essays yet written on the subject, in which he paid a well-deserved tribute to the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) and the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings) as the earnest advocates of free education. In 1885 the right hon.

Mr. A. Acland

Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) did yeoman’s service in bringing the question before the working classes by speeches delivered all over Great Britain. He used, no doubt, some very strong expressions. In one speech he said he would not rest until the abominable and cruel tax of school fees was abolished, and in another he said he would cut off his right arm rather than vote for a candidate who would not pledge himself on this question; and the Rev. Mr. Diggle, the present Chairman of the London School Board, remarked that if the right hon. Member had acted on his own advice he would have been without his right arm since May, 1886. Although the phraseology of the right hon. Gentleman may have been somewhat mellowed, at any rate his earnestness on this subject has not in the least degree abated, for only a year ago he declared his conviction that “free schools were bound to come,” and said the only question was by whom should they come, and who should have the credit of instituting them. When he said this there was a cry of “Chamberlain,” followed by cheers. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman said at about the same time—“If we, the Unionist Party, agree upon it, there is nothing to prevent this great reform being carried out.” He spoke those words before that rather interesting night last Session on which the subject was fully decided for Scotland. The analysis of the Division on that occasion made the “if” rather a big “if”—an “if” with a capital “I” to it. There were 245 in the majority, and 52 stalwart Conservatives in the minority. Of the 245 Members who supported the Government there were only between 80 and 90 Conservatives. Most of the large majority on the Division was made up of the Liberals who constituted the majority on the Opposition side of the House, and who numbered 130 out of the 245. It is quite clear that there were 150 Conservatives who did not vote at all, and of these the stalwarts would probably be able to capture a dozen or so, which would be quite enough to prevent the Government carrying any Bill whatever on the subject without our aid. We must not forget that the Conservative Government in 1885 sent Mr. Matthew Arnold abroad to make inquiries on this subject. In the course of his Report Mr. Arnold said—

"But we must remember, on the other hand, that there are some questions which it is peculiarly undesirable to make matters of continued public discussion; questions particularly lending themselves to the mischievous declamation and arts of demagogues, and that the question of gratuitous popular schooling is one of them. I am inclined to think, therefore, that sooner than let free popular schooling become a burning political question in a country like ours a wise statesman would do well to adopt and organise it."

I suppose we shall be told that what was given to Scotland was not free education at all. A most remarkable speech was delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. A. J. Balfour) on the 11th of July last. A sort of panic had evidently set in on the other side of the House, and the right hon. Gentleman was put up to set matters right. Several strong educationalists had pledged themselves against this principle. The hon. Member for the Evesham Division of Worcestershire (Sir R. Temple) a prominent member of the School Board, said—

"When this wedge which has been inserted on behalf of Scotland comes to be applied to England we intend to resist it. Let us register our protest now."

and the brother of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, the Member for Leeds (Mr. G. W. Balfour) stated that—

"The Lord Advocate had pointed out that it was not free education, but in his opinion it came to the same thing."

And the common sense of the Committee so interpreted it. The hon. Member went on to cite the well known story of the learned gentleman, who said that Homer's works were not written by Homer, but by another gentleman of the same name. Now, in answer to these rising difficulties, the Chief Secretary for Ireland got up and said—

"It is true we are giving £220,000 towards lessening or abolishing school fees. I maintain that the concession is not giving free education. We acknowledge no right on the part of parents to get their children educated for nothing. I absolutely deny that in any sense we have committed ourselves to the principle of free education. The whole debate has turned on a total misconception of the policy of the Government. . . . It was absolutely necessary that some members of the Government should correct that false impression."

Well, it would be very much as if the right hon. Gentleman were to give a suit of clothes to some needy man who was going off to work in some other part of the country, and before he went away called him in and said—

"It is true, my friend, I have given you a coat and vest, a pair of trousers, boots and stockings, a hat, and excellent underclothing, but I have not given you a necktie or a clean shirt, but then I know the locality to which you are going will supply that need. Now let me entreat you, if ever you are tempted to say that I fitted you out with a new suit, bear in mind that that is the greatest misconception you could ever have."

I am rather inclined to think that although the man would accept the right hon. Gentleman's metaphysical discourse, he would, when he got out of the place, feel himself round and say, "I rather think I have got that new suit on after all." The next argument may be that there is going to be no surplus this year. I think, however, we know enough on that subject to meet the argument without further discussion. Then we come to the more practical arguments. The first is, that this thing has been given to Scotland, and that it must—and the sooner the better—now be given to the rest of Great Britain and Ireland. One of the arguments which has been most strongly urged again and again on behalf of free education, is, that it would improve the attendance of children, and largely assist the work of the teachers. As to the question of attendance, I admit that I think sometimes too much stress has been laid on it. In England many parents are unwilling to send their children to school, and whatever is done about free education, we shall have to carry on the work of compulsion just the same. As the matter stands in our great town schools, it is the regular fee payers who are the regular attenders, and it is very often the free children who are most irregular. But I quite admit that—as is happening in Scotland at the present time—we shall have a great many more children brought into those excellent infant schools, which are one of the few points in connection with our educational work of which we should be heartily proud. As to helping the teachers, I am sure that we should all feel that the national teachers of England are a body who deserve our cordial sympathy and hearty admiration, and anything and everything which can help them in their kind feeling towards the children, and in their pity for the poorer ones, many of whom are insufficiently fed and clothed—anything that can brighten the work of the teachers is a thing which we should gladly do. Then we come to the argument that has been urged by the Prime Minister himself, namely, that if we appeal to the great mass of the people to perform a duty—which some of them now perform against their will—for the common good, we shall cure a great deal of friction, and certainly lessen a great deal of discontent by enabling this compulsory duty to be performed without cost. We have admitted that in various ways already, but although I think that a strong argument, I think a stronger one is that we have got ourselves into a position which raises invidious distinctions between those who get remission of fees and those who have too much self-respect to go to ask for remission of fees, and that having got ourselves into this position—and in some schools as many as 25 or 30 per cent. of the children are getting remission, whilst the children of many respectable people deserve it, but are not getting it—it behoves us to use our best efforts to remove these invidious distinctions and throw the boon open to all without the least loss of self-respect, and in a way that will make them feel that the State is really doing something good for them which they may accept with pride and pleasure. I do not want to drag up cases, ad misericordiam, but we know that in a country like this, where there are so many poor, and so many just above the brink of poverty, there are thousands and thousands of parents who will not demean themselves by going before the School Board Attendance Committee, still less by even finding their way before the Board of Guardians, and to whom the boon of remission would be of enormous value, without in any way lessening their self-respect or feeling of independence. I do not know if any hon. Members have read the interesting Return, furnished by the Labour Department of the Board of Trade, as to the expenditure of working men—and I am sure we must all be glad to see that Mr. Giffen and Mr. Burnett are turning out such valuable work from the Department. This Return deals with the expenditure of a working man from his earliest years of wage-earning through his married life to the period of his becoming the father of wage-earning children. Here is an instance of the expenditure of the working man: "Schooling, books and papers, £1 1s. 3d." "Interest on things in pledge, £1 6s. 0d."—and this man has in addition to pay £2 10s. 0d. into a Friendly Society. He does all he can to keep himself respectable, and not waste money, and yet you see these items side by side. One cannot help feeling that if he had not been obliged to pay this item in respect of schooling he might not have been compelled to pay the item for interest on things in pledge. A school inspector informed me the other day of a case which had just come under his notice. A widow with five children, who had 8s. a week to live upon, sent three children to school, the average fee being 2d. a week each, and often went without a meal so that she might be able to pay for their schooling, in which she took a pride and a pleasure. The other day the Chancellor of the Exchequer warned us against cases of this kind, and gave us what he called a receipt for demagogues. I am bound to say that in the same speech the right hon. Gentleman put forward more than once the case of a poor struggling clerk with £500 a year. It would be an excellent thing for the poor struggling clerk to get more still. But it is impossible to raise the feeling of pity for a man who is living respectably on £500 a year as it is for the people in the cases I have named, to whom this boon would be a most valuable one. Let us then get rid of these distinctions, get rid of the almost inevitable fraudulent statements which sometimes have to be made before Boards of Guardians or before School Attendance Committees. People feel they have to make out a case before these bodies, and very often they are tempted to misrepresent the facts. Let us remove all such temptations in matters of this sort, and it will be a great advantage from a moral as well as a pecuniary point of view. But we may be told that by granting this boon we shall be doing that which will tend to pauperise the people. To that argument I attach no value whatever. It is the present system that has a tendency to pauperise parents by compelling them to appear before Boards of Guardians, by letting them come near the workhouse at all. Those of us who have sat on Boards of Guardians and seen the people come to the workhouse must have been ashamed that we have a law which brings people there on behalf of such a noble thing like education, and which perhaps accustoms them to come there again for another purpose. Is free education pauperising in other countries? Is it pauperising on the Continent, though wages are lower there than in England? Is it pauperising in America, in Canada, or in many parts of Australia? I know it is not completely carried through in all parts of Australia, but when we think of the startling sums of money which the Australians sent the other day to help the dock strikers it does not look as if these men were much pauperised. Many of us have been to public schools or the University; have been partakers of the benefit of endowments of public money. I do not know, but at least I hope we have not been pauperised by it. The College of All Souls, Oxford, which entertained a very distinguished statesman the other day, has sent a good many men to this House, who have had assisted education. There was once a school in Salford which, in the days when fees were less often remitted than now, put up a placard on its doors on which appeared: "Entrance for assisted children at the back." I am sure many of us who have been to public schools and universities would not care to be labelled "Assisted legislators," and told we must come in by a back door. Let us get rid of this talk of assisted education. Now, while we grant this boon we must at the same time use it as a means and a lever for improving the system of education all round. While we make this gift to the parents we must ask the parents to recognise and appreciate its advantages by helping to lift the level of education throughout the country, and by seeing that their children are benefited by it. There is, for instance, the question of the age at which children leave school. There are over the district covered by a population of 8,000,000 in the country, children who are not compelled to stay at school after passing the Fourth Standard, and we are told in the Blue Book that children ought to pass the Fourth Standard at 10 years of age. Here, then, a large portion of the working classes may be reasonably asked, in consideration of the boon of free education, to let their children remain at school a year or a year and a half longer, not only for the good of the child, but for the general good, for I have no confidence whatever in the existing and, I fear, growing competition of child labour. We may also be able to do much to improve our evening schools, and, indeed, to embark on many of those reforms which some of us have been waiting for for a very long time. Generally, then, it appears to me that by a free system of education we shall get a more cheerful attendance at the schools, relieve the teachers, and be able to put on compulsion without irritation. We shall grant an immense relief to the large numbers of the working classes, and at the same time in no way diminish their self-respect, and we shall, if we are wise, make the system a means of lifting the general level of the whole of our national education. Now, as to the plans by which this is to be done. It is assumed that the grant must come from the National Exchequer. I have no doubt that a large portion of it will have to come, but when we suggest that part of it may come from the rates, the difficulty which some hon. Members opposite feel comes in because they know, or at least they say so, that if rates are granted, even in a moderate degree, to help our schools, it would involve some measure of popular control. As to the way in which it is to be granted, it has been suggested more than once that the schools should receive the exact amount of fees they now charge. A short examination shows how utterly futile and impossible that is. It is utterly impossible to so endow the large schools in the wealthy districts, which charge high fees, which are almost quasi-middle-class schools, and I am glad of it. What would you do in the poor schools where the managers only get a penny fee, and in many cases not even that? Their difficulties are the greatest, and yet you would give them the least. The only practical and satisfactory method is that adopted in Scotland. You must strike an average, and give to each school an average fee. I approach now the question of the conditions upon which such a boon can be granted. It has been forcing itself on the minds of many people that during the 20 years that have elapsed since 1870 our system of national education has been gradually undergoing a great variety of changes, and that you cannot pour out more millions for national education without considering the position, and perhaps, if necessary, making a certain amount of re-arrangement. On this subject I may as well quote some of the strong opponents of free education. Mr. Diggle, the present chairman of the London School Board, speaking in Cardiff, said:—

“It is obvious that if the contribution from the State is increased from 46 per cent. to 76 per cent. that increase of contribution must be accompanied by such an increase of control as to render them practically State schools; if, on the other hand, the ratepayer is substituted for the parent I think that it is equally obvious that the ratepayer would obtain a more direct representation upon the management of the schools than the parent now enjoys. In either case the schools would cease to retain the independent character which now marks their management, and which has hitherto influenced their progress, and little except the existence of voluntary contributions would exist to distinguish them from schools under School Boards. That little would soon disappear under the circumstances which I have detailed, and practically the era of universal School Boards would be ushered in.”

I think Mr. Diggle is quite right in saying that both the rates and taxes bring in the same question—popular control. A great many people think you can pour out taxes, and popular control is out of the question; but in the matter of local government the Government have handed over large sums to representative bodies, and every one is satisfied because the money is in the hands of men locally responsible to the ratepayers. Before going into the difficulties of the religious question I want to point out that as we go on increasing representative management, with County Councils, the District Councils of the future, and the Parochial Councils of the future, so it is quite inevitable it must come into the minds of the people why they are not to have a reasonable measure of control over this important subject of popular education. Before I descend to what I consider some of the more lamentable things said on this subject, I want to pause a moment in the atmosphere of intermediate education, and show what people say there when their minds are not warped by what may be called the traditional difficulties which surround elementary education. Let me quote a few words from the Report of the Schools Inquiry Commissioners of 1868, which was signed by the Bishop of London, the present Bishop of Rochester, and the late Dean Hook, among others. The Commissioners report—

“If in any substantial degree it (the Local Board) represents the people, it carries a force with it which it is impossible to secure in any other way No skill in organisation, no careful adaptation of the means in hand to the best ends can do so much for education as the earnest co-operation of the people. The American schools appear to have no great excellence of method, nor a very well selected system of studies, nor very thorough inspection, nor very skilful gradation of the schools in relation to each other. But the schools are in the hands of the people, and from this fact they derive a force which seems to make up for all their deficiencies. The Scotch schools owe their success in a great measure to the same cause But the real force whereby the work is to be done must come from the people, and every arrangement which fosters the interests of the people in the schools, which teaches the people to look on the schools as their own, which encourages them to take a share in the management will do at least as much service as the wisest advice of the most skilful administration.”

The Government passed, and we are very glad they did, an Intermediate Education Act for Wales. We congratulate the Vice-President upon the course he took in pushing forward the measure, but when we come to consider the religious difficulty in relation to these secondary schools in Wales—a poor country where nearly all the children we shall get into the secondary schools will be 6th and 7th standard children, the very children about the great bulk of whom the religious difficulties arises—when this subject was discussed at the Church Congress, again you hear the voice of common sense. The Dean of St. Asaph, an earnest Welshman, and a very strong Churchman, said:—

“The ‘religious difficulty’ was a mere ghost of a dead past. He saw nothing in the Act to prevent Church boys being taught Church doctrine by a Church teacher, and Nonconformist boys being taught religion by a Nonconformist teacher, outside school hours.”

The Dean of Llandaff said:—

“I cannot agree with those who think that it is wicked to have day schools in which religious instructions shall form no part of the programme. I conceive it to be derogatory to two of the most vital parts of our human constitution, and certainly of our English constitution, to hold language of that sort. Where is the parent and where is the Church? If you treat the day-school as the be-all and the end-all of the instruction of the child, you are leaving out of sight those two most important elements in the education of the individual. The parent, the home, and then the school or chapel, or whatever it be, surely must be trusted, and can be trusted, with at least some portion of the religious education of the child."

We shall be told no doubt that the religious difficulty comes in with the religious instruction given in the Board schools. Well, there are only seven School Boards in England that do not give Scriptural instruction, and hon. Members know perfectly that the Scriptural instruction given in many of the Board Schools is admirable—is quite as good as that given in many voluntary schools and much better than that given in some of them. Lord Selborne said, with very good sense, when he was in this House, that you cannot expect to make children of 12 or 13 into controversial divines. If you give them thorough teaching in Bible history you will do all you need to do when you have the Church and the home behind. It is a very lamentable thing to find men like the Bishop of Salisbury, whom all of us who know him respect for his learning and earnestness, finding himself compelled to say, as he did the other day, that as long as he was Bishop of Salisbury he would do all he could to prevent Board schools being introduced into that city. Then Canon Gregory, one of the majority of the Royal Commission, speaking at Cardiff the other day, said—

"In Board school districts, in which either no religious teaching was imparted or where only nominal attention to the subject was given, they must expect at no distant day an amount of opposition and avowed infidelity greatly in excess of what they had hitherto experienced, and it would be strange indeed if such infidelity were not the precursor of a fearful amount of vice and violation of law and order."

I really do not know whether hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side believe that School Board education is going to lead to all this vice. The rev. Canon was speaking in Wales, and I have no doubt he had in his eye the tithe question when he referred to the violation of law and order. I can only say, for my own part, I think it is lamentable that such language should be used, and I am quite sure there are many on the opposite side who think it lamentable too, and who know that this kind of talk is often irritating and most injurious. The reason why the question of popular control must continually be brought up is that the voluntary schools have largely changed their position. When Mr. Forster brought in his Bill voluntary donors were contributing nearly a third of the whole expense, but while the fees paid by the parents have been continually going up the voluntary contributions have been of late steadily going down, and all the time the Government grant has been going up by leaps and bounds. We must remember what the position of the voluntary manager really is. Of the schools which the Royal Commission dealt with no less than 10 per cent. were receiving no voluntary subscriptions at all. Is it seriously maintained that a school in this position, and which may have been built 40 or 50 years ago, is to remain under the control of perhaps a single manager for the rest of time? Is it not a rational thing that we should say, when we are spending large sums of money on such a school, that we are entitled to ask for popular control? In the towns some of the difficulties surrounding this question may be solved by making special provision for Roman Catholics and others, but is it not reasonable in the country districts to say, as the Wesleyans and other Nonconformists have said long ago, that we ought to have within reach a school which is subject to popular control? We put forward this contention on educational grounds, and on social grounds as well. We do so on educational grounds because we cannot get the inspector to condemn these schools when he sees people struggling along, as they are struggling in many places and trying hard to keep them in existence. One of them, Mr. Johnstone, in his published report speaks of "the struggling village school" and says—

"The Inspector must either refuse the grant and perhaps crush the school or he must recommend the grant for work which he knows falls infinitely short of the standard laid down for him in the code. He chooses probably the more merciful part, and from that hour he perpetuates bad teaching by rewarding imperfect effort."

We ought, by having representative district school authorities, for I do not believe in small parish School Boards, to enable the Inspector to feel that he could fall back upon reasonable support from the inhabitants of the district. That was the line which the Bishop of London, to his credit, took on the Royal Commission. He moved an Amendment declaring that the Government grant ought to be met by something like an equal grant from the voluntary managers. Then Mr. Rathbone proposed that at least a fixed proportion should be contributed by voluntary managers, and this, like the Bishop's proposal, was thrown out. Our contention is also based on social grounds. Country villages are lamentably devoid of anything in the form of self-government, and we say that this question of the school is in the United States, in Australia, and in Scotland one of the most stimulating that village people could be entrusted with. The people of the villages are pouring into the towns, and what sort of training are they getting? A young man of 19 or 20 comes into the towns with no idea that he has any right as a citizen to take part in public affairs. We want to do everything we can to interest the people not only in the schools, but in a great many other things. But the schoolsexist, and, as the head-master of Rugby said the other day, if the clergy and managers would only show that they had a little more confidence in the people, all those who deserved it might retain their seats on the popular Bodies, and they would be much more in sympathy with the people. I know all this will be misinterpreted, and I shall be told I am making a tilt against the clergy and against all the earnest men who have done so much for education. I am doing nothing of the kind. I recognise what they have done. I recognise that they came forward at a time when effort was most needed and did what they could for education out of their own pockets. But I say we are living in a time when we must give people more control over their own affairs, including education. If this is done, we shall, by slow degrees, be able, like Scotland and Switzerland, to follow up a good primary education with a system of secondary education. I will end by quoting a letter from a young Swiss friend of mine. He says—

“As to how far free education goes, I can give you my own experience. After passing like everybody else through the six classes of the primary school, I frequented for six and a half years the gymnasium at Winterthen, without paying a single half-penny for instruction beyond what my father, whose income at that time was about £100, paid in the way of rates and taxes, and he would have had to pay exactly the same amount had I not frequented it. Of course there was the outlay on books, writing and drawing materials, &c., but this would certainly be less than £12 for the whole six and a half years, at the end of which I passed on to the University of Zurich. . . . Foremost in all Switzerland we have the Canton of Bâle (City). In pursuance of the Federal Constitution of 1874, primary education became free in Bâle in 1875, in 1879 secondary education was made free, and in 1891 the system was extended to the grammar schools. At the same time materials were supplied free to the pupils of the lower and upper boys' schools and of the upper girls' schools. Finally, on the 11th of June, 1880, a Resolution was passed by the Council, according to which the State also takes upon itself the expense of supplying all the printed books to the whole of its schools, lower and upper, boys and girls, the University alone excepted; so that in the Canton of Bâle the child of the poorest man can not only frequent the common public school, but also the excellent middle and upper schools that lead up to the university without having to bring to school anything but what the child of the wealthiest has to bring as well, that is, the willingness and the firm intention to become by means of these beneficent institutions a useful member of the community both for his or her own sake as well as for the well-being of the whole State.”

We in England, with all our wealth—and we are the wealthiest country in the world—might well take a humble seat at the feet of little Switzerland on this question of education. We have looked again and again to this Government for methods that will help forward the social welfare of the working classes. They have done nothing for temperance; we fear they will do little for the villages; and now we have this question of education. Here is an opportunity which I hope the Government will take advantage of. You may solve this question in a narrow spirit, narrow educationally and narrow socially, or in a broad and liberal spirit which will give our working people the best we can give. I hope you will take the wider course, and will choose a policy which will give relief to the working classes without injuring their self respect, and which will lead to the institution of a national and progressive system of education, based on the common good sense and common good will of all classes. This you can do if you like without fear, without distrust, and without injustice.

Amendment proposed,

After paragraph 16, to insert the words, "And we humbly express to Your Majesty the regret of this House that, as free education in elementary schools has been granted in Scotland, no reference is made in Your Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to legislative proposals for giving similar advantages to the rest of the United Kingdom"—(Mr. Arthur Acland.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(6.38.) MR. S. BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I think the Government can hardly complain of my hon. Friend for bringing forward this Amendment. They must admit that those of us who are in favour of free education are smarting under a legitimate disappointment. We certainly understood from the Prime Minister not long ago that the question of assisted schools or free schools was simply a question of money, but the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) has since told us that it is not a question of money, but a question of time. This year there is money, but no time, and next Session we shall be told that there is time, but no money. We know quite well, however, that it is not really a question of time or a question of money which has delayed the settlement of this great reform. The fact is that the noble Lord at the head of the Government forgot to consult the noble Lord the Member for Darwen (Viscount Cranborne) before he sent up his kite, and the result was that the kite came down again very quickly. Last year the Scottish Free Schools proposal led to an incipient rebellion among the supporters of the Government, and I suppose Ministers were afraid that if they tried to introduce the system into England, there would be a general revolt. We are glad to know, however, that many of those who are interested in Church of England and other voluntary schools—the Archbishop of Canterbury at the head—are far-sighted enough to be ready to accept some system of free schools. It is a deplorable fact, generally speaking, that hon. Members who represent the voluntary system in this House are Tories of the Tories, and are most retrogressive on educational questions. In my belief they are playing a fatal game. Last year they were able to destroy the Code introduced by the right hon. Gentleman, and this year they have been successful in postponing the question of free schools. But passing from that, it is at all events satisfactory to find that neither the Prime Minister nor the First Lord of the Treasury in any way meet the question as a question of principle. The first Lord of the Treasury said it was a question of money, and the Prime Minister said it was only a question of time. Progress has certainly been made when we find the leaders of the Government prepared to discuss the question apart from its principle, and only as to how the details may best be carried out. We also find that there has been a considerable step forward with regard to the free school question on this side. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) endeavoured to raise the matter in the unauthorised programme in 1885, but at that time he was in the position of one crying in the wilderness; whereas those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen who required it on this side of the House had since found salvation on this as on another subject. I do not know that it is necessary to enter at any length on the arguments which may be advanced in favour of the principle of free schools, because the principle is practically admitted. The nation had come to the conclusion—Lord Salisbury practically admitted it—that if the State forced parents to send their children to school, the State ought not to place any obstacle in the way of the attendance of these children. I think my hon. Friend made rather too little of the irregularity of attendance arising from the existence of the fee. Considerable experience on the London School Board, and especially on the Bye Laws Committee, has proved to me that there is no greater obstacle to regularity of attendance, or to attendance at all—in London at all events—than the existence of the fee which is charged. An hon. Member interjected the remark that the children whose fees are now remitted by no means attended regularly. I think he forgot that the children whose fees are remitted at present belong to the class from which the most irregular children come, and, therefore, whether you remit their fees or do not, it does not really affect the question of the average child and the general attendance at school. We are often told that if you abolish the fee you take away the parent's interest in the attendance of his child. But it is forgotten that the parent has, and always will have, a very strong incentive to see that his child attends school regularly whether the fee exists or not, inasmuch as his child has to pass a certain standard before he is free to leave school and earn wages. I do not think hon. Members opposite will deny that the present system of collecting fees is most costly and vexatious—costly and vexatious to the managers, to the teachers, and to the parents themselves. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has more than once pointed out that it is the most uneconomical way of raising school revenue that could possibly be conceived. Again, the fees are not uniform, and are therefore unfair. Two men may live in the same town, earn the same wages, have the same number of children, and secured for them identically the same instruction. The one whose children attend a particular school may have to pay, say, 4d. per week, while his neighbour, whose children attend another school, will have to pay 1s. per week, the education given being exactly the same. The State, therefore, for the supply of the same article, charges a different amount in different districts. My hon. Friend said something in reference to the question of the abolition of fees impairing the self-respect and independence of the parent. I deny that free education has the effect of impairing the self-respect and the independence of the parents, but I charge, on the other hand, that the present system of remission of fees, an essential matter so long as a fee is charged, is day by day impairing the independence of, and driving over the line of pauperism, thousands of parents. The present system of the remission of fees is the most unfair, the most iniquitous, and perhaps the most pauperising agency existing in the country. I have no doubt some hon. Members opposite will argue that it is grossly unfair that the parents whose children are attending our elementary schools should be relieved of all the charge. [Sir R. TEMPLE: Hear, hear.] Well, I entirely deny that he will be so relieved. And, first, we may say it is rather hard that this particular burden imposed on a parent by the State should be imposed at the moment of all others when he is least able to bear it—when, so to speak, all his children are in the cupboard. But I deny that a parent would be relieved of all cost of his children's education if fees were abolished. He would still continue to pay in two ways. He would pay as a member of the community through his rates and taxes throughout his life; and he would pay as an individual, and pay a very heavy charge by way of cost for his children's education, by the loss of earnings that the compulsory law entails upon him. It is too much forgotten what an enormous tax our compulsory system has placed on parents. Before 1870 no parent need send his child to school at all, and as a matter of fact the percentage of parents who sent their children to school was very small compared with the number who are now compelled to send their children to school. There was, moreover, a smaller proportion of children of the age of 12 to 14, or even of 10 to 11, attending school then than now; and that means that for every child attending school up to 12 or 14 the parent is mulcted to the extent of the earnings the child might otherwise have earned. In 1869 the children on the register at our public elementary schools numbered 1,570,000; 37 per cent of those children were between 9 and 14, or, in other words, 580,000. In 1885 there were 4,412,000 children on the register, of whom 45 per cent. were between 9 and 14, or over 2,000,000. Thus nearly 1½ million more of children between the ages of 9 and 14 are now annually attending school than in 1870; representing a cost to the parents which can only be reckoned by several millions a year. To take the case of a parent who, under the former system, took his child away at 9 or 10 in order to work, and is now obliged to keep it at school till the age of 12 or 13, the loss to the parent will amount to something like £25 or £30. A sum that represented to a man earning, say, 25s. a week, as great a sacrifice as did the sending of his boy to Eton represent to a man of £4,000 or £5,000 a year.

We want to get parents so much interested in education that they will keep their children as long as possible at school, and the fee stands greatly in the way of that consummation. The arguments in favour of free schools are overwhelming, and the only question for the House of Commons to decide is, not should free education be carried out, but when and how it ought to be carried out. I by no means, however, want to follow the precedent set by the Act of last Session as regards Scotland. I do not desire to see the money coming from the rates, but from the taxes. The education rate is already very heavy, and there might be a fear that some of the ratepayers would grudge the additional expense that might attend the freeing of schools, and thus desire to starve them. Moreover, I think that the incidence of our present system of taxation, coming for the most part directly from property and intoxicants, is a much fairer burden than the incidence of the present system of rates. Secondly, I think that the whole of the fees ought to be abolished, if any are abolished. None of us want to copy the system in Scotland of freeing the lower and not the higher standards, than which I cannot conceive a more suicidal means of driving the children from school at the earliest possible age. The Scotch system, too, under which the School Board are allowed, while opening most of their schools free, to keep a few still charging fees, may be all very well in regard to Scotland, but will not do in England. I hope that when we institute a system of free schools we shall insist that all shall be free from top to bottom. I admit that the position of the voluntary schools forms the great difficulty in the way of the introduction of free schools. The present system of paying vast sums to irresponsible managers of sectarian schools has many evils in itself, and cannot be carried any further than it has been in the past. The principle I should be inclined to lay down is this—that in the case of every School Board school, or a school under local control, that school ought to be free; and, supplementary to this, that there ought to be a free school within the reach of every parent. There would not be much difficulty in carrying that out in the case of large towns, where School Board schools already exist, and in the case of the small rural districts it is high time it was enacted that where there is only one school that school ought to be not only a free school, but an undenominational school, as far, at all events, as the time of secular instruction is concerned. Then, I do not see why, if our Board Schools are free and there is a free school within reach of every child, there need be any action taken, at all events at present, to make the acceptance of the free school system compulsory in England, as it is in Scotland. I do not see why an option should not be given to the managers of voluntary schools; subject, of course, to the provision that if they accepted the grant, they must, at all events during the hours of secular instruction, come under some system of local control; but that if they choose to go on under the old system they can do so. It is often being asked why should we alter the principle on which the voluntary system has been carried on for so long? I think the answer is simple, namely, that in 1870 there were great difficulties in the way of carrying out a system of universal school boards. A compromise was therefore come to under which, where the voluntary school could show the receipt of substantial amount of revenue other than the grant, the principle of coupling public control with public expenditure should not apply. But everything has altered profoundly since then. In 1879 the fees and subscriptions together represented five-eighths of the whole revenue of the Church schools for instance. But in 1888 the proceeds from grant was equal to the other two sources of revenue. And if the fees were abolished, and further public grants substituted, the subscriptions would then represent but one quarter of the whole revenue, the other three quarters coming from public resources. I think that that would make such a material difference in the position of the voluntary schools that it is quite time we applied the principle of local control to those voluntary schools which accepted the grant. I have to apologise to the House for having detained it at such length. I trust that we may be able to arrive at some solution which, while it may not please all parties, may be carried through without raising all those sectarian difficulties which did so much harm in 1870, and that we may be able to give the great boon of free education to the people at the earliest possible moment, and with the least possible friction on the one side or the other.

*(7.3.) SIR RICHARD TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I desire, in the first place, to express my regret at finding myself opposed to the hon. Mover and Seconder—Gentlemen with whom I have so much sympathy in educational matters generally. Though I shall not attempt to follow their discursive speeches, yet as I have been pointedly alluded to by them I must at once reply. As regards Switzerland, I must say that, having recently returned from the upland parts of that country, I have failed to perceive its overwhelming superiority in the matter of education. Would the House be surprised to learn that the rural schools there are open only half the year? [Mr. MUNDELLA: In what part?] In the uplands, the higher valleys, and the mountainous regions. Surely it is much better to keep the schools open 10 months in the year, as we do in England. The hon. Mover has begged that the advantage which has been vouchsafed to Scotland should be extended to England. But many persons in England do not admit that it is an advantage at all. We consider that neither Scotland nor any other country can show anything at all equal to the English voluntary system, and maintain that our voluntary system is one of the grandest features ever witnessed in the history of the national life of any country, that it is among the chief glories of our institutions, and the crown and diadem of our social system. The hon. Mover has alluded to the surplus of the coming Budget. I earnestly hope that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will devote that surplus to the reduction of taxation, and not trouble the Education Department with it, that is, will not use it for making modifications in the voluntary system. Allusion has also been made to what recently fell from the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House, to the effect that this question is, at all events, to be relegated to the next Session. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that that statement afforded sincere satisfaction and relief to many of his most consistent supporters. Reference has also been made to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham. I desire to speak in terms of the utmost regard and respect for the right hon. Gentleman, who was one of the first, if not the very first, statesman on the Liberal side who, while advocating remission of fees, also recommended that compensations should be given to voluntary schools. I hope I have not misunderstood him. It has been said that the fees are a cruel tax; but in what does the cruelty consist? The parents make the payment of fees in fulfilment of the first duty which devolves upon all citizens—the duty to educate their children at their own cost so far as their means may permit, and not at the cost of the community. Let me ask the House to consider how much is already contributed from public sources. In the Metropolitan area seven-eighths of the whole cost are now contributed from the rates to the parents who are admittedly able to pay for the education of their children, and to those not able to pay the education is already free. Much has been said regarding compulsion, and it has been argued that as the State compels the parent to educate his children, the State ought to pay entirely. I do not desire to enter into municipal matters, with which I am not so intimately connected as I am with educational questions; but are there not many instances when the citizen, being compelled by law to do this, that, or the other for his own and his neighbours' benefit, is also compelled to pay for the same? Then, I ask, wherein consists the injustice in compelling a man to educate his children and then asking him to pay a small portion of the cost? The hon. Mover has analysed the Division of last Session on this subject. With regard to the vote which I and others on this side of the House reluctantly felt obliged to give against the Government last Session on the Motion in favour of the principle of free education, I can only say that we are still of the same opinion. We have made similar declarations to our constituents, and shall, I hope, act up to them. The hon. Seconder spoke of us as the "retrogressive party." I entirely repudiate that charge. Many of us occupy a large portion of our public life in promoting the work of elementary education, while the same cannot be said of some of our critics opposite. With regard to the statement that the attendance is affected by the payment of the fees, I desire to say that according to our experience in London the attendance is favourably affected by the enforcement of fees and unfavourably affected by any laxity in that respect. The hon. Mover said that there is friction in the collection of fees; that an invidious distinction is drawn which made remission difficult; that remission would be considered a boon; that high fees of 2d. and upwards are charged; and that fraudulent statements are made by parents to get remission of fees. I desire to traverse absolutely each and all of those statements. Within the Metropolitan area the poorer children are not charged 2d. and upwards, but are only charged 1d. With respect to fraudulent statements being made by the parents for the purpose of obtaining remission of the fees as alleged, I entirely deny that that is the case, as regards the Metropolis at all events.

*MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: What I said was that there is a temptation to parents to make fraudulent statements as to their incomes.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I am alluding more particularly to what was said by the Mover of the Amendment.

*MR. A. ACLAND: I should like to say I put it in the same way as my hon. Friend. I said that there was a temptation to the parents to exaggerate and make out a better case for the remission than they otherwise would.

*SIR R. TEMPLE: I regret, then, that I caught more particularly the word "fraudulent" than I did the word "temptation." In London there is no difficulty of the kind suggested. Parents who require the remission of fees report the same to the teacher, who reports to the local manager, who reports to the Divisional Committee, gentlemen who live close at hand, and then the cases come before a Committee of the Board, over which I preside, every fortnight, and no difficulty ever occurs. Then it is said that there is inequality under the present system with regard to fees between the poorer and the wealthier classes. I admit, and I think it is so much the worse for the hon. Member's arguments, that well-to-do parents, and there are tens of thousands of such, are not permitted to obtain a first-class education for their children without paying their due share of its costs. It has been argued, both by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment, that the remission of fees is now carried out in a manner that tends to pauperise the parents of the children. That statement is, no doubt, based upon the fact that in certain parts of the country the remission of fees is carried out through the Guardians. Where the Guardians pay the fees the children have to attend the Guardians' meeting for that purpose. But there is nothing of the kind in the Metropolitan area, and nothing could be more reasonable than the manner in which the remission of fees is managed here. As I have just explained, there is no reason why the good example of London in this respect should not be followed in other parts of the country, and it could be done by a stroke of the pen. This objection then amounts to nothing, for it can be easily and instantly removed. Then the Mover of the Amendment urged that if fees were remitted parents might reasonably be compelled to keep their children a year or two longer at school. If I wished to prejudice the public against the hon. Mover, I would repeat that argument to them. My experience is, that parents would prefer the continuance of the present fee system to keeping their children longer at school, with a corresponding loss of juvenile wages. The hon. Mover spoke of the change that has taken place in the voluntary system throughout the country, compared with what it was 10 years ago. Alas! that is nothing more or less than the result of the grinding competition of the Board schools. Even now the voluntary schools hold their own in spite of many disadvantages to which they are subject. The hon. Mover seems to clog the grant of compensation to voluntary schools with many unacceptable conditions of extraneous control, drew what he intended to be a moving picture of the exclusiveness of the voluntary system, and urged the advantages of a system of education dependent upon the people from whom it springs. Surely the voluntary system offers these very advantages, and is the very system that really does spring from the people. For it involves the principle of Englishmen doing everything for themselves from their own resources spontaneously and ex proprio motu, without the compulsion, the discipline, the dragooning, as it were, of a universal State system. There is one point upon which I sympathise with the hon. Members opposite, and that is with regard to the Scriptural system of instruction in Board schools. It is a delicate subject to be dealt with in this House, but there is a distinction between Scriptural and religious instruction. While I claim for the Board schools credit for the way in which the Scriptural instruction is carried out, an instruction which is second to none in this Kingdom, I cannot pretend that they give that religious instruction of a higher kind which, doubtless, is given by ministers of religion in voluntary schools. I thank the House for having so kindly listened to my rejoinders to the hon. Mover and Seconder. Before I sit down, however, let me recapitulate the objections of my Parliamentary comrades and myself to the proposals set forth in the Amendment. We object to free education because it derogates from, and almost abnegates, that which is the first duty of every independent citizen, and that is to educate his children as far as he can according to his resources. The hon. Mover said that if we compelled parents to send their children to school at an age when they might earn money we should remit the fees. But only last Session the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton told us it was wrong that parents should benefit by the wages of the children of tender age. I subscribe to the principle so justly set forth. I hold that it is the duty of a parent not only to pay what he is able to pay towards the education of his children, but to bear all the burdens incidental thereto. Further, we maintain that there is no need among the comparatively well-to-do classes for this free education; and I believe that a majority of the people in my agricultural constituency and in the Metropolis—the two places I know best—do not desire it. We maintain, further, that the remission of fees would inflict a very heavy burden upon the Exchequer for the payment of compensation, for which payment no adequate reason has been assigned; and also that there would be a great loss in national resources, because the voluntary system all over the country would be withdrawn or materially damaged, and we think it would be a thousand pities that these fountains of benevolence, which have so long flowed in happy England, should be dried up. Then we say that the system would involve the Legislature in a perfect mass of complications in respect to the voluntary system, which, despite the efforts of its opponents, is still a living and vital power in this country. For all these reasons, we earnestly deprecate the proposals laid before the House this evening. I am, of course, bound, as a loyal supporter of the Government, to vote against any Amendment to the Address; but I vote on this occasion from something more than Party loyalty—I vote from a hearty dislike to the proposals, the principles of which I believe to be radically unsound. Several classes in my constituency view with apprehension the consequences that would accrue from the adoption of those principles. If we must lose the fees of the voluntary system, we must strive to obtain compensation from the general revenue, but not from the rates. We shall be thankful for the boon, or concession; and should the worst come to the worst we must hope for the good offices of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain), although we do not desire to put his goodness to the test by demanding any sacrifice from his justice and generosity. We would rather do without the compensation and maintain our existence, as at present, believing that it does conduce to the building up of that national character which has ever been the chief honour of the British nation.

*(7.35.) THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): My hon. Friend who has just sat down has addressed to this House, with his usual lucidity, a statement characterised by his customary ability. I am not prepared to follow all the arguments of my hon. Friend into the merits of the question, and still less am I disposed to follow the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. Acland) through the long, though able, speech he has delivered in bringing his Amendment before the House. Many of the remarks of the hon. Gentleman were, doubtless, somewhat wide of the mark; and I may also say that he has a programme so varied that it would be impossible it could engage the attention of the House at a time like the present. I fully admit the great ability the hon. Gentleman brought to bear in the dis-

session of the various questions with which he dealt ; but I hope he will acquit me of any intentional disrespect if I do not go into them on the present occasion, involving, as they do, so vast an amount of detail. The hon. Member has brought before us the question of local control, and also the questions of religious instruction and secondary education, all of which are matters which have not only occupied the serious attention of the House in the past, but which will, no doubt, occupy our attention in the not very distant future. I must confess to having been somewhat puzzled as to the purpose of the Amendment when first put before the House. A notice of Motion on the same subject was on the Order Book of the House at so late a date as Monday last, in the name of the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton), with a view of bringing the matter in a concrete and precise form before the House on some early day ; and I have observed the somewhat hurried way in which, during the last day or two, that notice has been withdrawn. I have very little doubt that before long we shall see a similar notice again on the Paper, and find that the hon. Gentleman has only momentarily stood aside to oblige his hon. Friend. I was at first puzzled to divine why it was, after that notice was placed on the Paper, this Amendment was put upon the Order Book ; but I assumed it must have been in order to give hon. Members opposite an opportunity of enunciating anew their unswerving loyalty to the principle of free education. It is, however, just possible that the Mover of the Amendment has merely placed it on the Notice Paper for the purpose of eliciting from Her Majesty's Government a precise scheme or declaration of policy in regard to what the Prime Minister has termed "assisted education." All I can say at starting is, that if that be his object I think he will find that the net he has spread has been spread in vain, as far as Her Majesty's Government are concerned ; that its meshes are so gross and obvious that even the most short-sighted bird would refuse to walk into the toils. Now, I admit at once the importance of this question, and also that its position has considerably altered during the past year or two ; while, although the attitude of the Government and their supporters has undergone some change, we are nevertheless under the obligations in regard to the matter which have been imposed upon us by the Legislature of the past. I do not wish to be hypercritical ; but it is marvellous how little the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment had to do with that proposal. What is the Amendment of the hon. Member ? He asks the House to declare "That, as free education in elementary schools has been granted in Scotland, no reference is made in Your Majesty's Most Gracious Speech to legislative proposals for giving similar advantages to the rest of the United Kingdom."

Well, Sir, I am at a loss for information with regard to the meaning of this Amendment ; for, from the speech of the Mover, I was not sure whether he was asking the House simply to express regret that the question is not touched upon, or to extend the expression of regret to the fact that no particular legislative measure will be submitted on the subject. I must detain the House for a few moments while I urge how it is, and why it is, that Her Majesty's Government might be left open to the charge of approaching so important a question in a hap-hazard and incomplete way if they were to attempt to deal with it during the present Session. The Amendment asserts that because Her Majesty's Government have conceded free education in Scotland by the great measure passed in July last, they ought, in February of the present year to be prepared to bring a practical scheme of the same kind for this country. But I would point out that this question is full of difficulties and complexities in this country from which in Scotland it is practically free. I hope, however, the House will forgive me if I refuse to deal with the merits of the question. What I desire to deal with is the position in which we find ourselves when met with the question—Why is it that we are not prepared to deal with the subject during the present Session ? There is a vast difference between the circumstances of the two countries, which make it comparatively easy to deal with the question in one country, and a difficult and complex matter in the other. In Scotland we have not been met at the outset by the great difficulty caused by the voluntary system. I will give the House a comparison as between the positions of England and Scotland in regard to the voluntary system. The total number of schools in England and Wales is 19,200, and of these 14,600 are voluntary schools, or 76 per cent. of the whole of the schools in the country. In Scotland the number of schools is 3,100, and of these only 500 are voluntary schools, or only 16 per cent., as against 76 per cent. in England. Therefore, the difference in this respect is very real and self-evident. I would also remind the House that the method of dealing with this question in Scotland is totally different from any method that has been suggested of dealing with the question in England. As far as Scotland is concerned, she had the offer of free education made to her owing to the unanimous demand of her Representatives that a certain sum of money allocated to her should be applied to this particular purpose. I refer, of course, to the allocation of the Probate Duty. In a certain sense, therefore, Scotland is providing the fees herself; whereas in this country the demand is that the fees should be paid from one of two sources—either from the rates or from the Imperial Exchequer. Therefore, I say, we are met at the outset with a great and noticeable distinction. I should like here further to urge that in regard to the situation in which we find ourselves to-day, Her Majesty's Government has been unable to collect anything like the amount of information which ought to be possessed before such a question as this can be grappled with in a practical manner. The question has not, I think, ever been seriously discussed within the four walls of Parliament; and further, I say advisedly, having discussed the matter with all sections of the House, that if I were at this moment to collect together at haphazard any 20 Members, and put to them the question, how did they think this question ought to be dealt with—whether as a whole or only partially—I should find that they were divided by enormous differences of opinion. What, I ask, has happened during this very discussion? We have had an Amendment moved by an hon. Gentleman who has taken a prominent part in the Education Question. His Amendment has been seconded by another hon. Member, who has likewise made the subject of education a very special study—I allude to the hon. Member for Poplar (Mr. Buxton).

Sir W. Hart-Dyke

We find, however, that the hon. Member who seconded the Amendment does not agree in all respects with his hon. Friend who moved it; so that these two Gentlemen, both of whom are experts on this subject, are unable to agree as to the terms of their own proposal. The hon. Member for Poplar is totally hostile to the fees being paid out of the rates, and thinks the money should come from the Imperial Exchequer. If the House will forgive me, I will point out that the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the Opposition alluded the other night, in terms of regret, to the fact that the question of free education was not mentioned in the Speech from the Throne. I will read the text of his remark on that point for the edification of the Mover of the Amendment, who seemed to think that this is a question to be disposed of by the wave of the magician's wand, or by a single stroke of the pen. The right hon. Gentleman said—

“I do not mean to express more than a general opinion that this is undoubtedly a large financial question, and that it involves a great number of considerations over and above the mere extension of your liberality to a point somewhat beyond that which it has hitherto reached.”

There is a haziness about this declaration which does not point to an immediate settlement of this question, and which does not bind the right hon. Gentleman very much. I must say that that declaration leaves an enormous margin for the imagination, and contains a very large quantity of reserve material, which might be used for any possible purpose. I venture to urge, on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, that while they do not recede one iota from the position they have taken up on this question, as indicated by the speeches made by the Prime Minister or my right hon. Friend, I think I have pleaded successfully for further delay and consideration on the part of the Government before they come to Parliament and announce a definite scheme and policy on this important question. Well, Sir, another point has been raised to which it is necessary that I should allude, because it was definitely raised by the Mover and Seconder of the Amendment—I refer to the position of the great voluntary system of the country as it is affected by the proposal now under discussion. As far as I am concerned, looking back with some knowledge of this subject, and as one who was present in the House during the many struggles of 1870, during the discussion of the measure introduced by the late Mr. Forster, I will take no part in the advocacy or administration of any scheme which, in my judgment, would hazard the position of the great voluntary system. As far as I am concerned it is a sine quâ non of any scheme, not only that it should be thoroughly safeguarded in all its details, but that it should bear, not only on the face of it, but in the working of it, ample security as regards the future of voluntary schools. I am told that the voluntary system is not in danger when this scheme is advocated of absolute freedom in the schools. I have no doubt that many hon. Members advocate this change as sincere educationists, and on the ground of simple justice to the parents; but there are other hon. Members who advocate the change because it would be destructive of the voluntary system of the country. The Mover of the Amendment gave notice last Session of a proposal which indicated a desire for the establishment of universal School Boards; and in the face of opinions like those the Government cannot be blamed if they view this question as one first and foremost with reference to the future of voluntary schools. My hon. Friend the Member for the Evesham Division of Worcestershire (Sir R. Temple) referred to what this great system has done for our schools in the past. I am old enough to remember the splendid efforts which were made, not only by the Church of England and Roman Catholic Bodies, but by the great Wesleyan Bodies, on behalf of the voluntary system. Those Bodies came forward and filled up a gap many years ago, and those who remember what they had achieved in the past for education, and the great sacrifices of time and money borne by them, will be justified in asking the House to pause before adopting any hurried scheme for dealing with this great and complex question. Some hon. Gentlemen speak lightly enough with regard to the future of voluntary schools in this country and the extinction of the system; but there are reasons why we on this side of the House should defend that system. There is certainly one large part of this system which it is important the House should bear in mind, and that is the question of finance. I should like to give the House a few figures and a few facts as to what the voluntary system means, and what its abolition would mean from a financial point of view; and I do this in order to show that the Government must give the most careful consideration to any scheme which deals with the vast financial interests concerned. There are 14,600 voluntary schools in England out of a total of 19,200 (76 per cent.), as compared with 500 out of 3,100 in Scotland (16 per cent.). The total sum received in fees throughout England in the year 1887-8 was £1,862,303. Of this sum, £1,240,900 was received in voluntary schools, and £621,400 in Board schools, making a total of £1,862,300. During the same period £745,000 was derived from voluntary contributions; so that, roughly speaking, if free education were carried out to the injury and eventual destruction of voluntary schools, an additional sum of £2,600,000 would be required for annual maintenance alone. But this is not all. If I refer to the question of school buildings I can prove to the House the enormous cost the abolition of the voluntary system would entail. Since 1870, and up to 1882, building grants to the extent of £312,200 have been met by local contributions of £1,348,000, and beyond all this 4,806 voluntary schools were erected, enlarged, or improved without Government aid, at a cost to the promoters of at least £6,000,000. This great effort has been made to secure the liberty of religious teaching, dear to the promoters—Churchmen, Roman Catholics, and the Wesleyans alike—and if any scheme were to sweep away these schools they would have to be supplied at the cost of the rates. As far as I am concerned, I do not wish to look upon this question in any narrow or bigoted spirit. I am delighted to hear the statement from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Poplar, that the managers of Board schools admit the fact that the people of this country are demanding sound religious education. I admit that a gradual change has been going on, and for the better, in the Board schools. The average cost of erecting voluntary schools has been about £5 7s. per scholar, and the number of scholars in average attendance at voluntary schools was, in 1887-8, 2,255,000. According to the loans issued by the Department up to April 1889, the estimated cost per child for the erection of Board schools, including the purchase of sites, was £12 10s. If voluntary schools were generally closed, some would, no doubt, be transferred to School Boards, but many more would not; so that the financial effects of any scheme affecting the stability of voluntary schools has to be considered, not only in relation to the cost of their maintenance, but in reference to the capital sum which would have to be raised on the security of the rates in order to supply their place. If all the school places in voluntary schools had at this moment to be supplied at the cost of the rates a capital sum of £28,000,000 would at least be required. Now, Sir, I have given these facts in no spirit of contention, but simply to support the argument that this subject ought not to be lightly undertaken by the Government. It must only be undertaken after grave deliberation, and after a careful examination of all the various questions with which it was connected. It would be of value to the Government not only that there should be an exhaustive debate in the House, but that they should obtain all the information they could from educational experts outside the walls of Parliament. I think I have made out a case for not proceeding with this question of assisted education during the present Session; and, considering all the difficulties of the problem, and the absolute necessity for gaining all the information possible, I may fairly ask the House to reject the Amendment, and to proceed with the important business announced in the Speech from the Throne.

*(8.0.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I desire in this debate to say a word or two as to the peculiar position of the Principality of Wales. I can only regret that the voice of Wales does not find expression on this occasion through the mouth of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. E. Ellis), who not only is a remarkable example of the success attained by Wales in education, but who has the confidence of all his colleagues in his treatment of educational questions in the House of Commons. The case of Wales is peculiar, in the first place, because it can be shown that the need of Wales for free education is higher than that of England, and even higher than that of Scotland: and, in the next place, because it can be shown that Wales is even riper than England for a measure of this sort. In dealing with the need of Wales I do not wish to bear upon any claim that might be adduced from her physical peculiarities, though they deserve notice in this respect. The population of Wales, or of a great part of it, is much more sparse than that of any part of England. Anybody who has lived in Wales, and who knows the mountainous parts, must have observed that the construction and equipment of elementary schools there is a much more costly burden on the poor Welsh ratepayer or farmer than it is in any rural district in England, and, furthermore, the attendance of children at those scattered schools, and in an inclement climate, is a greater strain on the parent's means than is the case in England. But there is a much more important physical difficulty in Wales establishing its greater need—the bilingual difficulty. The whole of the elementary schools in Wales are English schools, and there are at the present time more people in Wales speaking the native language of the Principality than at any other period within the history of Wales. It is obvious, therefore, that the attendance of Welsh-speaking scholars at English schools involves a wholly distinctive effort on the part of both parents and children, and one that can only be maintained by the singular devotion of the community to the cause of education. Passing from this question of the greater need of Wales and referring to the condition of the ripeness of the Principality for free education, I would point out that it is admitted on all hands that Wales has a peculiar love of learning which extends from the very bottom to the top of the social ladder. This is not at all more conspicuous in one class of the community than in another, and that love of learning must in a country as poor as Wales find its common starting-point to a very large extent in elementary schools. Last Session Her Majesty's Government concurred in giving a great boon to Wales. In the giving of it hearty good-will was manifested on both sides of the House, and Wales will not soon forget the sympathy which was shown to her from the Government Benches in regard to the Intermediate

Education Act. But it is notorious that the success of that Act depends on the condition of the elementary schools of Wales, because the class that needs the Act is the class that receives the groundwork of education in the elementary schools. In this respect Wales is riper. But it is riper on other grounds than its love of learning and the character of its elementary schools. Wales is riper because it has obtained a much larger power of local self-government. It has been freed to create all its religious machinery, and in so doing it has gone far ahead of England in the art and practice of local self-government. Every one must feel that free education means a very much larger local control, and that control can be entrusted to Wales with the greatest confidence—even to the smallest community. I say Wales is riper for free education than England. I say more, and that the question is about to become a very burning question in Wales. There is a wide difference between Wales and England as to educational situation, and the Conscience Clause will furnish ample evidence of that. In England the Conscience Clause is for the protection of the minority; but in Wales it acts for the protection of the majority. The Nonconformists form an overwhelming majority of the class that attend the elementary schools in Wales. A large proportion of the voluntary schools are Church schools, and thus we know that the Church is controlling the education of an enormous body of Nonconformist children in Wales. The situation is surely very unwholesome and most undesirable, and I do not believe it can last long. For these reasons, I submit that the need of Wales for free education, subject to representative control, is stronger than that of either England or Scotland, and I can promise the House that there will be no firmer supporters of the coming measure of free education than the representatives of Wales.

*(8.40.) MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I am called upon to address the House under circumstances not altogether favourable to the statement of my views, but the character of the debate is such that I take such opportunity as presents itself. I am unable to vote for the Amendment, nor can I agree with the arguments by which it is supported.

VOL. CCCXLI. [THIRD SERIES.]

We were told last year that the proposal was not to give free elementary education to Scotland, and it is therefore impossible for me to vote for the Amendment on the ground set out therein, that we should extend free education to England because it has been granted to Scotland. I will first make reference to the speech of my hon. Friend who brought forward this Motion. He referred, in language which I regretted to hear from him, to the decay of subscriptions to voluntary schools. But he is wrong in his facts, and I think that, in justice to the friends of the voluntary system, it is right I should refer to the Report of the Education Commission to correct his mistake. In 1870 the amount of subscriptions to voluntary schools was £418,839, in 1884 the amount was £732,524, and in 1884 the figures were £745,000. I am quite aware there was a small decline in some of the intervening years, but that decrease has been fully made up, and we are now at a higher figure than in any preceding year. I sympathise with the hon. Member in his desire to improve elementary education, and I will gladly co-operate with him towards effecting that object; but I do not see in any degree how free education will be of any assistance towards that most desirable end. I do not myself believe that it will have any effect whatever on our having a central system of teaching, and it is not my opinion that we should have any increase of attendance by the adoption of that method. I desire to see an extension of the age at which children leave school; but of one thing I am certain, and that is that a movement in this direction must be of a gradual character. We cannot advance with any rapidity, and I must confess that when I have had an opportunity of addressing an audience on educational subjects, I have been greatly disappointed by the want of sympathy on the part of parents when I have dwelt on the advantage to children of an extension of the time at school. We must not go far in advance of public opinion, but gently moving on we must press public opinion before us, rather following than driving it. Our condition in regard to the age at which children leave school is more satisfactory than is generally supposed. According to the last statement the number of children on the register was upwards of 4,000,000, and out of this number 1,400,000 were above the age of 10. I should like to see that number largely increased; but at the same time we cannot look at these figures without some feeling of satisfaction, realising the fact that a very considerable advance has been made. In this debate, as on previous occasions, it has been said that when you force a parent to educate his child you must make it easy for him to do so. But the State compels a parent to feed and clothe his child, to provide proper lodging and accommodation for the child, and therefore when the State says to the parent on the one hand you must educate your child, and on the other hand you must pay for that education, the State is only acting towards the parent in this particular precisely upon the same principle, and on the same lines, as are adopted in reference to clothing and food. In reference to what was said by my hon Friend who introduced this Motion respecting the stigma of pauperism, I deprecate as strongly as any man any association of the kind. I desire complete separation between Poor Law administration and popular education. But I do not believe that the connection is by any means so close as some hon. Members imagine. In one of our great towns—I think it is Liverpool—the parent appears before a Committee of the School Board at the Board Office, and the Committee having examined every case put before them, submits a list to the Guardians, which is accepted by the Guardians as a matter of course; there is no communication between the parent and the Guardians from the first stage of the proceedings to the last. The difficulty is more one of administration than of law; and for my own part I would have the separation between Poor Law relief and education absolute and complete—destroy connection between the one thing and the other. Then reference has been made to old endowments, and we have been told on high authority, both in the House of Commons and outside, that as there is no degradation in receiving education from an endowment, so also there is none in receiving education at the hands of the community. But I do not think the analogy perfect. Endowments were given in old times, and those who derive advantage from the bequest, are recipients of the benevolence of those who have passed away from this world. But education at the cost of the ratepayers without any charge in the shape of fee, means that a man derives a particular advantage from the physical toil and labour of his neighbours. There is a great difference between the two cases; the analogy entirely fails, and there is no support for it in the argument of compulsion. I do not desire to occupy time at length, and proceed to call attention to the inequality with which free education must necessarily work. You have in the country schools, varying very much in character, and differing greatly in the amount of fees. I believe it would be entirely impossible, and I think it has been admitted in this discussion that you cannot with accuracy and precision under a system of free education settle the compensation for loss of fees; you must strike an average. The result of awarding this average must be the loss of pecuniary resources to highly paid schools, and the effect will be that thus you will lower the higher character of elementary education. I have a circumstance to mention in support of this argument, which I confess somewhat struck me. There has been, as the House knows, a change made in the educational system in France. Some years ago the government of that country altered the system in vogue. I was somewhat surprised on a recent visit to find an official announcement or apology made to a local community that certain schools were inferior in character; the announcement was in effect—

“We grant you the schools are not so good as they used to be, we admit the education is inferior to that formerly given, but citizens must remember there is a common purse, and although individual schools may not be so effective other schools are more effective, and that which is your loss is gain to your neighbours and others.”

Now, this is a circumstance of a remarkable character, and one which ought to be a warning to us when we approach the details of this question. I believe, from information which has reached me, that if you have what may be regarded as a fair average, some schools belonging to the Wesleyan Body would lose from £200 to £500 a year. Now, we know the sacrifices made by the Wesleyans in the cause of education, but I doubt if they could bear this additional burden. Indeed I am quite sure that schools of this class would lose their high character or be entirely closed. I believe they would be entirely closed; for they are intended for members of the Wesleyan community, who desire for their children the best education of an elementary character, and when this is no longer offered the children will be withdrawn and the schools must be closed. The Vice President of the Council has alluded to the loss of fees, which he gave as £1,862,303 a year, and there would also be a sacrifice of £745,000 a year in voluntary contributions. I will not enlarge on this, because the right hon. Gentleman has made a full and complete statement from the financial point of view, and what he has said must have produced the conviction that the burden to be thrown upon the community would be of a very serious character. It is most doubtful whether the loss to education could be made good, whether the change would not entail a serious sacrifice to the cause of education. Much has been said of school attendance, and upon that matter we have some experience. Is the attendance in the United States, where there is free education, equal to the attendance in our schools? Now we have testimony of a most remarkable kind, which is buried in the Report of the Committee of Council, and has not received the attention it deserves. I refer to the Report upon the American Schools from Mr. Fitch. He says that the Reports of the American Commissioners of Education for 1887 shows the number of scholars on the roll in all the public schools to be 11,805,660, and the average daily attendance to be 7,571,416, or 64 per cent. In the Report of the English Committee of Council for last year, 4,635,184 children are included in the register of all elementary schools in England and Wales, with an average daily attendance of 3,527,381, or 76 per cent. Then when we come to consider the number of days of school attendance in the year, we find that our schools give 400 attendances in the year, but Mr. Fitch says in his Report that the American schools are opened less than half that number of times, so this difference entirely changes the proportion, and shows that the attendance in England is infinitely better than the attendance in the American schools. Then when we take the Reports from the Continent, I am not sure that in point of numbers the comparison is unfavourable to our attendance here. I have not had the opportunity of consulting the latest Returns from France recently, but if my recollection is at all correct school attendance there is far less satisfactory than it is in this country. I speak from recollections of the latest Returns issued within the last few days. We are told of educational progress on the Continent, and are asked to follow the example set by Continental States. No doubt in France and in Switzerland public schools are for the most part free, but if we examine the report of Mr. Matthew Arnold, to which reference has been made, and the Report of the Education Commissioners, we find that the system of free schools does not by any means universally obtain on the Continent. The Report says that in Holland there is a mixed system, some schools charging fees, others being free. In Wurtemberg, often quoted as a model State so far as education is concerned, the schools are rarely free; the fees varying from two shillings a year in the country to three and sixpence in the larger towns. These seem small fees; but the poverty of the people as compared with this country must be considered, and the principle remains the same, the schools are not free. In Saxony fees range from three-halfpence a week to one penny and three farthings a week in the country, and in towns from 12s. to 36s. a year according to the place and grade of the schools. In Dresden school fees are from 2½d. to 3¾d. a week. These figures show that, whether free education be good or bad, it is not universally adopted on the Continent even in those countries often cited to us as pioneers and models in matters of education. I might enlarge on the subject, as it affects the relations between parent and child. I believe myself that it is a good thing for family life that a child should know that his parent is making some sacrifice for his education. I believe it knits the family together, and induces that reverence on the part of the child towards the parent which every lover of good order and progress must desire. We have some testimony as to the effect of free education from the present Bishop of Manchester. For many years this distinguished prelate was Bishop of Melbourne, Australia, and from his acquaintance with free education there, he alleges its disadvantages in most impressive terms. My hon. Friend made reference to Mr. Matthew Arnold; and I confess I was somewhat struck by his reticence. He read us an interesting page from Mr. Arnold's Report, and I followed his reading, but my hon. Friend omitted the concluding sentence. After Mr. Arnold says that on political grounds in opposition to educational grounds it might be desirable to adopt free education, he makes this statement—

"Only it will be impossible to organise it with the State limiting its concern, as it does now, to the popular school only; and this can be so palpably shown to be a matter of common justice that one need not despair of bringing even the popular judgment to recognise it."

Therefore the statement of Mr. Arnold, quoted by the hon. Member who opened this debate, amounts to this: that we should not estimate the expense of popular education only; but investigate the whole field well, and consider the burden of bringing upon ourselves the cost of all grades of education from the top of the ladder to the bottom. This is confirmed by what happened in the Swiss Canton of St. Gall in the course of last year, when higher or continuation schools were made entirely free. Up to that time there had been a small charge for those schools, but this was entirely abandoned, and you have free schools in Switzerland from the highest to the lowest. This confirms the contention that you cannot stop with elementary schools alone; if you have a system of free schools you must apply that freedom to the whole educational system. There is one more authority I desire to cite—it has not yet been quoted in the debate—the opinion of the Royal Commission—

"If, as we think, the provision of the due necessities of education as well as the necessities of life, is part of the responsibility incumbent upon a parent, it may well be believed that public contributions and private benevolence are already doing all that can safely be required in augmentation of the payments properly exacted from the parents. We are of opinion that the balance of advantage is in favour of maintaining the present system established by the Act of 1870, whereby parents who can afford it, contribute a substantial proportion of the cost of the education of their children in the form of school fees."

There we have the testimony of the Education Commission, and I believe I need not adduce further testimony than the weight of their authority in support of the views which I entertain. To one other point I desire to make reference—the religious question. There is great anxiety felt among the friends of religious education on this subject, and it is my privilege to have constant communication with them and to know their views. I am sure of this, that the sacrifices made by them, not during one generation only but through many generations, the self-denial as regards labour, the supply of funds without stint, the earnestness which they have shown in the cause of education should have won the gratitude of educationalists, who too often speak of these men as hindrances and obstacles in the way of education. We have now a system of voluntary schools and Board schools side by side, and of this I am thoroughly convinced, that it is the religious teaching in our denominational schools which makes in many cases School Board schools careful of this branch of education. If you, by destroying these voluntary schools, remove this competition, if you diminish or destroy this pressure, then I am afraid that in many cases the School Board schools of this country will fall into the same condition as that into which American schools have lapsed and will become exclusively secular schools. I am quite aware that we are informed that at Board schools in all cases there is some religious teaching; but we must carry our investigation one step further, and inquire a little more into detail. When we discover the character of the teaching we find it often is so meagre and so imperfect that we may well doubt whether it inculcates the slightest religious sentiment, cultivates a moral tone, or is of such a character as to make any permanent impression on the child's mind. I am grateful to the House for the opportunity of making these few imperfect and cursory remarks. I am quite aware they touch but a very small part of a very large question, but I am unwilling to occupy more time. I feel deeply on the subject as one who has worked long in the cause of popular education with an earnest desire that the system should be most efficient for its purpose, and that it should not lose that religious character which is at once its brightest ornament and its greatest source of strength.

(9.10.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): With a few words I desire to support the Motion of the hon. Member for Rotherham. I entirely endorse the statement made by my hon. Friend as to the widespread and general disappointment in the country that no reference has been made to this subject in the Gracious Speech from the Throne. A general expectation undoubtedly existed in the public mind prior to the assembling of Parliament with respect to this important question, an expectation not confined to one Party, but shared alike by Conservatives and Liberals. The hope undoubtedly was based upon the action of the Government last Session, the concessions made on this subject to Scotland, and also on the very important references to the subject made by Lord Salisbury in his speech at Nottingham in November last. Many of us had hoped that when we were invited to hear the Queen's Speech we should find reference to this subject, especially as it is considered on both sides of the House that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will this year — I am happy to think so—be in the possession of such a surplus as will enable him to deal very satisfactorily with the matter. Naturally, if it is to be touched at all, it must be approached at a time when there is reasonable prospect that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will be in a position financially to make this great concession. I therefore endorse fully the statement made by my hon. Friend as to the universal disappointment felt in the country at the absence of all mention of this subject in the Queen's Speech. I wish also to enter my very solemn and emphatic protest against the notion that seems to have obtained credence, and has found expression in several speeches during this debate, that we who support the principle of free education and the establishment at once of universal School Boards are less careful of the religious tuition of our children than the gentlemen who support the voluntary principle. I was surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council, in his excellent and temperate speech this evening, argue that supporters of free education also seek the abolition of voluntary schools. I think that very few hon. Members who remembering the services rendered to education in this country by voluntary schools will be prepared to get up and say it is a desirable thing that these schools should be abolished. We all acknowledge the useful work which voluntary schools have accomplished, and are not prepared to ask for their abolition. All that is claimed at the moment is that, if you have free education, it should combine with it a certain amount, a reasonable amount of representative control, and I venture to say that is a very reasonable request put forward by the supporters of free education. The hon. Baronet the Member for the Evesham Division (Sir R. Temple) has spoken warmly in praise of the efficiency of voluntary schools, by which I suppose he means Church of England schools, and declared, if I understood him rightly, that there was nothing like them to be found in the whole of Scotland. Well, if we are to take the amount of Government grant that is earned by the schools of Scotland and compare it with the grants earned by Church of England Schools, if we take the amount per head as a test of efficiency and of the intelligence of the children that are taught in the schools, I think the hon. Baronet has not very much to congratulate himself upon, for I find that in 1888 the amount of Government grant earned per head of children taught in the Church of England schools was something like 16s. 6d., but in the Board Schools of Scotland the amount earned per head was 18s. 2d., or practically 10 per cent. more than the Church of England schools. It seems to me that our present system is one that operates most heavily upon the working classes at the time when they can least afford to bear the strain, at the period when the parents are advancing in years, and the requirements of the family are growing heavier year by year. By our present compulsory system we entail on the head of the family a double hardship, we compel him to send his children to school—and rightly so I think—at a time when they might be put to some sort of employment and thereby help the family exchequer. I say we rightly compel attendance at school, because undoubtedly the State is widely and deeply interested in the education of every member of the community, but I do not think it is just to compel the parent to forego the assistance the child's employment would afford, and to pay school fees at the same time. Furthermore, in my opinion our system of granting remissions from the payment of school fees tends to offer a bounty to improvidence, intemperance, and wastefulness. It is not the thrifty, the honest and industrious workman who benefits by the remission. These men never ask for remission except perhaps in cases of the greatest emergency; it is the improvident, spendthrift class who are benefited, and in justice to the more prudent and economical among the working classes you ought at once, when you have the opportunity, to concede free elementary education. It is said (I do not know what truth there may be in the rumour) that the Government intend to make some remissions in taxation, but speaking as one who is in close touch and sympathy with the working classes, I can say that however greatly some may desire to have what has been called a "free breakfast table," I believe, if a plébiscite were taken among the industrial classes of the country to-morrow on the subject, that as between a free breakfast table and free education, their verdict would be in favour of the latter. I entirely disagree with the statement that has been made repeatedly during the course of this debate that if school fees were abolished the attendance at school would not be increased. I hold an entirely opposite opinion, and what is more, I believe that one effect of the abolition of fees would be that the children would be kept longer at school than they now are, and by that means we may in some degree relieve the congested districts, and help to solve many of those social questions that are staring us in the face, and which will have to be dealt with by the House in a vigorous way sooner or later. Keeping children longer at school will help towards the solution of important social problems looming in the immediate future. I support this principle of free education also because of the economy which will be effected in the teaching time at school. I may refer for a moment to my own experience.

Mr. Fenwick

For many years I was very closely identified with teaching in my own district, and though in that particular district we were somewhat favoured, as the great bulk of school fees was deducted from the miners' wages paid at the colliery office, yet, notwithstanding that, a certain portion of the fees from children attending school had to be collected, and I can testify to the great amount of time that had to be wasted by the employment of pupil teachers in this collection during school hours. With the free system this time will be saved for educational purposes. For these and other reasons with which I do not care to trouble the House at the moment, I shall certainly have much pleasure in voting in support of the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

*(9.25.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): Some apology is, I think, due to the House from anybody who takes part in this discussion, for surely it is an abuse of the forms of the House which is taking place now. I understand—and I have now had an experience of many years in the House—that the object of moving an Amendment to the Address is in order to call attention to some urgent matter not otherwise to be dealt with, and is it not an abuse of language to say that this question of the remission of school fees is one of these urgent matters? First of all, I deny that it is at all urgent—of course I know that there I differ from hon. Gentlemen on the other side, but we cannot agree upon everything—but even if it is urgent, is this the only opportunity that hon. Gentlemen could find to urge their opinions on the attention of the House? Is there no other means than by this endless protraction of debate on the Address to bring such questions before Parliament? If so, then the sooner we re-model our Parliamentary system the better. I know that the condition of affairs here has made us a laughing stock outside the House. The debates on the Address are not read, because they are regarded more or less as protracted uninteresting talk. Only the other day I heard a gentleman not connected with the House say, "Nobody cares to read the debates now, for we think they are only a device for protracting time and obstructing the ordinary business of Parliament." I think we have almost reached the limit of discussion, but of course if hon. Gentlemen think it incumbent upon them to follow the line they have taken, we must say something in reply, but I will not occupy time with any lengthened remarks. If we were to follow the examples of the hon. Gentlemen who moved and seconded this Amendment, we might speak for a week, travelling over the whole ground of elementary education, of intermediate education, of Welsh education, of the rival merits of voluntary and Board schools. In fact, the whole education question has been touched upon, I admit, with great ability, but as you, Mr. Speaker, would, if you were free to speak your opinion, admit in a manner entirely out of accordance with ancient Parliamentary practice. I am not going to follow that example. The Amendment expresses regret that as free education in elementary schools is granted in Scotland, no reference has been made in the Queen's Speech to legislative proposals for giving similar advantages to the rest of the United Kingdom; that is, the House is invited to accept a simple proposition in favour of the remission of school fees. Now, I have two things to say: First of all, I differ from the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken as to the feeling of the working classes on this subject. It may seem presumptuous on my part, for the hon. Member (Mr. Fenwick), of course directly represents an important section of the miners in the North of England; but I fancy I know something of the feeling among the working classes in London and in the South of England, and I do not believe that the élite of the working classes there make this demand at all. I am certain that the better part of the working classes in London and in the South prefer to pay for the education of their own children. I challenge contradiction of that statement, and why is it my conviction? I do not believe that the working classes and we are of a different stock, or of different flesh and blood. I prefer to pay the cost of education for my children, and I believe they prefer to pay fees for the education of their children. To say that 2d. or 3d. a week is more than an ordinary working man with good wages can pay is more than hon. Gentlemen opposite will induce the House to believe. That is not the real motive for this movement. The motive is not the remission of fees. The real object is to abolish all voluntary schools. I have been struck to-night by the change of tone of hon. Members opposite. Nevertheless, we all know that there has been a determined assault out of doors on the 'continued existence of voluntary schools. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow said recently that nothing should induce him to give one penny to schools which were not under popular control. Here the mask was thrown off. What does it mean? Can the voluntary system continue to live if put under what is called popular control? The right hon. Gentleman knows very well that the two things cannot co-exist. What is asked is that in return for State assistance the ratepayers should have the right of nominating representatives on the management of the schools. What have the ratepayers got to do with assistance from the State? I do not see many Gentlemen from Ireland present; but what would they say to the ratepayers nominating managers for the Roman Catholic schools? Would they like to have the representatives of the ratepayers brought in to manage their schools? No; they would not tolerate it for a moment. It is because hon. Members and their Friends think that the Church of England is weak—and in this I believe they are mistaken—that our voluntary schools are attacked. I believe the working classes are as ready as they always have been to pay a reasonable and fair sum for the education of their children, and as I believe further that the voluntary schools are an integral part of the education of the country, I am determined to defend them. It has been said that the upper and middle classes are not ashamed to receive assistance in the education of their children, and that therefore we ought not to grudge assistance to the children of other classes. But I traverse that directly. I have accepted in the person of my own sons the assistance of endowments at schools and colleges, but it has amounted to nothing like the cost of education. On the other hand, we do at this moment assist the education of the working classes. We do not ask them to pay anything like the whole cost of the education of their children;

we only give them an opportunity to do what they have done in the past—to contribute a small share of the total cost. It must not be forgotten that the great part of the education of the children of the working classes is paid out of the finances of the country. Reasonable men do not object to paying these small school fees. There must always be a residuum; there will always be certain people who, through misfortune, accident, or their own fault, are unable to pay for the education of their children, but the State provides for them. We are always met by the argument that the present system of remitting fees is pauperising and degrading in its effects. But if a man cannot maintain his family he must go to the State, and why should it be more degrading to ask for the remission of school fees than to apply for assistance to support a family? But the members of the Royal Commission say that if it is mixed up with the pauper element, they are quite ready to adopt some means to remove the taint. I do not admit that there is any degradation, but we do not wish to cast any stigma on these unfortunate people. We are always met in this matter by the remark that there is free education over the Channel in France, Germany, and Switzerland; but I have a lurking feeling that the British workman is after all a superior man to the working classes on the Continent. He prefers to manage his own affairs to having them managed for him. He prefers to look after his own children. Hon. Gentlemen seem to think that free education would improve the education of the British workman. Is there any proof of that? Where are the best working men in the world to be found? Who are the men to whom an employer of labour goes when he wants his work well done? Is it not the British workman who can turn out better work than anybody else? Cannot that be said to be the result of the education of himself and his forefathers. That argument, then, falls to the ground. It may be an old-fashioned sentiment which I entertain, but I prefer to continue on the grounds on which we and our forefathers have acted for so many years.

(7.10.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Until the hon. Member for Oxford rose I thought we had had an excellent debate, conducted with great moderation on all sides. But the hon. Gentleman has advanced the statement that this Motion is an abuse of the Rules of the House. I can hardly think the leader of the House will agree in that, inasmuch as the other night he said the Government could not deal with this question of free education, as public opinion had not sufficiently expressed itself, but we should have some discussion in the House which would tend to enlighten that public opinion. Was there ever a case before where a Prime Minister distinctly promised that a great measure should be introduced, and where he distinctly declared that the pledge should be redeemed if the Chancellor of the Exchequer had a surplus? That was the sole condition. If, said the noble Lord, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus the thing shall be done. How can anyone complain, then, that this Amendment is moved when the subject has been suddenly dropped from the Queen's Speech, and we are told instead that public opinion has not yet made up its mind on this question? We are told the working classes have not demanded it. I believe there is no question upon which the working classes are so unanimous as this one of free education. I am afraid there are not many of the working classes in the constituency represented by the Member who has just spoken; but I can tell the hon. Gentleman this—that he represents more men who have received assisted education than any other man in this House, for although he traverses the statement that the higher and middle classes receive assisted or free education, the total amount of endowments which go almost exclusively to the middle and upper classes is two millions a year, and the greater part of this is intended for the poor. The hon. Member opposite says:—“Your real object is not the abolition of fees, but the abolition of voluntary schools.” I maintain that that is an unjust accusation. We have no wish to attack voluntary schools—that is to say, really voluntary schools, for there are a good many schools that are called voluntary that are not really so. The hon. Gentleman opposite has sat on a Royal Commission; did he ask how many voluntary schools have no subscriptions? I remember that when I was at the Education Department, 12 per cent. of voluntary schools had not one farthing of subscription, and I believe that a good many of them made money out of the grant. How can those schools be said to be voluntary schools? I recognise the noble sacrifices that have been made in past times, especially by the clergy, for education; the clergy, in fact, have been much more generous than squires and those who could better afford it. When I was at the Education Office I knew of many and many a clergyman who had plunged himself into debt and difficulties because he wanted to maintain his schools and keep out the School Board. Those men deserve sympathy, and I am sure that the House would wish to deal generously and reasonably with them. It is not fair to use these old arguments of the National Society, now, I believe, abandoned by it. The hon. Member told us that he was tired of the foreign argument. But are we not tired of foreign competition? Do we not see the excellence and variety of the foreign workmen, and do we not wish to put our own workmen on an equality with them? We know that the British workman is one of the best workmen in the world—if not the best—if we only trained him fairly and gave him the same chance as the foreign one has. But why do hon. Gentlemen opposite try to deprive the British workman of this chance, and why, for the last five years, have they done so little for him in point of education? What about the working men on the other side of the Tweed? Are they degraded by the measure of last year? The hon. Member says that if they were convinced that such a measure as we are advocating would do something for public education they would support it. I will give the hon. Member an argument which I think he will find it rather difficult to answer. In the Report of the Scotch Education Department for 1889-90, signed by Lord Cranbrook and Lord Lothian, it is said that—

Those are the motives which animated the Government in giving that great boon to Scotland. Then we are told that though it may do for Scotland it would be a very bad thing for England. But the whole question has been given up, the thing has come to an end, it does not require argument; when you have given free education to Scotland you cannot keep it from England. I would like to call the attention of the House to a speech delivered not very long ago by a very important Member of the Government. In December, 1888, when the hon. Member for Aberdeen, who gained this great victory for Scotland, moved that the share of the Probate Duties allocated to Scotland should be applied to free education, he was answered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who said—

“I must say that it would clearly have been impossible to adopt in Scotland the principle of free education without extending it at the same time to England and Ireland. I do not think that the Government could have proposed a measure for remitting school fees in Scotland without imposing the greatest possible grievance on England and Ireland, and creating a powerful demand for a similar measure.”

But you have done it. The Government have remitted school fees in Scotland, and have, according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, imposed the greatest possible grievance on England. What answer is there to that statement? But how long since was it that the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House promised that English and Scotch education should be treated alike? I am almost tempted to make a quotation from another leader of the House, and say that we want to be treated with equality and similarity. It is a strange thing at this day that England should be placed in a worse position than Scotland. I think that there are very few people in this country who have realised how striking is the difference in regard to education north and south of the Tweed. My right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council said that Scotland stood in a different position to England. But he did not tell the House that out of 3,126 public schools in Scotland there are only 85 where any fees at all are paid in compulsory standards, and only 44 really fee-paying schools; and it is provided that wherever there is a fee-paying school there must be free places for every child. In this respect we want to be placed on perfect equality with Scotland. The Vice President was pressed by my hon. Friend the Member for the Evesham Division to take up the old non possumus arguments of the National Society. But I believe that even the National Society has changed its methods. A friend of mine obtained from the secretary of the Society some of those pamphlets which once fell as thick as snow over the country, and the arguments contained in them seem to be pretty strong; they might have been composed by the hon. Member for Oxford himself. They say—

“The first peril is that if the school were free there is a danger of the education becoming entirely secular; secondly, there is the danger that its management would be placed in the hands of a locally elected body; the third peril is that religious teaching would be squeezed out, and the children would grow up without religious teaching. There is danger to religion and royalty, danger to piety and public safety, danger to the altar and to the throne.”

Then reference is made to “The perils of the last proposals of a dangerous and unprincipled statesmanship”— which statesmen on the opposite Bench want to adopt,

“under the cover of free education, and the result of these evil devices will be seen in the growth of a godless and faithless population.”

So it goes on. A friend of mine who has written on free education was very anxious to get the National Society's view on free education, a number of these leaflets, which played an important part in the elections of 1885-6, being circulated by the thousands. My friend wrote to the secretary. This is the answer he received—

“Dear Sir, by book post I send various papers on the subject of free education. Although the society has no need to change its views on the subject, the recent declaration of the Prime Minister in Nottingham has considerably modified the situation, and the leaflets are not now being circulated.”

This is just one month old. They were withdrawn very recently, after the pronouncement at Nottingham. What was considered the daring unprincipled statesmanship, which my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham and so many of us supported in 1884-5-6, disappeared immediately Lord Salisbury made his declaration.

Mr. J. G. Talbot

The hon. Member for Evesham rather startled me by his disparaging remarks about Swiss education. I think I know as much about Swiss education as I know about English education, and I entirely differ from the hon. Baronet. Let me recommend my hon. Friend to read the book of Mr. Adams, late minister at Berne. The hon. Gentleman says that the children do not go to school for six months in the year in Switzerland; but Mr. Adams says that by the Federal pact of 1877 no child can be employed in mills or on public works until he reaches the age of 15, and, in the rural districts, the holidays are fixed with due regard to harvest and the tourist season—extending to from eight to 10 weeks and not to half the year. And, in fact, Mr. Adams speaks of the Swiss schools more enthusiastically than I or any Gentleman in this House has done. I differ, too, from the hon. Baronet in his statement that Scotland has nothing to show comparable to our English voluntary schools. Education in Scotland, in my opinion, is as far superior to the education of England as Swiss education is superior to that of Scotland in many respects. I know that some voluntary schools are as good as money can make them—I wish there were more of them but many of them are as bad as they can be. The very careful Report of the Committee of Management of the School Board of London, dated July, 1889, throws an interesting light upon the question of the condition of the children attending the London Board Schools. It states that during the year the number of children in average attendance was 341,495. Of these 43,888, or 12·8 per cent., were returned as habitually attending school in want of food. Only less than half of the 42,000 are at present provided for, leaving 21,739 children attending school who, notwithstanding the efforts made, do not obtain enough food. The Report states that 130,759 individual children, that is 32·4 per cent., or practically one-third of the total average attendance, had their fees remitted during some part of the year ending March, 1889. Imagine an inquiry into the circumstances of over 130,000 children. Imagine the inquisitorial investigation—the poor mothers obliged to attend the School Board and tell their pitiable tales—and then say whether this does not require any advance in the direction of free education. I say you will have done a great deal to instil self-respect into the minds of the people when they have schools of their own to which they can send their children without these investigations. What is the condition of the voluntary schools? They cannot remit fees. I believe the Catholics pay the fees of more than 12 per cent. of the children attending their schools. Everyone must admit that the Catholics form the poorest part of our population. But their schools stand well. I am astonished how well they do stand. In some of our large towns in the north of England they stand better than our Church schools. In Preston, for instance, the Catholic schools stand better than the Church schools. I think the hon. Member will bear me out on that point.

MR. MUNDELLA: Then let the House look at the number of children sent to Boards of Guardians to get remission of fees. It is impossible, so far, to ascertain the exact amount paid by Guardians for fees, but this Return shows something over £60,000 a year, which at 5s. per head per annum gives 240,000 children whose parents must attend the Boards of Guardians to obtain remission of fees. If it is degrading to the Scotch to bring them in contact with the machinery of pauperism, surely you should do more for the relief of the English children. The Vice President of the Council has said that the Government is not to be drawn. The Government has not to be drawn. It has already pronounced. They have withdrawn the case, Lord Salisbury having given a distinct promise that free education shall be conceded immediately the Chancellor of the Exchequer has a surplus to enable the Government to do it, and it is due whenever the next Budget comes on. The Chancellor of the Exchequer himself is as fully pledged as the Prime Minister, for on December 19, 1888, when the question of free education for Scotland was first mooted, he said:—

“ I must say it would have been clearly impossible to adopt in Scotland the principle of free education without extending it at the same time to England and Ireland. I do not think the Government could have proposed a measure for remitting school fees in Scotland without imposing the greatest possible grievance upon England and Ireland, and creating a powerful demand for a similar measure.”

That is from Hansard, Dec. 19th, 1889. Under these circumstances I do not see how, when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer comes to deal with his surplus he can fail to grant free education I do not wish to go into the question of intermediate schools, because I think we can hardly drag that subject into this debate; but I say that, if we are to have free schools—and we shall have them—we cannot have them without at the same time admitting public management. The right hon. Gentleman the Vice President held up to the House the bugbear of what would be the fatal consequences of the abolition of voluntary schools. But no one has proposed such a thing. Did Lord Salisbury suggest it when he spoke of free education? The fact is that nobody has ever dreamt of such a thing. But I say it will be a bad day for the voluntary schools when it is held to be necessary for their existence that the working classes should be deprived of this boon of free education. The argument that free education is possible in Scotland but not in England because of the interests in the voluntary schools would tell very severely against these voluntary schools in the mind of the English working man, and he would demand why, under such circumstances, they should be continued to his disadvantage. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that 76 per cent. of the English schools are voluntary schools. Does he not know that that statement is a little misleading? There are not 76 per cent. of the total number of children in those schools; while it should be added that the voluntary schools include the undenominational British schools. If regard is had to these things, we find there are 2,100,000 children in those schools already, which would make a considerable difference in the right hon. Gentleman's computation. Again, with regard to the maintenance of the voluntary schools, not a small portion of the voluntary subscriptions contributed to their support is, after all, raised out of the compulsory rates, taken from the pockets of the working men. The right hon. Gentleman has said that at least £28,000,000 will be the cost of new buildings required to replace the voluntary schools; but if that be so, I ask what is to be done with the buildings already used for school purposes under the voluntary system? I am glad to know that many of the clergy are not of the same mind as hon. Members opposite on this question. Many of them have expressed their desire that the schools should come under public management, and the wise words of the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Percival, and many others, show that the clergy are ready to meet us half way in the matter, the Government undertaking the other half. Some of the ablest statements I have seen in favour of free education have recently come from quarters whence they were little to be expected. I hold in my hand a series of articles published in a provincial newspaper under the mystical initials "A.S.E.C." Those articles are strongly in favour of free education, and show plainly to the clergy of the Church of England and the public that there is no danger to be apprehended from the adoption of this principle. They also assert that how free education can prejudicially interfere with religious education is difficult for anyone to imagine. It is an open secret that the author of these letters is the Assistant Secretary of the Education Commission. I should like, in conclusion, to say a word in reference to the question of public management. I say that where the school is intended for all it should be managed by the representatives of the whole community; at the same time, the schools of any section of the community, such as the Catholics or the Jews, might continue to receive support under the management of that section, as in Scotland. If we are to have free education it must not be partial; it must be free from top to bottom, and be brought within the reach of every child and every parent.

(10.25.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Reference has been made in the course of the debate, by speakers on both sides of the House, to the opinions which I have expressed elsewhere upon this subject. I confess that I have always taken a deep interest in the matter, and have even taken a somewhat prominent part in the agitation which I hoped would lead to the establishment of the principle. At the outset I desire to congratulate the friends of education on the advance which the question has made. I remember very well on my first entry into political life, when I and some of my friends took this question up, that at that time we were in a miserable minority. My hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for the Bordesley Division of Birmingham (Mr. Jesse Collings), who certainly has done as much as any man in popularising the system of National Education, brought the question of free schools before the House of Commons at the time the late Mr. Forster introduced his Elementary Education Act, and on that occasion failed to take with him into the Lobby more than 60 Members. In 1885, coming down later, matters were not much better for us. That was the date of the unauthorised programme, of which free schools formed an important item. I do not think I am over-stating the matter when I say that if we had attempted to take any vote of the House at that time upon the question we should have had the Conservative Party almost to a man against us, and only a minority of the Liberal Party with us. When my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian issued his address to the electors, he referred specially to the question of free education; and I must say—though in no spirit of complaint, because the right hon. Gentleman at that time represented the opinion of the majority of the Party he led—that he gave me very poor comfort in that manifesto. He stated many objections—very forcible objections—to any system of free schools, and wound up his comment on the proposal by saying that it was not a question of practical politics, in effect relegating it to the dim and distant future. That was the situation only four years ago. May not, then, those who have been the consistent friends of education congratulate themselves upon the change of the position? We find now that the Liberal Party are practically unanimous in favour of free education; and that the Conservative Party are pledged, as far as they can be pledged by the declaration of the Ministry in this House, to establish free education at the earliest possible date. My right hon. Friend who has just sat down has amused the House by reference to some arguments that were used against free education five or ten years ago. Is it worth while now to go back upon the past? The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the National Society have withdrawn some of their circulars; but has he withdrawn some of his former statements? I do not make it a matter of accusation against my hon. Friend or against hon. Members on either side of the House that on this matter they have changed their opinions. It is a conversion—one of the most wonderful conversions that has taken place in a political matter at any time; but it is a conversion in the direction of progress, and it has been brought about not by interest, but by argument and reason. We have had an experience of educational work, which I think has brought conviction into many minds which at one time were full of suspicion of a proposal so Radical as they thought this to be. I sincerely congratulate myself and the House on the fact that we have arrived at this point—that the majority, not only of the Liberal Party, but of the Conservative Party, have accepted the principle. If that be the case, it is not really worth while to devote very much time to arguments in favour of or against the principle. I confess I was disappointed with the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple). I thought that conviction must have come to his mind also. I am sorry he should have tried to hold back the Government, of which he is one of the most loyal supporters, from a course which would redound to their infinite credit; but in that effort I do not think my hon. Friend will be successful. I do not think they can be restrained. The arguments used by my hon. Friend are really now old-fashioned and out of place. Four years ago we might have expected to hear that the independence of the parent would be interfered with if we established free schools; but when my hon. Friend tells us that already in the Metropolis seven-eighths of the expenses of education are now paid by the State, I do not think that he need be so careful about this miserable fraction of independence—this one-eighth of parental responsibility that is now left. According to my hon. Friend's view, if he be logically right, the voluntary schools should not retain the seven-eighths now paid by the State, but allow the whole expense of education to be borne by the parent. On the other hand, we maintain that not only is the independence of the parent not in question, but that what is really in question is the responsibility and the duty of the State. We say that education is required not in the interests of the parent. It is mainly required in the interests of the children, and though it may be the interest of the parent to secure the interests of the children his personal interest is in the opposite direction. We say that the real interest in the matter is the interest of the community that every one of its future citizens shall be educated and qualified to take his part in the government of the State. We maintain that if this be the interest of the community it is the obligation of the whole community to provide the expense. Further, we say that a parent is not relieved from his share of responsibility, but that he takes that share, not as an individual, not as a parent, but as a member of the community. He has to pay his share, whatever it may be, in the shape of rates and taxes, by which the expenses of education are provided, as a citizen and not as a parent. My hon. Friend (Sir R. Temple) has given another reason against free education—one of the old reasons with which we are all familiar—that it would conduce to irregular attendance. All I can say is that if that is the experience of the London School Board it is contradicted by universal experience in every country in which free education has been adopted. In America, where free education was adopted, the immediate result was an enormous increase in the attendance, and the same was the case in Australia. In Birmingham, when I was Chairman of the School Board there, we were unable to establish free education, because Mr. Forster's Act prevented it; but we almost compelled the Education Department—for we used something more than persuasion—to allow the establishment of schools in which the fees were reduced to a minimum. This curious result followed, that in the case of every school in which the fees were reduced from 3d. to 1d., within 12 months the attendance increased three-fold, so that the receipts were almost the same as when the higher fee was in force. It may be said that this result was obtained at the expense of the voluntary schools. Well, I had a census taken within a certain area around the schools, with the result of showing that the voluntary schools in the neighbourhood had also increased their attendance, though not to the same extent as the Board schools. I may also quote the case of the Manchester Free School, which was worked side by side with the parish schools of Manchester before the passing of the Education Act of 1870, and where it was found that the average attendance was much larger than it was in the voluntary schools. What is the result of the experience of every School Board with regard to every child who comes to school at the present time without the fee? Either the child has to be admitted without fee or sent back. If it be admitted without fee, the fee is never obtained; but if sent back it will probably not make its appearance again for the rest of the week, even if it comes back to school at all until compulsion is brought to bear on the parent. I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, this question of free schools is more important in an educational point of view even than compulsion. If I had to choose between free schools and compulsion, I would choose free schools, because I believe that they will bring more children to school than any amount of compulsion. But, after all, what I want to impress upon the House is that, practically, the argument is concluded. Some hon. Members may still think that free schools will be attended with mischief; but I do not think there is one Member of the House who does not believe that free education is a question of the immediate future. The principle of free schools has been accepted by the country, and I believe the experience of every hon. Member in his own constituency will bear me out in that opinion. The immediate question before us is not whether free schools shall come, but by whom they shall come, how they shall come, and when they shall come. These are the questions to which the practical attention of the House should now be directed. This is the chief value of the discussion which has been raised by the Amendment; and I hope it will assist the Government in what I believe to be their settled intention to carry the principle into effect. In my opinion—it is more than an opinion, for I believe it is a matter than cannot be disputed—there are only three ways in which free schools can be established. Let me first deal with a preliminary point. Funds have to be raised to meet the expense. Expressing my own opinion individually, I think they can only come from the Imperial Exchequer. If I am right, if the principle I have endeavoured to lay down—which I believe to be the principle on which free schools can alone be defended, namely, that it is a national question—can be defended, then it is the nation, and not the locality, that is bound to provide the expenses. Supposing that to be granted, there are only three methods by which the matter can be settled. Before I state what those three methods are I will point out to the House the fact that the real obstacle is our old friend—religious distinctions. Upon the point of the continued existence of the voluntary system and of denominational schools there is an issue between the Government and the Opposition. The Government have stated, in the most unmistakable terms, that they will do nothing to weaken the voluntary system. The Opposition want to destroy the voluntary system. [Opposition cheers and counter cheers.] I perceive that there is a difference of opinion among the Opposition on that point. I expected it, and I do not wish to mis-state the matter at all; but I believe that the opinion of the majority of the Opposition is that the time has come when denominational schools should be abolished, and when there should be substituted for them a general system of free Board schools. That is the really important issue between the two sides of the House. I have said that there is a difference of opinion in the Opposition on this point, and the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has stated that it is far from his intention to abolish voluntary schools.

Well, when we come to consider the specific proposal which the right hon. Gentleman has made, we shall see how far his desire to retain voluntary schools is assured. He proposes to take away from voluntary schools everything for which subscriptions in the voluntary schools are given, and he imagines that the subscriptions will come in when the object for which they are given is entirely destroyed. But there is another section of the Opposition whose opinion I am curious about on this particular point. The strongest supporters of denominational schools are the members of the Roman Catholic Church, to which most of the Members from Ireland belong. I am curious to see whether in the division that will take place on the question those hon. Members are going to vote with their Church or with their Party. I am sure it is a matter of perfect indifference to me what they do; but it is a matter of great curiosity. And now I will proceed to consider the different methods which might be adopted. And I believe I can show that some of them tend in the direction of the desire of the majority of the Opposition, whilst others might be accepted without interfering with the object of the majority of the supporters of the Government. We might establish a partial system of free schools by allowing every Board school to become free, and by increasing the grant to Board schools in proportion to efficiency. Under this system the voluntary schools would be left as they are, and would have no additional grant. Therefore, the adoption of this method would mean the absolute extinction of voluntary schools. What would happen? It would be ridiculous to suppose that you could stop there. You could not allow Board schools and create free schools without giving the choice to all parents of sending their children to the Board schools. You must then follow that up by establishing Board schools in every parish, and you must give to every parent the choice between the voluntary school with a fee and the Board school without a fee. Knowing what human nature is, I have no doubt that there would be an end of voluntary schools. It would be impossible, in a great proportion of cases, for the voluntary schools to maintain their existence in face of the superior temptations that would be offered at the Board schools. Another proposal is that additional grants should be given to all schools, voluntary schools and Board schools alike, and that the change in the case of voluntary schools should be coupled with popular representation. That is the proposal of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. Acland), which finds favour with the right hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella.) But what does it mean? What is meant by popular representation on the management of the voluntary schools? The right hon. Member for Sheffield means by it popular control, which is a very different thing from popular representation, which was all that was referred to by the hon. Member for Rotherham. If by popular representation is meant that in the event of an increased grant being made to the voluntary schools some public authority, such as the School Board or the District Council, should be entitled to send a representative on to the School Committee, the step would be very desirable. The advantage would be that public opinion would be brought to bear upon the School Committees, while their independence would not be interfered with. Their power would remain undiminished, but abuses could be prevented. But I do not conceal from myself that this popular representation would not meet the views of my hon. Friend who moved the Resolution, or of the majority of the Opposition, those to whom I have attributed the intention of ultimately abolishing and destroying the voluntary system. What they want—what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield thinks is a very moderate proposition—is popular control, that the voluntary School Committees should accept a majority of popular representatives, that to these representatives should be given the full control of the schools, and that the voluntary subscribers to these schools should give up all power into the hands of their new colleagues. Why, this proposal is on the face of it ridiculous. I do not say it is undesirable; but I say it would be ridiculous to suppose that the supporters of voluntary schools would accept any such plan. The proposal, in short, like the first which I examined, is a proposal for the extinction of the voluntary system. Very well, that is a practically intolerable proposition. I ask hon. Gentlemen if they have considered what that means? The Vice President of the Council explained his view of the new burdens which would be laid on the taxpayer if this policy were accepted. My right hon. Friend has criticised the figures of the Vice President. Well, I do not agree, I admit, with the figures of the Vice President, and I do not agree with the criticism of my right hon. Friend. I am going to attempt a calculation of my own, and submit it to the judgment of the House. Now, what is the state of the case? I prefer not to take the number of the voluntary schools, because an important question is the size of the voluntary schools. I propose to take the accommodation. The accommodation in these schools amounts to 3,659,251 places, about twice the accommodation provided by Board schools. Suppose the voluntary system were extinguished, would this accommodation still be available for purposes of education? The right hon. Member for Sheffield appeals to the patriotism of the managers of the voluntary schools, and proposes that they should hand over their schools for public uses, when the original purpose for which those schools have been erected no longer exists. For my part, I do not think that the managers would do this. It is highly unlikely that in the majority of cases these schools, which my right hon. Friend admits have been built, as to three-fourths of the cost, at private expense—it is highly improbable that these schools, built for a particular purpose, will be handed over to anybody for a different purpose. That is not to be expected, even if the terms of the trusts under which the schools were erected would admit of it. To force the managers to hand over the schools—Parliament, I suppose, can do anything—would be nothing less than confiscation. There is another point to be considered. We have had experience in Birmingham and other towns of voluntary schools handed over to the School Boards. In almost every case the buildings have been found to be inadequate for the purposes of the School Board, insufficiently equipped and provided. The result is that other premises have had ultimately to be procured. Well, if we extinguish the voluntary schools of the country we shall have to provide school buildings for 3,650,000 children. ["No, No!" and "Hear, hear!"] I hear an hon. Member say that accommodation will only have to be provided for the average attendance. I should think that hon. Member had never been a member of a School Board.

*MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I have been a member of a School Committee in London for 10 years.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is a very different thing.

*MR. CREMER: A School Board Attendance Committee working the Act.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That provision I affirm would at once be declared insufficient by the Education Department, for provision must be made for the greatest number of children that can attend. As everyone knows, the average attendance is a very different thing from the gross attendance. It is, in fact, less by 20 or 30 per cent. What would be the use of providing schools from which, on certain days when there was a full attendance, it would be necessary to turn many of the children away? Taking the accommodation that would have to be provided if the voluntary schools were done away with as the basis of my calculation, I find that the cost would be over £40,000,000. At £12 per head that would be the cost. Taking only the average attendance, which is 2,200,000, the expenditure would be £28,000,000. Take it at what you please. All I ask hon. Gentlemen to do is to recognise the consequences of the policy they recommend. That is not all. You lose the voluntary subscriptions. I do not care to enter into the point raised by the right hon. Gentleman as to whether those voluntary subscriptions are not to some extent in the nature of a voluntary tax. At all events, that source of income would be no longer forthcoming, and it amounts to £746,000. But there is another item of expense. The average cost of education in School Boards is 8s. 4d. per head of the average attendance higher than in the voluntary schools. I think that the education is better; but that does not touch the point. Now this sum of 8s. 4d. per head of the average attendance amounts to £934,000; therefore we should have to provide from the rates, if we wiped out the voluntary schools to-morrow, not only a capital expenditure either of £28,000,000 as a minimum or £40,000,000 as a maximum, but an annual expenditure of £1,680,000 in addition to the present rates. Now, the present rates are £1,232,000. We should add 130 per cent. to the total amount of the present rates. I do not think I have ever posed as a friend of the denominational system. I have been regarded as one of its enemies. I do not know whether that is a fair position in which to place me ; but undoubtedly if I had to deal with a new system in this country, if I had a tabula rasa, I would infinitely prefer the system which prevails in America—a great national system—to this system of mixed voluntary and State-aided education. It is the duty of the State to provide for the education of the children, and I should be glad to see it undertaken by the State. But as a practical man I say I am not prepared. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] It does not much matter what my opinion is. [Renewed ironical cheers.] No ; I attach much more importance to your opinion than to my own. Therefore I ask you what is your opinion ? Are you prepared to go to your constituents and face this expenditure ? Are you prepared, honestly and frankly, to tell your constituents what is the practical result of the policy which in theory you approve and which I approve ? Are you prepared to tell them that there will be imposed upon them a capital cost of £30,000,000 sterling, and an annual expenditure of £1,680,000, in order to extinguish denominational schools ? I have dealt with two methods of providing free schools ; but there is a third method, not open to this objection, but open to other objections. The third method is this. You may make to all schools, voluntary as well as Board, a grant equivalent to the amount of the fees. Let us consider what are the objections to that proposal. The objection which I understand is taken by many educationists is that this would form an additional State endowment of denominational education—that it would increase the Government grant to the extent of the present fees. I maintain, however, that it is not an additional endowment. I maintain that it is the substitution of one endowment for another. I say that the fees, as they are at present provided, are a compulsory tax on a particular class of the community—the parents. I say that the additional grant would only be a compulsory tax on the whole community. I admit the incidence of the tax is slightly varied ; but I deny that the fees are any less a tax than the additional grant would be. If this principle of an equivalent grant were adopted we should leave the denominational question and the religious difficulty exactly where they are. We should not increase the power, the influence, the strength of the denominational system ; on the other hand, we should not weaken it in the slightest degree. I wish to treat these two questions on their merits, and I say that free schools are good things in themselves ; that they are desirable on grounds social and educational ; and that on those grounds they ought to be conceded. I express my own personal opinion that denominational schools are a bad thing ; but I say, at the same time, that I am willing to argue that question separately, altogether from the question of free schools, and that the question of free schools ought not to be prejudiced by this question of the existence of denominational schools. We ought to count on the support of hon. Gentlemen opposite for free schools, because we ought to say to them that in dealing with the question we do so without arrière pensée, and we are not endeavouring to use it as a lever to injure their denominational system. We are ready to deal with the denominational question separately, and to meet them frankly on that question when the opportunity arises ; but, in the meantime, we are dealing with the great social and educational question of free schools. I admit that there are other difficulties besides the objection to which I have referred. It would be very difficult in granting the principle of an equivalent contribution from the Government to the amount of the fees to distribute all that equivalent among the different schools. It would be impossible to avoid giving some schools more than they gain from the fees, while giving to other schools less than they gain ; and in that case the schools which got less would disappear, while the schools which got more would not be materially stronger than at present. I admit that there is considerable difficulty in this matter; but it seems to me to be a difficulty which has been overcome in practice in connection with Scottish education; and I cannot help thinking that it is a difficulty which the Government would overcome were they to devote their minds to the question. It ought not to stand in the way; and I would impress on hon. Members who are friends of the denominational system that it would be a most unwise thing were they to act as if the fate of the denominational system were bound up with resistance of this principle of free schools, which has been practically accepted by the majority of the nation. Of course, I have to decide what course I shall take on the Amendment. I wish that the Vice President of the Council (Sir W. Hart-Dyke) had made a little less of the difficulties in the way of free education and had made more of the advantages to the population which would follow from its adoption. But, at all events, the right hon. Gentleman said one thing which I hope will be emphasised, if necessary, or confirmed at least, by any other Member of the Government who addresses the House. The right hon. Gentleman said that the Government did not go back one iota from the declarations which have been made by the Prime Minister and by the leader of the House (Mr. W. H. Smith). Now, what are those declarations? They are, in effect, that the Government accept the principle of free education, and will deal practically by legislation with the question of free education as soon as they have the opportunity. Is it, then, fair to say that the Government have the opportunity this Session? Is there any hon. Member who will say on his honour that he believes the Government will have time to deal with this complicated subject, as well as with the other business which is down for them to deal with? If the majority of the House believes that the Government will have time to deal with this matter, by all means let them vote for that Amendment. I do not believe they will have time. I do not believe that hon. Gentlemen will give them time. I believe the matter is entirely in the hands of my hon. Friends on this side of the House. If they give that favourable and impartial consideration to the other measures of the Government which they always promise and which they sometimes perform, I believe there will be time for this question of free education. But if the experience of previous Sessions is to be repeated there will not be time during the present Session to deal with this matter, and under those circumstances I think the Government were right not to mention in the Queen's Speech a matter as a subject for legislation which they and the House know hon. Members on this side of the House will not allow them to deal with. The Amendment professes to express regret that the Government are unable to deal with the question this Session. I share in this regret, and if that were a Motion in the nature of a pious opinion expressed by hon. Members on a Tuesday or on a Friday evening on the Motion for Supply, I would be found voting with them; but hon. Members have adopted their own course, they have chosen to raise this question when it cannot be discussed upon its merits, when they have deliberately connected with it the existence of the Government. This is a vote of want of confidence, because hon. Members on this side have made it probable that the Government would be unable to deal this Session with a subject which they have pledged themselves to deal with on the earliest opportunity. I say I will not vote to displace a Government which is pledged to free education, in order to substitute for it a Government which is pledged only to postpone free education and many other important reforms to a project of constitutional change which must take two years, at least, to carry, and which may and, I believe, will take an absolutely indefinite time.

(11.17.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I was about to congratulate my right hon. Friend, for he and I have worked together for years in the cause of free education. [Ministerial laughter]. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite may laugh, but my right hon. Friend will not deny it. My right hon. Friend knows perfectly well that when he was at the head of the Birmingham Education League outside this House I was supporting him below the Gangway on the other side of the House. That is more than 20 years ago. My right hon. Friend knows also that in the campaign of 1885 I stood by his side for free education. Therefore, my right hon. Friend, at all events, will not deny what I have said. Well, I was going to congratulate my right hon. Friend upon being so early in sight of victory, but with the habit, which seems to be characteristic of him, he dashes from the lips of his friends the cup which he had previously offered. The doctrine which he has preached to-night is not the doctrine I learnt from him in the days of the Birmingham League. We heard then none of those passionate denunciations of popular control with which we have been favoured to-night, and which have been cheered from the opposite side of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I beg my right hon. Friend's pardon; he entirely and absolutely misrepresents me. I never said a word against popular control. I approve of it; but I pointed out that we could not have popular control and voluntary management in the same school.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But I am in the recollection of the House whether the whole argument of my right hon. Friend was not directed to induce the House not to give popular control on account of the expense which might attend it. My right hon. Friend says that the Opposition are unanimous for free education, and that the great majority of hon. Gentlemen opposite are in favour of it. He says that the conversion on this side of the House is very recent. I cannot agree with that assertion. I remember a very celebrated speech made by my right hon. Friend in 1885, when he pledged himself that he would take office in no Government which would not carry out free education. Well, but he satisfied himself with reference to the Government that he joined in 1885. My right hon. Friend is not the man to break a solemn pledge of that kind, and it therefore follows, as an explanation of his having joined the Government of 1886, that the Members of that Government were pledged to, and were about to carry out, free education.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: My right hon. Friend has appealed to me and I feel bound to answer. I do not understand whether my right hon. Friend intends to infer that the Government of 1886 was pledged to carry out free education; if so he is mistaken again. The Government of 1886 was pledged only to inquire into the subject.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Then what is the meaning of the melo-dramatic statement of my right hon. Friend that he would join no Government not pledged to free education?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am sorry to interrupt my right hon. Friend again, but I think his memory is not serving him accurately. I beg him to quote the words of the pledge he refers to. He will find that I did not pledge myself to refuse to join a Government which in terms was not pledged to carry out free education. I deny it.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I accept the denial of my right hon. Friend. I made the statement upon the strength of my own recollection, and that of my right hon. Friend by my side (Mr. J. Morley). But it appears that both I and my right hon. Friend were entirely mistaken. However, my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham being, as he says, a sincere friend of free education, and seeing that the Liberal Party is unanimous now, and was not before, in favour of free education, owing to him, and seeing that he has converted the great majority of the Conservative Party, has made a speech to-night which I will venture to say, by the ingenuity which is always conspicuous in the speeches of my right hon. Friend, has dealt the heaviest blow that could have been struck at the hopes of free educationists. He has exhausted the whole of his ingenuity and used his unrivalled powers to destroy that cause. Notwithstanding, he will not join a Government that is not pledged to free education.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I never said so.

SIR W. HARCOURT: But he will support a Government that will not pledge itself.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is pledged.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Pledged! What did the First Lord of the Treasury tell us to-night?

AN HON. MEMBER: Postponed.

SIR W. HARCOURT: And why is it postponed? Not on account of want of time or persistent opposition; it was a statement made to catch your cheers and to do as much mischief as possible to that unanimous opposition which was to carry free education, and if possible to injure its cause. How did my right hon. Friend set to work? He began by taunting the Irish Catholic Members, offering them a choice between Church interest and Party interest and appealing to their religious prejudices. But I hope the Irish Catholic Members will disappoint him. I hope that the ingenious manner in which he has endeavoured to secure their votes will not be successful. What is it he says on the subject of popular representation? I always thought he was a great advocate of popular representation. What is the view he desires to represent and support? That if a man, whether he be a squire or clergyman, makes a fractional contribution towards a school in a rural parish, he and he alone should have any voice in the management of that school. It was my opinion, until to-night, that my right hon. Friend attached the highest value to popular representation because it gives a voice to parents of children in the education of their children. That I understood was the Liberal principle on the subject of popular representation in school management, but that principle, which in theory my right hon. Friend still pretends to hold, he has endeavoured by every argument and figure he has used to destroy to-night. I cannot understand why he should think that popular representation would be so odious to managers of voluntary schools. I know many managers of voluntary schools who value and invite popular representation in the management. Then another blow that the right hon. Gentleman struck at the cause of free education was by declaring that the object of the Opposition, or of the greater part of it, is to destroy voluntary schools. I absolutely deny that. I always denied it when with my right hon. Friend years ago we were fighting the battle of free education. I have always maintained that we have no desire or object in destroying voluntary schools. I had intended to take no part in this debate, and I do not wish to go into the argument so well stated on both sides. It cannot be denied that the

Sir W. Harcourt

Government held forth through the mouth of Lord Salisbury the expectation that free education was to be given this year. The noble Marquess said it depended on the Budget, and on the Budget alone. But that position has been abandoned. The First Lord of the Treasury, at the opening of the Session, gave as a reason why the Government did not propose to deal with the question that opinion was not ripe on the subject. So far from there being that complete conversion my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham speaks of, the First Lord of the Treasury said the Government were waiting to see if that conversion would take place. Why, everybody knows what has stopped free education this Session. We have heard it to-night from the mouth of the representative of Oxford University (Mr. Talbot). Every argument that could be used against the principle of free education was used by that hon. Member on behalf of the class and profession he represents in that University to induce his Party to put a veto on free education. I deeply regret that my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham, who has rendered such signal service, as I will always testify, for education and to free education, should have thought fit to-night to make a speech which, in my opinion, has done more than any speech I have ever heard to throw back that cause. My right hon. Friend says this is not a Party question, and it may not be a Party question as between himself and the Government sitting opposite, but it is a Party question as between himself and hon. Gentlemen on this side, and in my opinion he has abandoned that great cause for which we have fought, in order that he might inflict a blow upon hon. Gentlemen on this side.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I am afraid that in the few remarks I wish to address to the House I shall not be able to follow the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down into the heated atmosphere which he appears to have entered. I must, however, say that there was a good deal in the right hon. Gentleman's remarkable speech that ought to be noted by the country. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to think that the best way of forwarding the interests of free education was to attack the right hon. Member for Birmingham, who had made the best speech in favour of free education that had been made in this House for years. The right hon. Member for Derby said that the right hon. Member for Birmingham had struck the heaviest blow that had ever been levelled at the cause of free education. And why? Because the right hon. Gentleman has shown us that it is perfectly possible to admit of free education without damage to voluntary schools. I must say it seems to me that, if on no other account, the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham is memorable because he has put down his foot so strongly on that subject, saying that while he strongly supports the principle of free education, he supports it conditionally on being able to continue in this country the existence of voluntary schools. Now, in the second place, I want to know what right the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has to take any credit to himself whatever in the matter of free education? What has the right hon. Gentleman ever done for free education? I doubt if any man in this House will remember a single word of any speech the right hon. Gentleman has made on the subject. I want also to know this. The right hon. Gentleman was a leading member of the Cabinet which, he says, was pledged to free education. What did that Cabinet ever do for free education? Did that Cabinet ever put one word into the Queen's Speech pledging them to free education? Yet that Government came into office absolutely pledged to free education. I want to know upon what ground the right hon. Gentleman can justify his support of this Amendment when, having had the opportunity of bringing in a measure of free education, he did not introduce one. The fact is, if we look at the matter dispassionately, the right hon. Gentleman has never done anything for free education; the only Party and the only Government in this country which has done anything for free education is the Party and the Government that is now in power. Now, if I may pass from the right hon. Gentleman who did not contribute much towards the real discussion of the matter, to other speeches, I should like to allude to one or two from this side of the House. I believe that one of the main objects in bringing forward this Amendment was to attempt to show that we on this side of the House are somewhat divided in opinion upon the subject, but I believe that attempt has lamentably failed, because I am satisfied, from the speeches that I have heard to-night from these Benches, that we are absolutely agreed as to the object we desire to attain, and that when the time comes for us to state our methods it will be found that we are in perfect accord. There are one or two points upon which I think all Members of the House are agreed. I do not think that any one will deny the truth of the proposition of my noble Friend the Prime Minister that the introduction of compulsion has given the subject of free education a tremendous impetus. Parents are compelled to send their children to school and lose the benefit they formerly derived from their children's labour. Hence arises a claim for free education as assistance towards the poorer parents. That necessity has always been recognised both by Board schools and voluntary schools, which in some cases remits the fees parents are required to pay. It has been recognised also, by that system to which allusion has been made, where parents have to apply to the Board of Guardians for payment of the fees; and all who have read the evidence taken before the Royal Commission must feel that the present system of the payment of school fees is eminently unsatisfactory, and that in the matter of the remission of school fees we must of necessity go further. Knowing this my noble Friend, the Prime Minister, spoke upon the subject of assisted education in 1885 and in 1889. He put his view before the country with that clearness that distinguishes his statements, and he made his statement with the assent and full concurrence of his Colleagues in 1885 and 1889, and to every word of the statements made we, his Colleagues, are absolutely prepared to adhere. We do not go back from a single word. We are bound. I think it is our duty when opportunity arises to press forward and give effect to that policy, but of course we intend to choose our time. We do not intend to allow the Opposition to settle the time and manner; we shall choose our own time for explaining the details of our proposal, and are not so foolish as to attempt on an occasion like this to bring forward the details of a scheme that we do not see the opportunity of carrying through. The time will come when we shall have that opportunity, and then we shall give to the House the actual details of the proposals we intend to make. Of course, we are perfectly well aware of the difficulties. No one can have heard the speeches made to-night without recognising that there are difficulties that any Government must surmount. There are difficulties not only on the one side, but also on the other, and we have taken note of them all to the fullest extent. It is our desire that we should be enabled to make our proposals to the House with due regard to two principal objects. The first of these objects is that in nothing we propose we should damage or injure the prospects of voluntary schools. We are perfectly well aware that there are many managers of voluntary schools who view any proposals on this subject with some anxiety. We are perfectly prepared to study, and we are studying, the difficulties which the problem presents in that direction, and we are determined that when we act every one of them shall be considered. The hon. Member for Evesham argued strongly against free education, but is my hon. Friend prepared to say that he would leave the question to be dealt with by those who are determined to destroy voluntary education, rather than take any step in the direction of free education with those of his friends who are equally determined to preserve voluntary schools? I am certain that if my hon. Friend will think over his position for a short time he will be satisfied that we are perfectly justified in adhering absolutely to the proposals we have made, and in stating our determination to give effect to them when the opportunity occurs. Secondly, we want to consider this question of free education in connection with the other great branches of the subject, and any one who has read the report of the Royal Commission will know that they are difficult and numerous. One of these subjects is the 17s. 6d. limit, which, as hon. Gentlemen know, is condemned because it is a discouragement to the improvement of education. Some want to abolish the limit and some want to raise it; others want something in the nature of a double limit. The subject can be dealt with only by a Bill, and if we think it necessary so to deal with it we desire at the same time to deal with the question as a whole, and to present to the country the policy we think best calculated in our view to advance the education of the country. I don't think I need detain the House beyond a few more observations. The gist of the Amendment is to complain that we have not mentioned free education in the Queen's Speech; and the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) in his very rare references to the subject immediately before the House, selected, I must say, extraordinary ground for supporting the Amendment. He argued that we are bound to introduce at once proposals for free education because of what was done for free education in Scotland last year. Now, last year Parliament gave Scotland a system, not of absolutely free education, but something much nearer what the Prime Minister has called a system of assisted education. The right hon. Gentleman has argued in favour of popular control in the administration of grants to voluntary schools, although last year we did not so proceed in Scotland. Again, on the ground of simultaneity in dealing with England and Scotland he supports the Amendment. Yet the right hon. Gentleman knows very well the circumstances of last year were altogether very different from the circumstances in which we are now placed. Last year we had to distribute a fund, and we gave a part to education in Scotland because we found that the Representatives of Scotland earnestly demanded that that concession should be made. The portion allotted to England we gave to other objects, but equally with the general concurrence of the Representatives of this country. I will not go into matters that have been abundantly dealt with by my right hon. Friend (Sir W. Hart Dyke). No Government would think of inserting in the Queen's Speech reference to any subject which they did not honestly think there was a reasonable chance of their being able to deal with. We are satisfied there is no chance of our being able to deal with this important subject, and therefore we did not refer to it. We all understand the object of the Amendment. It is well understood that no Government can accept an Amendment of this character to the Address. Therefore, it is moved to give an opportunity to its supporters to make speeches more or less in favour of free education, and to enable the Opposition to say, whatever speeches may be made on behalf of the Government, that the Government voted against the proposal. I am quite sure the country will see through it, as every man in this House undoubtedly does. It is without the slightest fear of our being misunderstood in the course we are taking that I ask the House to vote against the Amendment.

(11.50.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of Members of the Opposition making speeches in favour of free education more or less with a view to the country. Who set the example of that? When the Prime Minister spoke at Nottingham in favour of "assisted" education, by which I suppose he meant free education more or less, he must have intended—speaking as the head of the Government, and therefore I may fairly assume with the assent and consent of his Colleagues—that speech to be something more than a speech for a Nottingham caucus. My right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham has amazed me by the attitude he took to-night. I am sure he will not deny that he and I have stood side by side for 17 years on this question, and that 17 years ago I co-operated with him. What is the effect of my right hon. Friend's speech to-night? Its effect is distinctly to throw back as far as he can do so the very reform for which we formerly fought side by side. My right hon. Friend was apparently irritated by the reference of my right hon. Friend the Member for Derby to what took place in the autumn of 1885. I was present on the occasion to which my right hon. Friend referred as when the right hon. Gentleman made that melodramatic statement. The language of my right hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham was this—

"On the other hand, it would be dishonourable in me, and would be lowering the high tone which ought to be observed in public life, if, after having committed myself personally as I have done to the advocacy of these proposals" in which free education was a prominent item,

"I were to take my place in any Government which excluded that policy."

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Aye, aye; excluded.

MR. J. MORLEY: Then this Government of 1886 did not include or exclude it. Who are now endeavouring to carry that article of the programme? Are they the Members of the defeated Government of 1886 or the Opposition of that date? It is said that my right hon. Friend has no right to complain, because free education was not included in the Queen's Speech in 1886. That is a most futile remark, because we did not make the Queen's Speech of 1886. As far as the general question is concerned, I am not going at this time of night to enter into it. The arguments which appeared to me and to my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham in 1873 to be conclusive have certainly been rather confirmed in the interval between 1873 and 1890. Our position, I think, is this— that when a school is intended for all it should be managed by the representatives of the whole community. Where, on the other hand, the school claims to be for the use of a section of the community, as, for example, the Catholics or the Jews, it may continue to receive public support as long as it is under the management of that sect. That, of course, is the Scotch system: it works well there and without any friction. That appears to me to be a position which we and even the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway may consistently take up. That is the principle on which I shall vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Rotherham, and it is on that principle and upon the general advantages which have been dealt upon in this debate to be gained in the cause of education itself we support the Amendment.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.). I wish to say that I accept the declaration just made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, speaking on the part of the Liberal Party, that the Vote on this Amendment for the principle of free education does not close or even prejudice the rights of conscience, but allows us to maintain the principle that when a school is under the management of persons of a particular creed and attended by children of a particular creed it must still remain under that management after the system of free education has been adopted. Accepting that principle and recognising the authority of the right hon. Gentleman as the spokesman of the Liberal party, I shall have no difficulty in voting for the Amendment.

PUBLIC TRUSTEE BILL—(No. 19.)

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I need not repeat the statement of its scope and objects made in the discussion which took place upon it last time. The only observation I have to make about it is in reference to the new provisions of the Bill, which I imagine will increase the probability of its being passed. The first of those provisions is, in Clause 3, that where proceedings have been instituted in the High Court for the administration of the estate of any deceased person, and, by reason of the small value of such estate or otherwise, it appears to the Court that the estate could be more economically or better administered by the Public Trustee, the Court may order that to be done. The other provision is one which may, perhaps, conciliate and secure the advocacy of a large class of persons who, I am afraid, did not quite concur in the Bill as it stood. Section 11 of the Bill as it now stands provides that where a testator, settlor, or other creator of any Trust directs or authorises the employment of any particular solicitor or bank, or where either the co-Trustees of the Public Trustee, or the persons appearing to the Public Trustee to be for the time being entitled to the income of the Trust, or, if they are infants, their guardians, shall require the employment of any particular solicitor or bank, they may so direct, subject to proper restrictions, and such solicitor or bank shall be so appointed, but subject to removal upon good cause on the application of the Public Trustee or persons appearing to the Court to be interested in the Trust. My Lords, I believe that new provision may possibly conciliate and obtain for the Bill the support of those who disapproved of, though they were not perhaps altogether responsible for the rejection of the measure last year; and, under these circumstances, I venture to hope that the public and your Lordships' House will now welcome this Bill.

*THE EARL OF BELMORE: May I ask the noble and learned Lord one question. The Bill applies only to English wills. Is it meant by English wills, those deposited in Somerset House, or would it include wills which were proved partly in England and partly in Ireland? What I want to know, in other words, is whether it applies solely to wills of persons domiciled in England, or to those cases in which the trust property is in England?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I am afraid I cannot give an absolute answer to the inquiry of my noble Friend. The Bill provides for the appointment of the Public Trustee in regard to any English will settlement or Trust by an order made in accordance with the section. That may be subject to exceptions. I am afraid I cannot absolutely reply to my noble Friend.

Lord Halsbury

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

TRUST COMPANIES BILL.—(No. 21)

SECOND READING.

LORD HERSCHELL: I need detain your Lordships but a few moments in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, because it is, with one exception, in exactly the same terms as those in which it passed this House last Session after careful consideration by the Law Committee. The object of the Bill is to enable Trust Companies to be appointed Trustees of wills or settlements, and its main provisions apply to the voluntary act of those who desire to make Trust Companies their Trustees. I have never been able to see why those who desire to make such appointments should not be at perfect liberty to do so, or why the necessary machinery should not be afforded by the law as regards the appointment of those companies as Trustees of existing Trusts. That is a matter which will be left, as has been proposed, carefully guarded by the action of the Courts, so that in no case will a company be appointed Trustees under an existing Trust, unless the Court should be satisfied that that is really a beneficial and desirable course. My Lords, this Bill is not intended to be in any respect antagonistic to that of which my noble and learned Friend has moved the Second Reading. It is quite consistent with the existence of a Public Trustee and the power to create that public official Trustee under a will or settlement that those who desire it should be allowed, if they please, to appoint a Trust Company to the office of Trustee. One cannot conceal from one's self that there are, perhaps, some people who have, I may say, a suspicion of any official, and who may imagine that there would be delay or rigidity in the proceedings of the office which might be likely to exceed that which would be experienced in the case of a Trust Company. At all events, I do not understand why there should be any objection to those who wish to appoint a responsible company of this description their Trustee if they please. Security is provided for in the Bill for the solidity of the companies who are allowed to fulfil those functions, and care must be taken that they are so far under public control as to ensure that they are not companies or undertakings which are obviously unfit for such a purpose. It has been thought by some that there is less security in the case of a company of this description than in the case of an individual Trustee appointed by a testator or a person who makes a settlement. I own I am unable to take that view. When a Trustee is appointed, no doubt he is expected and supposed to be a solvent and upright man; but, unfortunately, that expectation is not always realised, and my belief is that Trusts would be safer in the hands of a carefully-selected company, and with the liability of the shareholders in that company to make good any breach of trust, than they would be in cases of appointment of private individuals. At all events, what I have to submit to your Lordships is that where persons desire, in making a settlement, or a will, to repose the Trust in a company, there should be no impediment in the way of their doing so. There is only one provision in the Bill of this year which I need specially mention, but I think I ought not to omit mentioning it. It is, of course, expedient that a Trust Company, which undertakes a variety of Trusts, under which it holds large sums in Consols, should not mix together the funds which it holds under its various Trusts. As the regulations of the Bank of England stand, I believe the Bank will not earmark more than four different sums of Consols held in the same name. If an individual holds four different funds of Consols they will earmark them and keep them distinct. Now, there is a clause in the Bill that a Trust Company shall not be limited to four such funds, and that the Bank shall be required to earmark by letter or number, or in some other way, all funds which these companies may hold for other people. It is not intended that the Bank is to be affected with notice of the Trust or with knowledge of it or to be bound by it in any way; it is simply desirable, as a matter of convenience, that those funds should be kept separate in the books of the Bank. That is the object of this provision in the Bill, which, in the same form with that exception, was passed last Session after careful consideration. I hope, therefore, your Lordships will have no hesitation in giving it a Second Reading.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, there are only two observations which I think require to be made. One is with regard to the solvency of these companies which my learned and noble Friend has referred to. When he says there would be, as a guarantee of solvency, the liability of the members of the company, it must not be forgotten that these are limited companies, and, therefore, their shareholders are not like ordinary Trustees liable to the last farthing they are possessed of. The shareholders would only, of course, be liable to the extent of the shares they held. I do not put that forward as an objection in any way. I only say it by way of caution. Then there is another matter, and that is the amount of reserve fund. Considering that a large Trust Company might be carrying on an extensive business in this way, £50,000 would be a very small reserve. In such cases the amount of the estates held in Trust might be enormous; and a breach of the trust might easily destroy the entire company if that breach of trust was to any considerable extent. I cannot help thinking that when the Bill gets into Committee, some principle of this sort should be adopted: care should be taken that some sort of proportion should exist between the amount of reserve fund and the extent of the funds of which the company may have the disposal. It is, I think, very desirable that some enactment should be made that the funds committed to the care of such companies should be proportionately covered by the reserve funds.

*LORD TEYNHAM: My Lords, the noble and learned Lord who has presented this Bill remarked that it was perfectly consistent with the Bill which has been brought in by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack; but the question which I should like to suggest for your Lordship's consideration if you should think it of any value is whether the mode of dealing with Trust Funds under this Bill is not preferable to that provided for by the Public Trustee Bill. And I make the suggestion, my Lords, for this reason. Only fancy what might be the consequence if a very large proportion of the settled property of the country were in the hands of a single Public Trustee! I believe, my Lords, that a Roman Emperor—was it Nero?—expressed the wish that all the rich men in Rome had but a single neck that he might decapitate them at one blow. It seems to me that the noble and learned Lord has been so good as to supply that single neck in the person of the Public Trustee. I do think, my Lords, that any legislation is dangerous which proceeds upon the assumption that the institutions of this country are based upon adamant rock; I say they are not, and I venture to say that the Bill which has been presented by the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack might very properly be styled a Bill for the purpose of offering high premium to Socialistic agitation. Take, for instance, the 5th clause. The Bill has been most carefully drawn, and it has been carefully provided that the Public Trustee should have proper protection in the execution of the office committed to his charge; but take the 5th clause and see how his office is constituted: The Treasury, with the concurrence of the Lord Chancellor, shall appoint a fit person—it may be Mr. John Burns—to the office of Public Trustee during pleasure! It appears to me, my Lords, that such an administration of advanced Liberals as might possibly preside over the destinies of this country within the next 20 years might make very short work of everything under an Act of this description; and I must say, therefore, that I prefer the Bill of the noble and learned Lord in reference to Trust Companies. I would suggest to your Lordships whether that alternative is not preferable to the system of placing so much in the power of an individual Public Trustee.

Bill read 2^a (according to order).

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I should under ordinary circumstances, if this were a new Bill, propose that it should go to the Law Committee. Of course, if the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack desires, I will do so; but as the Bill passed through Committee last year, and there is only that one clause in it different, I do not suppose it is necessary.

Lord Teynham

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think so.

LORD HERSCHELL: Then I move that it be referred to the Law Committee.

Bill committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

CROWN OFFICE BILL—(No. 20.)

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order).

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, the other day the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack stated that there would be a saving effected by the abolition of the office of Secretary of Presentations of about, I think, £425 a year, but I am told there will be an additional salary of £200 to be paid to another person in the Department of the Lord Chancellor for performing the duties which have hitherto been carried out by the Secretary of Presentations. I shall be glad if the noble and learned Lord will inform me whether that is the case. I think it is desirable we should know whether £225 is the net amount of the saving that will be effected.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I think the statement referred to was made by the noble and learned Lord Selborne; but I think that is the amount which has been stated as the saving effected.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then I understand that the net saving will only be £225?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: No.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then perhaps the noble and learned Lord who introduced the Bill will kindly inform me of the exact amount.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I will ascertain it exactly.

Bill reported without amendment; and to be read 3^a To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

NEW WRITS.

For Lincolnshire (South Kesteven or Stamford Division), . . v . . John Compton Lawrance, esquire, one of the Justices of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice ; for St. Pancras (North Division), . . v . . The honble. Charles Wallace Alexander Napier Cochrane-Baillie, now Lord Lamington, called up to the House of Peers.

QUESTIONS.

DESTITUTE FOREIGNERS.

SIR JOHN COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if it is true destitute foreigners have been inmates of our poor house at Dover and supported at the cost of the ratepayers ; what was their nationality ; under what circumstances were they received as inmates ; have any complaints reached him as to their general habits ; were British inmates compelled to associate with them ; were special arrangements made for their accommodation, and, if so, how is the expense to be defrayed ; can they be compelled to return to their own country ; and how will their travelling expense to their own country be met ?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's) : It is the case that a Patagonian Indian, with his mother, his two wives, and three children, were for four days maintained in the Dover Workhouse at the cost of the Union. It appears that they were landed at Dover in a state of destitution, and were taken to the relieving officer, who gave an order for their admission to the workhouse. As to their habits, I am informed that the description of another savage tribe given by a midshipman in one of Captain Marryat's novels exactly applies—"Manners they had none, and their customs were beastly." They were placed in separate wards, and the other inmates were not required to associate with them. The total cost to the Guardians in this matter was only £1 16s. 8d., and it will be borne by the common fund of the Union. The persons in question were taken away from Dover by an agent from the Consul General for Chili for the purpose of being returned to their own country, and the Guardians were informed that the Chilian Government would bear the cost.

IRELAND—JUDICIAL LEASES.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many tenants in the County of Donegal who applied to the Land Commission before the 1st November 1887, to fix the fair rent of their holdings have subsequently accepted judicial leases at a rent agreed upon by landlord and tenant without adjudication by the Land Commission ; and do the agreements so entered into between landlords and tenants out of Court owe, in many cases, their origin to the delay of the Land Commission in hearing applications to have fair rents fixed ?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) : The Land Commissioners report that it would not be possible to furnish the information indicated in the first paragraph unless by referring to the file in each individual case where rents were fixed by an agreement, and then comparing the entire 12,027 in those cases in which originating notices were served, a work which would seriously interfere with the ordinary duties of their Department. The Commissioners can, however, state that between January 1, 1888, and January 1, 1890, rents were fixed on consent by the Head Commissioners in 27 cases where originating notices had been served prior to November 1, 1887. The Commissioners have no information as to the motives which led the parties to agree to the rents being fixed without a trial in Court.

THE WATERFORD ARTILLERY.

DR. TANNER : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is a fact that during the non-training period the battery sergeant-majors and sergeants of the Waterford Artillery are obliged to show their kits once a month, and shake out their shirts, socks, &c., side by side with the trumpeters, and in view of the non-commissioned officers and men of the Cavalry in the barracks; if it is usual for battery sergeant-majors of the Royal Artillery or colour-sergeants of the Line to show kits with the men of their corps; if it is true the non-commissioned officers of the corps in question made a representation on the subject complained of in 1885, to Colonel Shortland, R.A., Commanding Auxiliary Artillery, Cork District; whether he gave orders it should be discontinued; and whether this was done while he remained in command?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln, Horn-castle): Although I have telegraphed for the information I have not yet received it. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to put the question down again.

LENZIE ACADEMY.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rol-lox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Lenzie Academy, termed in the prospectus as "a new higher grade public school," is in reality a Board school supported by the local rates and in receipt of Government grant; whether complaints have reached him that the school fees charged in class 4 of the junior department for "scripture, reading, recitation, writing, dictation, arithmetic, grammar, history, geography, drawing, singing, needlework, and cookery," are 15s. per quarter, or £3 per annum per pupil, which are practically prohibitory to the children of the working classes in Lenzie, and that there are close on 100 children resident in Lenzie district who have to travel to other Board schools at a distance of from one to two miles further from their homes than Lenzie Academy; whether, when the wants of Lenzie district to School Board accommodation were originally set forth, all the children in Lenzie district were included in the number of children for whose accommodation a Board school was required at Lenzie; what is the school accommodation of Lenzie Academy, and what is the average attendance; and whether the Scotch Education Department will take steps to secure that the children in Lenzie district, for whose accommodation Lenzie Board school (termed "Lenzie Academy") was built, shall receive the benefit of the Probate Duty grant for free education in the compulsory standards in the school specially built for their accommodation?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I understand that Lenzie Academy is termed in the prospectus a higher grade public school. As that name would import, it is under School Board management, and it receives support from the School Rate and the Parliamentary grant. A complaint was received by the Department in October last referring in general terms to the fees as being beyond the reach of the working classes. A reply was sent stating that sanction had been given to this as a fee-paying school, only upon the assurance of the two School Boards interested in the school, with whom the primary responsibility rested, that there was a supply sufficient for all who desired them of schools suitably situated in which free places were provided. Neither in the original letter of complaint, nor subsequently, have any such particulars been received as regards fees and number of children as are given in the hon. Member's question. The Department is unable to say what lines were followed by the School Boards interested in estimating the number of children for whom the school should be built, but it is presumed that, in the circumstances of the locality, the School Boards allowed for an increase of population. The school is sufficient for 660 children, and the average attendance for the year ended May last was 201. Any statistics showing that hardship exists will receive the consideration of the Department, but until the reasons upon which the proposals of the School Boards under the minute of 26th August last were based can be shown to be unfounded the sanction already given to these proposals cannot be withdrawn.

IRELAND—THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Local Government Board have at length consented to give the grant due to the Cork Union for labourers' cottages; and how long and for what period the grant in question has been left unpaid to the Board?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The late Board of Guardians of the Cork Union had already received out of the sanctioned loan a sum in excess of the amount required for the houses proceeded with. Their application of November 28 for a further instalment could not, therefore, be considered without further information, which the Local Government Board applied to them for on December 11, but this information was not furnished by the Guardians. The Local Government Board are now in communication with the Vice Guardians on the subject.

DR. TANNER: For how long a period has the grant in question been left unpaid to the Board, and what is the sum due?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The grant was applied for on the 28th of November, but the amount was not part of the hon. Member's question.

DR. TANNER: As the answer of the right hon. Gentleman is most unsatisfactory I will put the question down again for to-morrow, and from day to day until I get an answer.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen a Report of the meeting of the Cork Dispensary Committee on the 18th instant, at which complaint was made of the action of the recently appointed Vice Guardians in stopping an outdoor relief grant of 4s. per week from a man named James Madden, who has recently lost his sight and has a wife and family dependent upon him; whether he is aware that a large number of complaints of a similar character in connection with the stoppage of outdoor relief have been made in the Cork Union District; and if he will direct the Local Government Board to institute inquiry into the matter of these repeated complaints?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I trust that the hon. Member for Mid Cork (Dr. Tanner) will take this as an answer also to his Question No. 24.

DR. TANNER: I am afraid that I cannot do so, especially in reference to the fourth paragraph of my question, in which I ask what economy would be effected by the action of the Vice Guardians. What I desire to know is whether a remonstrance has reached the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the treatment of the poor old blind man by the recently appointed Vice Guardians to the Cork Union; whether it is true that for some considerable time past Madden has been in receipt of 4s. weekly outdoor relief, which helped him and his wife and six children to keep out of the workhouse; whether the Vice-Guardians have recently made the following order respecting him in the relief book: "Stopped, Order Ticket for Workhouse;" what economy would be effected by such action in such a case; and whether the facts of the particular case referred to have been received by him from the Cork Dispensary Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already in substance answered the question. The action of the Guardians is undoubtedly in the direction of economy.

DR. TANNER: Did not this poor man beg and implore to continue in the receipt of this 4s. a week out-door relief? Did he not request again and again to be allowed to live with his wife and family, and not be separated from them by being sent to the workhouse? Is it not the fact that instead of an expenditure of some £10 a year the rates will be increased to £70 in consequence of the action of the Vice Guardians?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, I should think that that is not the case. The object of the Guardians was to get this man into the hospital.

DR. TANNER: There is another part of the question which the right hon. Gentleman has not answered. Has he received any information in regard to the facts of this case from the Cork Dispensary Committee recently appointed by the Vice Guardians, forwarded by the High Sheriff of the City of Cork?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have received an account of a meeting which has been held.

*MR. FLYNN: Had the Vice-Guardians any knowledge that the stopping of outdoor relief would drive this man into the workhouse, and consequently lead to a large increase of the rates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information that there has been a large increase of the rates; on the contrary, I believe that the action of the Vice-Guardians has conduced to economy.

DR. TANNER: Is it not the fact that the Dispensary Committee has quite recently been appointed by the Vice-Guardians, and that it is in consequence of their protest and in the interests of humanity that I have been induced to ask these questions?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know what reasons may have induced the hon. Member to ask these questions, but I cannot give him any further information.

THE SUPPORT OF PAUPER PARENTS.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a case tried by the Magistrates at Evesham, on Monday, 10th February, in which Charles Taylor, a labourer, of Honeybourne, was summoned by the Relieving Officer for non-payment of 37s. arrears of payment under orders to contribute 1s. per week towards the maintenance of his father and mother in the workhouse; whether his attention has been drawn to the evidence, which showed that Taylor had a wife and a crippled son to support, and had further had a daughter on his hands for 12 months; that Taylor's wages being 10s. a week nominally, but subject to deduction for wet weather, had averaged not more than 9s. a week; and that, for the last six weeks, Taylor's earnings had only been a total of 20s., or 3s. 6d. a week; whether he is aware that it was urged in favour of Taylor's ability to pay that he had an allotment of one and a-half acres, for which he had to pay four times the agricultural rent; whether the Bench, in condemning Taylor to pay 20s. in satisfaction of the claim and costs, stated "that they had been very lenient with him"; whether the law requires that agricultural labourers, earning 9s. to 10s. a week, should be called upon to contribute towards the support of relatives in the workhouse; and whether he will consider the advisability of transferring the appeal from Petty Sessions to the County Court, considering that the decision rests entirely on ability to pay, and that the practice of different Petty Sessional Courts varies very considerably?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have made inquiry of the Justices and have seen a newspaper report of the proceedings. It appears that two orders were made upon this man in June, 1886, to pay two sums of 6d. per week towards the maintenance of his father and mother. He fell into arrears of 18s. 6d. under each order. The Guardians, having made inquiry into his ability to pay, applied to the Bench to enforce payment in full. The Bench decided to enforce payment to the amount of 10s. on each order, but not to issue process until such time as the man could pay. They came to the conclusion that his average income would be about 15s. a week. He was not at that time supporting a daughter. He occupied an allotment of about two acres, but the Bench do not know at what rent. I understand the law to be that orders to contribute towards the relief of pauper relatives should only be made on persons of sufficient ability, and that is a question of fact for the Justices to decide. I have no reason to believe that County Court Judges would decide this question with more uniformity than the Justices in Petty Sessions.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Upon what evidence does the right hon. Gentleman say that this man had 15s. a week?

MR. MATTHEWS: That is the information the Bench of Magistrates communicated to me in answer to my question.

MERTHYR TYDVIL WORKHOUSE.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if his attention has been called to the action of the Rev. T. L. Davies and Sister Naomi, of the Church of England, in entering the Union Workhouse at Merthyr Tydvil, on 8th February last, without the knowledge of the master, and at a time when they had expressly been told it would be inconvenient for them to visit any of the inmates; whether it is true that they were found by the master at 8 o'clock on the morning of that day at the bedside of James Bennett, who was not dangerously ill at the time, with two lighted wax candles; and whether any person has a legal right to enter a workhouse without the permission of the Guardians, and in opposition to the authority of the master?

*MR. RITCHIE: My attention had not been drawn to this matter before notice was given of the question; but I have since received communications from the Guardians and the rector of the parish on the subject. The facts appear to be substantially as given in the question, except that Mr. Davies, the clergyman who visited the workhouse, states that he had previously obtained the permission of the matron to attend at the workhouse at the time mentioned for the purpose of administering the Holy Communion to the inmate in question. Speaking generally, persons have no right to enter a workhouse without the permission of the Guardians; but the licensed minister of the religious persuasion of any inmate may at all times in the day, on the request of the inmate, visit the workhouse to afford religious assistance to such inmate.

REPORTS ON IRISH AGRICULTURE.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Reports on Irish Agriculture, which are furnished to the Lord Lieutenant by the Registrar General, and subsequently presented to Parliament, are entirely prepared by members of the Royal Irish Constabulary and Metropolitan Police Force; what special training do Irish policemen undergo to qualify them to report on agricultural matters; has his attention been called to the Report of the police officer at Kanturk, that—"Prices are fairly high and remunerative; I attribute this to a better feeling existing in the country;" and is there any source of information on Irish agricultural matters available to the Government of Ireland other than the Irish Police Force?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Reports on Irish Agriculture issued by the Registrar General's Department are not prepared by members of the Royal Irish Constabulary and Metropolitan Police. The information on which these Reports are founded is collected by enumerators selected from these forces, who have considerable experience, a large number of them having been employed in this work from time to time for many years. The District Inspectors report from their local knowledge as to the probable cause to which the good or bad yield may be attributed. The District Inspector at Kanturk stated his opinion as given in the question. There are various sources of information on such matters available to the Registrar General, who, wherever necessary, communicates direct with the agriculturists themselves. I may say that the Return of the Registrar General cannot be described as the Report of the Government, although it is an official Return. I may also remind the hon. Gentleman that the persons employed in collecting the statistical information on which the schedule of prices of the Land Commission was based were not members of the Police Force.

*MR. LANE: Does not the right hon. Gentleman consider that the time has come when there should be some Department of the State appointed in Dublin for the purpose of looking after agricultural matters in Ireland?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not at all sure that some improvement might not be effected in the direction mentioned by the hon. Gentleman.

THE IRISH TELEGRAPH SERVICE.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether "learners," who have neither pay nor responsibility, are permitted to have access to the Mallow and other telegraph offices in Ireland; is it in accordance with the Rules of the Telegraph Service that such persons should deal with and learn the contents of telegrams passing through these offices in small country towns; can he explain why those learners are sent to relieve the regular staff at other stations; and whether he will consider the desirability of sending duly appointed clerks on this duty?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): At Mallow, as at other places throughout the United Kingdom, learners without pay have access to the telegraph office; but it cannot be said that they have no responsibility, as they are all required to make the official declaration before a magistrate. It is obvious that unless persons were allowed to learn the telegraph work it would be impossible for the Department to provide itself with qualified telegraphists. It is both in accordance with the Rules of the Service and with the necessities of the case that such persons should deal with actual telegrams. After the learners become thoroughly competent, and while they are waiting for vacancies on the establishment, they are employed to relieve absent officers at other places. This is economical to the Department, and it is beneficial to the learners, in that it affords them some emolument whilst they are waiting for permanent appointments.

*MR. LANE: Arising out of that answer, does the right hon. Gentleman think it desirable that persons should be employed in learning the business in such very small places as Mallow? Is it not more desirable that they should be stationed in the larger towns?

*MR. RAIKES: I will make inquiry, and ascertain how far that suggestion can be acted upon.

*MR. LANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the fact that within the past few years six vacancies (five for males and one for females) have occurred in the Cork Telegraph Office, and that five males and one female clerk have been drafted from country towns and railway stations to fill these vacancies, if he will explain why these vacant positions in Cork, or the ones vacated in the country towns and railway stations, were not given or offered to the "learners," who have been waiting at and performing the duties of substitutes in the Cork Office for four or five years?

*MR. RAIKES: Since January, 1886, there have been nine vacancies for male telegraphists at Cork, of which four have been filled by learners in that office and five by telegraphists from other offices. Of the five vacancies thus created at other offices, one, at Limerick Junction, was offered to a learner at Cork, who declined it; a second was not filled at all, the situation being abolished; and of the other three two were filled by learners in the respective offices in which the vacancies occurred. For female telegraphists eight vacancies have occurred at Cork since April, 1884, and of these seven have been filled by learners in the Cork office, and the eighth by a telegraphist from Knocklong Railway Station, the vacancy there being given to a learner from Cork.

*MR. LANE: Was there no learner in the Cork Office capable of filling either of these vacancies, so that it was necessary to introduce strangers from other offices?

*MR. RAIKES: I have no reason to believe that the persons referred to were unfitted; but the individuals selected were thought to be more competent.

Mr. Raikes

GUARD ROOM AT GIBRALTAR.

MR. MOUNT (Berks, Newbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, whether the New Mole Guard Room at Gibraltar, which was closed during the summers of 1888 and 1889 on account of its unhealthy position from being over the sewer of the town, has been re-opened with the sanction of the medical authority; and whether its continuance is essential to the Service?

*MR. E. STANHOPPE: The New Mole Guard Room was re-opened in 1889 with the sanction of the principal medical officer, but it has been again closed at his suggestion. The position of this room is at the entrance to the fortress and the General Officer commanding considers a guard room necessary there.

PRISON LABOUR.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any prison labour is let out by tender for any sort of manufacture except mat making; and can he state in what prisons labour is let out by tender for mat making; the number of hands employed under tender in those prisons; the names of the contractors for labour in such prisons; and for how long each contractor has hired labour in the prison or prisons?

MR. MATTHEWS: The answer to the hon. Member's first question is that it is true that in some prisons contractors undertake to furnish materials to the prison authorities for the making of certain articles other than mats, and to take the products at a certain agreed price. This work, however, is all done in the prison, and under the supervision of prison officers. As to the hon. Member's second question, I cannot, in the interest of the Public Service, give any information beyond that which is already given to Parliament in the annual Reports of the Prison Commissioners in accordance with the Prison Act of 1877.

*MR. QUILTER: I beg to give notice that, in consequence of the unsatisfactory answer of the right hon. Gentleman, I shall repeat the question again in some form or another until I get a satisfactory answer.

*MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): Is it not true that these mats are sold in competition with mats manufactured outside at considerably lower prices than they can be produced by outside makers?

MR. MATTHEWS: The Commissioners have nothing to do with the sale of the mats.

SCOTTISH ISLANDS—POSTAL COMMUNICATION.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if there be any rules as regards population or otherwise which guide the Post Office in dealing with outlying localities; whether he is aware that the Island of Tarrinsay in Harris, with a population of 60, dependent on the Post Office at Tarbert, and the Island of Heisker in North Uist, dependent on Lochmaddy, and with a population of 143, have neither of them any postal communication whatever; and whether he will take their isolated case into his consideration, with the view of granting them at least a weekly post?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the question of establishing new posts must, in some degree, be determined by the consideration whether the expenditure bears a reasonable proportion to the revenue available. In the case of the two Islands named, I regret that no arrangement is practicable for affording postal communication, except at an outlay largely in excess of the revenue from the correspondence, which is small in amount; and I may add that even now the main service to Harris and North Uist entails a heavy loss to the revenue. At the same time, I shall be happy to again examine the question raised if any persons interested should be prepared to enter into a guarantee to meet the necessary increased expense.

SOUTH AFRICAN AFFAIRS.

COLONEL LAURIE (Bath): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the dispute as to the territory comprised between the Rivers Shashi and Macloutsie, claimed by Khama, Chief of the Bamaugwate, and Lo Bengulo, King of the Matabele, has been settled, and in whose favour the award has been given?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The chiefs named have not agreed to submit their competing claims to this territory to the award of Her Majesty's Government, and its neutrality is therefore being maintained for the present under the police of the Protectorate.

THE AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the fact that on every voyage during the year 1889, as well as on her first voyage in 1890, the steamer City of Paris arrived at New York from 36 to 48 hours in advance of the mail-carrying steamer, which left Queenstown at the same time with her; and will he state why Her Majesty's mails are sent by the slower steamer instead of the faster?

*MR. RAIKES: As the steamer City of Paris does not belong to either of the two companies contracting for the conveyance of Her Majesty's mails twice a week from Queenstown to New York, the Post Office does not take official cognisance of her performances, though I was aware that she was making excellent passages. It is, of course, not practicable to bring within the scope of the contract every fast Atlantic steamer that may be put upon the line by a rival company. But the public can always obtain the use of fast outside steamers by specially superscribing their letters to go by such steamers, and this arrangement works very satisfactorily. Her Majesty's mails are conveyed by the Cunard and White Star Lines of steamers under contracts approved by Parliament in June, 1887.

COLLIERY EXPLOSION AT LONGTON.

MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the verdict of the coroner's jury, as reported in the Manchester Guardian on 31st January, in the case of the 64 lives which were lost through the explosion at Mossfield Colliery, Longton, on the 17th of October last, from which it appears that the jury declared the manager, Mr Potts, was—

"Deserving of severe censure in not personally inspecting the mine for so long a time previous to the explosion," and that the coroner, in addressing Mr. Potts, said—

"He had systematically broken Rule 21, which required his daily supervision of the mine, and had also disregarded Rule 7 of the General Rules, which required that he should withdraw the men from the pit in the case of danger;"

and, if so, whether the Government propose to take any further action in the matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; I am aware of the finding of the coroner's jury; but until I receive the Report of the counsel who attended the inquest on behalf of the Home Office I am not in a position to say what action, if any, the Government will be able to take after the lapse of time that has occurred. I am expecting the Report every day.

MR. FENWICK: Will the Report be presented to Parliament, and will copies be obtainable by hon. Members?

MR. MATTHEWS: I will make inquiry, and inform the hon. Gentleman.

COUPLING APPLIANCES.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the Returns ordered of Coupling Appliances in use on the goods waggons of the Railway Companies, and also on waggons belonging to private owners, will be completed and presented to the House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Returns were presented on the first day of the Session.

THE PHOENIX PARK, DUBLIN— BAND STAND.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Board of Works are taking steps to erect the band-stand in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, promised last year; and when it will be completed?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The cost of erecting the band-stand in the Phoenix Park, Dublin, will be provided in the Estimates for 1890-1891, and as soon as the money is made available the work will be proceeded with.

Mr. Fenwick

BANTRY HARBOUR.

MR. MURPHY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether anything has been done since last Session to mark with buoys the entrance to Bantry Harbour; and whether several accidents have occurred to Her Majesty's Ships, which frequently resort to this Harbour, from want of proper marks?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): A temporary buoy has been placed at the entrance to Bantry Bay pending the supply of buoys of a more permanent character. With the exception of the first reserve ship, which is stationed there, Her Majesty's ships very rarely visit Bantry Harbour. Only one accident, and that a slight one, has happened to Her Majesty's ships in Bantry Bay for a considerable number of years past.

MR. E. HARRINGTON (Kerry, W.): Does the noble Lord mean Bantry Harbour or Bantry Bay?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I presume that Bantry Harbour is Bantry Bay.

MR. E. HARRINGTON: Certainly not.

LORD G. HAMILTON: If the hon. Member will put the question down I will make further inquiry.

INFLUENZA AT SHEERNESS.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a statement which recently appeared in a naval and military journal to the effect—

"That a sailor was lately taken from one of the ships at Sheerness suffering from influenza; that the next day he was sent in a tug to Chatham Hospital, a two hours' journey; that on the following day he died;"

and, if this be true, whether he will take steps to insure that in the future such cases shall be treated in the locality where they occur?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I presume that the question of the hon. Member refers to a seaman named James Goulin, quartermaster of Her Majesty's ship Wye, who was sent to the infirmary wards at Sheerness Barracks on the 9th of January last and transferred to Chatham Hospital on the following day suffering from influenza. This man died on the third day afterwards from pneumonia, a frequent sequence in the case of the present epidemic of this disease. Goulin was conveyed to Chatham in a cot on board the vessel specially fitted for the removal of the sick from Sheerness, accompanied by the surgeon of the Wye, who took every care of him during the passage, and handed him over himself to the principal medical officer of the hospital. The reason why this man was removed from the barrack infirmary at Sheerness was that the wards were overcrowded at the time with serious cases of influenza. Under the circumstances, every care seems to have been taken by the medical officers in charge of the case.

CARETAKERS IN IRELAND.

SIR GEORGE TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland in view of the labour which would be involved in preparing a Return for the whole of Ireland of the number of tenants made caretakers under Section 7 of the Land Act of 1887, and subsequently re-instated as tenants in full possession of their rights, whether a Return could be prepared over certain districts sufficiently large to enable an approximate judgment to be formed; and whether the Government will consent to give such a Return for the county in each of the four Provinces of Ireland in which most notices of ejectment have been served?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The suggested Return would, no doubt, be very interesting and important if it could be obtained. But I am not sure that the necessary information could be procured from any official sources. And I would point out that while the right hon. Gentleman admits the labour that would be involved in attempting in an unofficial way to collect the details, his present proposal is that the attempt should be made where the labour would be greatest. I must also point out that even were the attempt made the result would not afford a safe ground for calculation as to what had happened in other parts of Ireland, since the eviction notices are naturally highest in counties where illegal conspiracies have prevented settlements between landlord and tenant.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Minister for Agriculture whether it is the intention of the Government to establish an experimental station where the exact nature of pleuro-pneumonia can be ascertained, and conditions established under which inoculation can be scientifically carried out; and, failing this, whether they will contribute to the expenses of any Local Authority which will undertake to carry out these experiments?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN Lincoln, Sleaford): In reply to the hon. Member's question, I am advised that experiments have been carried on for years in this country and abroad with the object of discovering the microbe of the disease, but hitherto without any satisfactory result. This inquiry is still being continued at the Royal Veterinary College, London. The annual Report of the Veterinary Department will contain a statement of all that has been done on this subject by scientists up to the present time. It is being prepared; and, having regard to this fact, and to the conflicting evidence given before the Departmental Committee which was appointed to inquire into pleuro-pneumonia and tuberculosis in 1888, it appears desirable to wait for the statement which I have referred to before any further steps are taken.

IRISH LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when he will make known the result of the inquiries held by the Special Commission into the various proposed lines of Light Railways along the West Coast of Ireland, and the decision come to by the Irish Government?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope that the information to which the hon. Gentleman refers will be ready next week, so that it may be brought before the grand juries.

THE TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACT.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he proposes any legislation to counteract the stringency of the 10th clause of the Tramways (Ireland) Act of 1883, so as to enable counties or baronies to give guarantees limited to their means?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The subject is one of interest, and is at present under consideration.

MR. CLIFFORD LLOYD.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the salary of the office in Armenia to which Mr. Clifford Lloyd has been appointed, and whether he has succeeded to an office and salary already existing, or whether in either respect the appointment is new or special; and whether Mr. Lloyd has been sent with a view to composing the unhappy quarrels and distractions among the various populations of Armenia?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The salary is £700, with an office allowance of £300. He succeeded to an office and salary already existing. The answer to the second question is in the negative.

TYPHOID FEVER AT THE CURRAGH CAMP.

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, having regard to the fact that owing to a severe outbreak of typhoid fever during the autumn of 1888 a portion of the huts in the Curragh Camp were condemned by the medical authorities, and that the War Office refused the £100 then asked for the restoration of these huts to a sanitary condition, whether he can explain how it happened that the War Office Authorities quartered the 3rd Battalion Grenadier Guards in these condemned huts last autumn, with the result that there was another outbreak of typhoid fever, from the effects of which four officers of the regiment nearly died?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: There was no outbreak of enteric fever in 1888 in that part of the Curragh Camp in which the Grenadier Guards were quartered in the autumn of 1889. In fact, only one case was reported as having originated there in 1888. During the previous months of 1889 other troops had occupied these huts without any ill-effects, and there was no ground for anticipating the unfortunate result of quartering the Grenadier Guards there. All arrangements for accommodation of troops in Ireland are made by the General Officer commanding, and are subject to local considerations, with which the War Office Authorities have nothing to do.

JUDICIAL FACTORS.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that, under the Judicial Factors (Scotland) Act of last Session, an accountant of the Court of Session is authorised to be appointed, at a salary to be provided by the Treasury, for the purpose of superintending and auditing the accounts of judicial factors and other persons therein referred to, including the accounts of trustees and judicial factors in bankruptcy cases; whether, under the Act, fees for such official work are, for the first time in Scotland, directed to be charged in bankruptcy cases, whilst no fees are authorised to be charged in the case of other and solvent estates; whether there is any good reason why insolvent estates should be charged for the services of the official accountant, whilst solvent estates should obtain such services without any charge; and whether he will consider the matter of putting both classes of estates, solvent and insolvent, on an equal footing?

MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: In reply to the question of the hon. Member, I beg to inform him that every estate, whether solvent or insolvent, coming under the supervision of the Accountant of Court, is charged fees which are fixed by Act of Sederunt. Cases under the Bankruptcy Acts were not so charged before the Act of last Session.

THE NORDENFELT GUN COMPANY.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the Maxim-Nordenfelt Gun and Ammunition Company are executing an order for English guns for the Government; and whether he has any information to the effect that the workmen at present engaged on this work are foreigners who have been brought into the country to take the place of the English workmen now out on strike?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Maxim-Nordenfolt Gun and Ammunition Company are executing an order for the Government. I have no information to the effect stated in the latter part of the question.

EMIGRATION TO CHILI.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the representations on which a considerable number of British Subjects were recently induced to emigrate to Chili were put forward by emigration agents authorised by the Government of Chili; whether these representations have been fulfilled; and whether Her Majesty's Government will urge the Government of Chili to help these British emigrants, who are in a state of great misery, to return home?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Her Majesty's Government are not aware in what expectations all the recent emigrants to Chili left this country; but, as I have already stated, some of them complained on their arrival that they had been disappointed. I also stated that the Chilean Government had exerted themselves to procure employment for those persons. But we cannot accept responsibility on account of proceedings of which we have no knowledge.

THE CHIN LUSHAI EXPEDITION.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether there is any truth in the statement that the Punjab coolies for the expedition from Chittagong towards Burma were so neglected and exposed on the way there that the majority of them were incapacitated by sickness before they joined; and, if so, whether inquiry has been made to fix the responsibility?

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I have also to ask the Under Secretary of State whether he has yet received any reply from the Government of India as to the alleged serious mortality amongst the troops engaged in the Chin Lushai expedition; and, if so, can he make any statement as to the truth of the telegram in the Times of February 10th on that subject?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I will answer both of the questions at the same time. The Secretary of State has received information from the Government of India that the statements in question alluded to in the question of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy are wholly incorrect, and that the sickness on the Chin Lushai expedition has been greatly exaggerated.

STATE OF THE CROPS IN SOUTHERN INDIA.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that, owing to the deficiency of rain in October to December 1889 in Southern India, the collectors and other revenue officials in the southern districts of the Presidency of Madras who were absent on leave from their stations and during the Christmas holidays were, at the end of December last, recalled by the Government of Madras to their respective headquarters, to inspect personally and to report at once upon the present state of the crops in their respective districts, and what the outcome of the failure of the rains is likely to be; whether such Reports have been received by the Madras Government; and whether the Secretary of State will lay them upon the Table?

*SIR J. GORST: The statement in the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is correct as regards eight districts to the south of Madras, in which up to the last week in December the rainfall of the North East Monsoon had been deficient. During the last week of December, however, there was good rain over the threatened districts; matters have changed for the better, and prospects are reported generally fair. The detailed Reports by the district officers have not yet been received by the Secretary of State.

RAILWAY FROM CHITTAGONG TO ASSAM.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India will lay upon the Table the Despatch received by him from the Government of India in July last, recommending the granting of a concession of land 7,500 miles in extent to a syndicate of railway promoters, as one of the conditions for the construction of a railway from Chittagong to Assam, together with any Correspondence thereon; and whether he will state if the Secretary of State has adopted or rejected the recommendations of the Government of India?

SIR J. GORST: In July last the Secretary of State received a Despatch from the Government of India on the subject of the Chittagong-Assam Railway. The contents of this Despatch are incorrectly described in the question. The matter is still under the consideration of the Secretary of State in Council.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman that the contents of the Despatch are correctly or incorrectly described in the question?

SIR J. GORST: I said that they are incorrectly described.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: As the statement has been repeatedly made, can the right hon. Gentleman tell the House what are the correct contents of the Despatch?

SIR J. GORST: No, Sir. I cannot state the contents of the Despatch until the matter has been decided. It is not usual to give such information until a decision has been arrived at.

HALFPENNY POSTAGE CARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury what would be the estimated loss for this year to the Treasury by selling halfpenny postage cards at a halfpenny each in place of the present price?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the estimated loss of revenue would amount to about £61,000 a year.

PERSIAN KURDS.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has received any confirmation of the statement telegraphed to the Daily News of the 19th instant that the Persian Kurds are being constantly supplied with Martini-Henry rifles by the Turkish authorities; that more than 50,000 rifles have been issued from the different Government stores; and that the armament of the Kurds is causing anxiety in Teheran, and alarm among the Armenian and Nestorian Christians, who dread a great massacre?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: We have received no confirmation of the statement referred to; but the British Representative on the spot has described a similar statement, which appeared shortly before it, as absurd.

ASSESSMENT OF RATEABLE PROPERTY IN LONDON.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is necessary for occupiers to answer the questions, Nos. 4, 6, and 7, on the quinquennial "Return for the Assessment of Rateable Property in the Metropolis for the year 1890;" and, whether he is aware that improper use may be made of answers to these questions, and will the penalty be enforced if the questions are not answered?

MR. JACKSON: About 10 years ago the number and character of the questions were modified. The Treasury cannot interfere with an Assessment Committee in the exercise of their powers to call for information; and I do not see in the questions referred to any demand for information which may not fairly be asked in the interests of the taxpayers at large.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): If it is not possible for persons to answer the questions will the penalty be enforced?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member wishes to put another question he had better give notice.

MR. HOWELL: It is the last part of the question of the hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Morton).

MR. JACKSON: As the Treasury have no power to interfere with the Assessment Committee, it is obvious that there would be no power to interfere in the case of penalties.

KILKENNY LUNATIC ASYLUM.

MR. MARUM (Kilkenny, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the constitution of the Board of Governors of the County and City Lunatic Asylum of Kilkenny, and also to that of the Visiting Committee of Her Majesty's Prison of Kilkenny, and that not even one of the names of the three representatives of the ratepayers of county and city appears upon the lists ; and whether, in view of existing vacancies in both bodies, he will have such omission rectified ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I must ask the hon. Gentleman to defer the question for two or three days. Inquiry is being made.

MALTA—MISSION TO THE POPE.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the appointment of an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of high rank to the Pope, in connection with an ecclesiastical matter in the Island of Malta, is in any way connected with the desire of the Pope to be treated with diplomatically, as if he were a Temporal Sovereign ; and if he will explain why the Secretary of State, in making this appointment, has taken a course which this country has so long refused to adopt ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : The answer to the first question is in the negative. Her Majesty's Government in employing Sir Lintorn Simmons on a special Mission in regard to matters affecting the welfare of the people of Malta have not acted inconsistently with the abstinence hitherto to appoint a permanent representative of Her Majesty at the Vatican.

SIR G. CAMPBELL : What I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman is why, in a very small affair of this kind, Her Majesty's Government has thought it necessary to appoint so high a personage as an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary ?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON : The matters treated of will be laid before Parliament at the close of the negotiations, and I think they will not be found to be of very small importance having regard to the size of the Island of Malta.

IRELAND—EVICTIONS AT GWEEDORE AND FALCARRAGH—THE BATTERING RAM.

MR. MAC NEILL : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is true, as stated in the Irish Times of 20th February, that evictions on a large scale are to be carried out next Tuesday in the districts of Gweedore and Falcarragh ; and is the battering ram to be employed in the carrying out of these evictions, and is it to be worked, as in January and April last, by the Royal Irish Constabulary ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I understand that there are evictions impending in the districts named ; but there is no official information as to its being arranged to carry them out on Tuesday next. As a matter of fact, the ram was not used by the constabulary at the evictions in January and April last, and I am not aware that it is to be used at the pending evictions.

MR. MAC NEILL : Is not the right hon. Gentleman aware that I myself, in company with others, saw the battering ram at the police barracks at Falcarragh, and that it was exercised at Gweedore by a detachment of constabulary ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have not followed the hon. Gentleman's proceedings in the public Press or elsewhere. But what he has now stated to the House is not inconsistent with the fact that the battering ram was not used.

MR. MAC NEILL : Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this instrument has been paid for by the landlords, and may be used by the constabulary if brought to the scene of the evictions ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have no information.

ARRESTS AT CLONGOREY.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the promised local inquiry enables him now to state to the House the circumstances connected with the arrests of a number of persons, including the parish priest, at Clongorey, on several days of last week ; and particularly, whether the arrests were made upon warrants ; what were the charges on which the arrests were made ; why the prisoners were first handcuffed, and afterwards admitted to bail ; and upon what legal authority a private dwelling-house was broken into by force ?

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.) had also upon the Paper the following question : To ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the following statement in the Daily News of 20th February :—

"Twenty-nine more workmen were arrested to-day in Clongorey for building houses for the shelter of evicted tenants. The arrests were effected by a force of 100 policemen, and the prisoners were brought handcuffed to Newbridge, and were detained in the Bridewell until 6 o'clock, when they were discharged under bail to appear at Newbridge Petty Sessions to-morrow week. The district has been greatly excited by these arrests ;"

whether it is a fact that on the previous day 14 other tradesmen and labourers engaged in similar work were, with Mr. Everett, their foreman, arrested and brought to Newbridge police barrack ; whether these men at the time of their arrest were working on land from which tenants had been previously evicted, or on land still in occupation of tenants ; why were they handcuffed, or did they show any disposition to evade arrest ; and, on what grounds, or by whose authority, were the forces of the Crown so employed ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : With the permission of the House I shall now also reply to the question of the hon. Member for North Kildare (Mr. Carew) on the same matter. It is a fact that on the 19th inst. 29 labourers or workmen were arrested in the act of converting certain out-offices attached to the farm of Mrs. Kelly at Clongorey into dwelling-houses, in defiance of a precept issued by the Resident Magistrate and served at Mrs. Kelly's residence on the 15th inst. Thirteen of these 29 persons had been arrested for a similar offence on the previous day and discharged, being then cautioned not to repeat the illegal act. The persons were marched to Newbridge, having refused to allow themselves to be conveyed by cars. They were handcuffed in accordance with Constabulary Regulations, an attempt at rescue or escape having been feared. As already stated, 13 of these 29 persons had been arrested on the previous day, brought to Newbridge, and discharged. These tenants were working on a farm from which the tenant had not been evicted, as she had paid her rent, it is alleged, with the approval of the managers of the Plan of Campaign conspiracy on the property, the object being to retain the farm as an accommodation for tenants evicted in consequence of the adoption of the Plan of Campaign. The constabulary acted in pursuance of a legal order issued by a Resident Magistrate, under powers vested in him by the 23 and 24 Vict., c. 154, section 35, and this precept was issued on a sworn information made by the agent to the estate, who deposed to having witnessed persons in the act of committing a gross act of waste within the meaning of the Statute quoted. The dwelling-house of Mrs. Kelly was broken into in pursuance of a warrant issued by a Resident Magistrate to arrest persons who had been engaged in an unlawful assembly, and who were seen by the police inside the house. As the inmates refused to admit the police they were compelled to force the door.

MR. MACNEILL : Was the precept served upon Mrs. Kelly as well as upon the 13 persons who were arrested ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I understand that Mrs. Kelly was absent, and that the precept was served on her daughter.

MR. SEXTON : Has the right hon. Gentleman any information as to the arrest of the parish priest ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Yes ; the parish priest was arrested, as he was engaged in an illegal conspiracy.

SEA FISHERY STATISTICS.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if statistics showing the quantities of the various kinds of sea fish landed in England and Wales are now systematically collected at the ports and fishing villages along the coast, and furnished to the Sea Fishery Department of the Board of Trade ; if these important Returns are at present available for the information of those interested in the different localities, and particularly for the use and guidance of the local Sea Fishery Committees to be appointed ; and if these figures, indicating to some extent the localisation of the various kinds of fish, cannot be included in the forthcoming statistics of the Sea Fishery Department for the past year ?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH : My answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. The information collected would be at the service of the local Sea Fisheries Committees and of parties locally interested, on these applying to the Board of Trade, who would afford every facility which may not involve disclosure of individual returns. The quantities and value of fish landed at particular ports are already shown in the annual Return with as much detail as has been found consistent with not unduly swelling it. If the hon. Member will intimate to the Department what further details may be desired, the matter will be considered.

MR. ROWNTREE: May I also ask how many applications for the formation of Sea Fishery Committees have as yet been received, and from how many County Councils and Municipal Corporations respectively; if there are any considerable portions of the East Coast of England concerning which no such applications have been made; and if copies of any Schemes for the representation of the different fishing interests affected, sanctioned by the Board of Trade, may be laid upon the Table for the information of Members of this House?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Fifteen actual applications for the formation of sea fisheries districts have been received, namely, 11 from Councils of counties or county boroughs, one from a municipal borough, two from Boards of Salmon Conservators, and one from a Harbour Authority. But in the case of proposals for combined districts, one application usually covers several counties or boroughs. The applications, or notices of intended application, which have been received cover the whole East Coast of England, with the exception of the portion between Ingoldmells Point, in Lincolnshire, and Aldborough, in Suffolk, Norfolk being the only entire county on that coast in respect of which no application, or notice of application, has been received. An Order conferring the powers of a Local Fisheries Committee on the Southampton Harbour Board was laid upon the Table of the House last Session, and Orders for the creation of the Cornwall and Northumberland sea fisheries districts will, I hope, shortly be laid before the House, and these will show the arrangements sanctioned by the Board of Trade for the representation of the different fishing interests affected.

THE SALFORD GAS FRAUDS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, considering the charges of gross corruption in connection with the gas contracts of the Salford Corporation, the fact that its late engineer is now undergoing a long period of imprisonment for participation in the frauds which were perpetrated, the charges that are now being made of other acts of corruption, and the accusations against members of that Corporation of complicity in attempting to condone the offences of those who were parties to the frauds, the Government will consent to the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the allegations that have been made, and the mode of contracting carried on by the Gas Committee of that Corporation?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed that a Petition of the inhabitants of Salford, praying for the appointment of a Commission to inquire into this matter, is now in course of preparation. Pending its receipt, and a more full and exact statement than I have yet had of the grounds on which the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry is demanded, the Government are not in a position to say what action on their part, if any, may be necessary.

IRISH BUTTER.

MR. SHEEHAN (Kerry, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the correspondence and articles which appeared recently in the Irish Press, alleging that the values of Irish butter are materially reduced owing to the depreciation of the standard of the brands affixed to the butters inspected in Cork Butter Market, which is regulated by the provisions of a recent Act of Parliament; and whether any Government Department in Ireland has the power to hold an inquiry into the matter and to enforce any necessary reforms?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no official information on the subject of this question. But the Trustees of the Market state that the prices of Cork-branded butter compare as favourably now as ever with the prices obtained for any other butters. So far as I am aware, the reply to the inquiry in the second paragraph is in the negative.

REGISTRARS OF COUNTY COURTS.

MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether any vacancy in the office of Registrar of County Courts has taken place since the passing of "The County Courts Act, 1888," when the salary and fees of such office, and of the office of District Registrar held with it, exceed £1,000 per annum; and whether the Lord Chancellor has in any such case directed that any newly-appointed Registrar shall devote the whole of his time to the duties of his office?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I am informed that no case has yet arisen.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Samuel Thomas Evans, esquire, for the County of Glamorgan (Mid-Division).

NOTICES OF MOTION.

IRELAND—THE REPORT OF THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): On behalf of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian I desire to give notice that, on Monday next, when the First Lord of the Treasury makes the Motion of which he has given notice with reference to the Report of the Special Commission, the Member for Mid Lothian will move to omit all the words after the word "House," in line 5 of the Motion, in order to insert the following words:—

"This House deems it to be a duty to record its reprobation of the false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based upon calumny and forgery, which have been brought against Members of this House, and particularly against Mr. Parnell, and, while declaring its satisfaction at the exposure of these calumnies, the House expresses its regret for the wrong inflicted and the suffering and loss endured through a protracted period by reason of these acts of flagrant iniquity."

SIR C. LEWIS (Antrim, N.): With reference to the notice just given, I beg to give notice that, in the event of the Amendment just read becoming an original Resolution, I shall move to add thereto—

"This House nevertheless deplores that, by such Report, it is further found—first, that John Dillon, William O'Brien, and seven other Members of this House were parties to a treasonable conspiracy; and, secondly, that Charles Stewart Parnell, John Dillon, William O'Brien, Thomas P. O'Connor, Timothy M. Healy, and 38 other Members of this House were parties to the criminal conspiracy described in such Report; and this House is of opinion that the conduct of such Members in those particulars is deserving of severe condemnation."

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I referred on Friday last to the necessity that I should be under of asking the House for facilities for Supply. I assume that the Address will be voted this evening, and that it will not be necessary for me to ask the House to conclude the debate to-morrow by any formal Motion. Therefore, I now give formal notice that at the sitting of the House to-morrow I propose to ask the House to give facilities for Supply during the week.

MR. J. MORLEY: Will that except Wednesdays?

MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; I propose to except Wednesdays.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): Will the right hon. Gentleman state what facilities he is going to ask for?

MR. W. H. SMITH: I propose to ask for Tuesday and Friday.

MOTION.

IRELAND—EVICTIONS AT CLONGOREY.

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.

(4.25.) MR. SEXTON, Member for West Belfast, rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House, for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the illegal and violent course of conduct by which the Irish Executive are endeavouring to prevent the provision of shelter for the evicted tenants of Clongorey, and are thereby endangering the public peace and the lives of homeless families; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. Speaker called on those Members who supported the Motion to rise in their places, and not less than 40 Members having accordingly risen,

(4.27.) MR. SEXTON: I beg to move the Adjournment of the House, and I do so for the purpose of bringing to the notice of the House with the expedition which the matter requires a statement of facts constituting in my humble judgment a case which the House will, find to be abundantly definite, and which I venture to hope, the House will consider to be urgent. I ask hon. Members of all parties candidly to consider whether the course of conduct which I shall have to describe would be ventured upon by the Government in any part of Great Britain ; and, if not, whether there is any adequate reason, or any reason whatever, why such a course of conduct should be indulged in even in Ireland? The name of Clongorey is, unfortunately, not new to this House. It has been made, unhappily, too familiar. Last year, after a number of families had been evicted from their homes on this estate, a body of emergency men went to these houses in the dead of night carrying with them a stock of petroleum. They were accompanied by a force of armed police, and in the dead of night they gave these houses to the flames, and left standing in the whole of that village but one house which was required for the use of the police. That outrage sent a thrill of horror through the whole community. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he did not in express terms approve of it, at any rate did not condemn it, and to the substantial encouragement which he gave on that occasion I attribute the developments which it is now my duty to describe. I may inform the House that these Clongorey farms are simply minute strips of reclaimed bog-land obtained by cutting away the bog which forms the bed or bottom of the land after the turf has been removed. These strips of land were reclaimed exclusively by the labour of the tenants. Every penny of value which has been given to the land is the result of the labour of the tenants, who have built the houses which stand on the holdings with their own hands. Not only are the houses erected on mere strips of reclaimed bog, the equitable value of which belongs to the tenants, but it was originally the system to allow the tenants to remain in possession of them for nothing. Not only are they strips of bog-land, but they lie lower than the adjacent river. In the year 1886, there occurred a disastrous flood, by which the tenants' scanty crops were destroyed and their farms seriously injured. The tenants applied to the landlord for an allowance—or, perhaps, I should not say to the landlord, because, in the case of the Clongorey estate, as in that of so many other estates which have become notorious—the landlord has lost or forfeited the right to control the property, and the right has vested in three trustees, one of whom resides in Wexford, another here in London, while a third is living in Denmark. The tenants asked for an allowance to be spent on the grass lands, and a full allowance of one year's rent, which would have gone a little way towards enabling them to cope with the misfortune that had overtaken them. The tenants were very moderate. They merely asked for an allowance of 35 per cent. on the non-judicial rents, and of 25 per cent. on the judicial rents, which claim they subsequently reduced to 30 per cent. in the first case, and 20 per cent. in the latter. The trustees offered an abatement of 10 per cent. on the non-judicial rents, and in the case of the judicial rents they refused to allow one penny, although the judicial tenants had suffered equally with the others by the flood. The Trustees, however, seemed to think that the judicial tenants had committed an unpardonable offence in having gone to Court to get fair rents fixed. As a matter of course, evictions then began ; but some of the tenants who had been left in possession managed to find their way to the County Court for the purpose of getting fair rents fixed. The Judge of the County Court in that district, Dr. Darley, is a well-known Conservative, and I do not think he will resent my describing him as a strong Tory. Well, that County Court Judge, on the report of the land valuer, reduced the rents of those tenants to an average of more than 30 per cent., though in some cases the reduction was as much as 40 per cent., and in others as much as 50 per cent.; at any rate, the permanent reductions allowed by this Conservative gentleman were greater than were asked by the tenants in respect of a special claim. But the County Court Judge did more than reduce the rents ; he made two suggestions to the landlord. In the first place, he urged on the landlord that these farms were poor, isolated strips of bog-land, and recommended that the tenants, who had built the houses themselves and had been ruined by the flood, should have the arrears due from them altogether extinguished ; indeed, the learned Judge used some remarkable language from the Bench. He said: "It is absurd to tell me that these arrears can be paid;" but although he urged the landlord to extinguish them altogether his appeal was unheeded. He then made another suggestion, namely, that if the arrears were not extinguished, they should be reduced according to the scale on which the new rents had just been determined. If the Government had given to Ireland the same clause which they gave to Scotland, enabling the county Judge to deal with the arrears and, if necessary, extinguish them, or at any rate to reduce them, Judge Darley would have wiped off the arrears due upon these miserable patches of bog-land, and I assert that it is entirely due to the Government that these miserable tenants at Clongorey are not in their homes to-day. The second suggestion of the Judge—that the arrears should be reduced—was also ignored, the landlord and the trustees refusing to take off one penny; and it is for these unreduced arrears that, in defiance of the Judgment of the Court, these wretched people have been evicted. I should also say that the County Court Judge pointed out that the tenants never had been able to pay their rent out of the produce of the land, and it was only by reason of their being allowed to cut turf from an adjacent bog that they had been able to make any payment at all. It seems a melancholy thing that not a penny could be paid out of the holdings themselves, and it is a still more melancholy thing to find that the landlord has taken away the right of cutting turf, and has thus deprived the tenants of their only means of paying rent. Well, Sir, on the 7th and 8th of the present month twelve families were evicted for non-payment of the unreduced arrears, and all hope of shelter in their own homes was taken away from them on the following day when a force of emergency men, encouraged by the acts of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary, went to the scene of the evictions, cut down the roofs of the houses with hatchets and saws, levelled the walls with crowbars, and carried out the demolition of each of the houses, accompanying the work in each case with a round of cheers. The people meanwhile stood by and looked on as witnesses of this outrage and wanton destruction, there being among them some of the tenants who had built these houses. Nevertheless, the crowd stood by and never by act or word attempted to interfere. It is an evil lesson which the Government teaches when peacefulness is rewarded as the peacefulness of these poor people has been. The neighbours endeavoured to find shelter for the evicted families, and one of the tenants, Mrs. Mary Kelly—the most substantial tenant on the estate, who has paid her rates and is in possession of all the rights of tenancy—determined to make some alterations in the out-houses of her farm for the purpose of providing shelter. A number of artisans—masons, carpenters, and others—were consequently engaged from the adjoining towns, and went to the farm for the purpose of altering those out-buildings. They set to work, and the additional buildings were erected. On Saturday, the 15th inst., Mrs. Kelly was served with a precept signed by Colonel Forbes, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to read that document to the House, as the purport of it is not nearly conveyed by anything I have seen in the Press. One account of it is that it was to direct the tenant to desist from making these alterations; another is that it called on her to appear on a subsequent occasion at Petty Sessions and show cause why she should not be ordered to desist. This precept appears to me to be a very curious document. It certainly rests on the authority of the Landlord and Tenant (Ireland) Act of 1860; but the provisions of that Act are directed against unlawful waste, and the procedure of the tenant on this occasion in regard to out-houses built by herself on her own farm could not be held to be a procedure tending to produce unlawful waste; on the contrary, it would be rather to improve the value of the property, and render it worth more to the landlord. But proceedings had been initiated in the Court of Queen's Bench, and am I to be told that in this civil case, as between one subject and another, it was competent to any one to determine the law before it had been decided by the Superior Court, and not only to call on the tenant to appear at the next Court of Petty Sessions at Newbridge, but actually to proceed to the employment of force for the purpose of compelling the tenant to desist from what she was doing? The tenant, perceiving that the question at issue was to be decided by the Queen's Bench, or by the Newbridge magistrates at Petty Sessions, directed the workmen to go on with their work. The men, acting on this direction, remained at work, and on Tuesday last a body of police marched out from Newbridge to Mrs. Kelly's farm. They found some 15 men at work, and arrested them all, without warrant. I have always understood that a man cannot be arrested without warrant except in a case of felony, and I suppose that even the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary will hardly pretend that a felony had been committed here. The men were marched into the town of Newbridge, and having been brought before Colonel Forbes, were, after an imprisonment of some hours, discharged. Now, the question I have to ask is, why were those men arrested? I submit that the Statute of 1860 dealing with unlawful waste does not provide for arrest. It enacts that, where anybody commits what is termed unlawful waste, a precept may be issued, and that course of procedure is that anybody disobeying that precept may be brought before Petty Sessions and rendered liable to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding one calendar month. I say that the course of procedure in this case should have been by summons, and that to proceed by arrest was, in my judgment, illegal. Why should these workmen have been arrested? They were doing a day's work, and earning a day's wages. Am I to be told that an Irish carpenter or stonemason engaged by an Irish farmer to do a day's work is obliged, before he enters upon that work, to inquire, under penalty of jeopardising his liberty, and satisfy himself as to the right or wrong of a technical legal question of unlawful waste as between landlord and tenant? That question is determinable as a matter of equity by a Court of Superior Jurisdiction. It comes to this, that an Irish workman when pursuing his day's work will have to go about with a lawyer to represent him. I say these men had a right to do their work, and that the operation of the precept only extended to the tenant. These 15 men were discharged in the course of the day. On Wednesday a large force of police, I believe about 100 men, marched out of the town to Mrs. Kelly's farm. They found 29 men at work, and arrested and handcuffed them. When a question was put to him, the Chief Secretary raised the pretence that these men were handcuffed because a rescue was apprehended. Did not the men submit quietly to arrest on the previous day? Did they not go to the barracks quietly? What substantial reason then had police to apprehend a rescue or an attempt at escape? Father Kinsella was present on this occasion at the farm. Father Kinsella is a man advanced in years; he is a man of whom very little has been heard in Irish life; he is a person of a singularly quiet, gentle, and retiring disposition—a man held in the highest esteem by all with whom he comes in contact. Father Kinsall protested against the usage to which these poor artisans were subjected, for no worse crime than doing their day's work. The 29 men arrested on the Wednesday were released on bail at 6 o'clock that evening with a caution, and to appear again at the subsequent Petty Sessions. The rising temper of the police, and the increasing audacity of those in command of them, is shown by the fact, that two men in Newbridge, who simply cheered on the Wednesday, were arrested and ordered, on bail, to appear to a charge of riotous behaviour. I now come to the third day. On that day a force of 100 police marched from Newbridge to the farm, this time with fixed bayonets—so the course of events progressed. They found the house closed. They broke into it with the crowbars of the emergency men, who are the allies of the police. The right hon. Gentleman has been asked to day why they broke into the house. He says they had a warrant. I venture to think he has been misled. Can you with a warrant break into a house where the charge is not one of felony? I am informed that the police were asked to show their warrant, and they did not do so, and, until good reason is shown to the contrary, I shall maintain that their refusal to exhibit it is sufficient proof that they had no warrant. They broke into the house, certainly. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Lowther), who was once Chief Secretary for Ireland, appears to be much amused by the statement I have just made.

Does he mean to say that a police officer having a warrant for a certain purpose, can, in the execution of that purpose, break into a person's house? The police are obliged to show their warrant, and their failure in this instance to do so is a satisfactory proof that they had no warrant. The police, having broken into the house, arrested 17 working men, and handcuffed them. I must protest that this handcuffing was a wanton and cruel outrage, and I think the same view will be taken of it by men of their own class—the artisans of the United Kingdom. I think the act was not only cruel but injudicious, and the right hon. Gentleman forgets, as his subordinates appear to forget, that men of precisely the same class as those artisans who have been arrested, are now potentially the rulers of this Kingdom. Sir, I have now to give proof of the most deadly malice on the part of those in control of the police. They arrested these men after dark on Thursday evening, and, instead of going by the direct way to the barracks, which is through a street deserted at that time of night, they made a detour with their prisoners through a part of the town which is always crowded at that hour of the evening. They did it for no other conceivable cause than to get among the people with these prisoners in custody. They laid about them accordingly with their batons. One man had his eyeball burst by the blow of a baton. The skull of another man was fractured, and he lies at this moment in danger of death. A respectable tradesman of the town was dragged out of his open doorway. His hat was snatched off, and then, I suppose by a natural sequence, he was knocked down and kicked about brutally. The Chairman of the Town Council was violently assaulted. In driving themselves among the people with their prisoners the police obtained a pretext for this savage assault. The prisoners were lodged in the barracks. A local solicitor asked to be admitted. Admission was refused. The men arrested on the Tuesday and Wednesday had been released the same evening. The men arrested on the Thursday were kept all night. They were herded together all night in one small room, which was without any means of ventilation. On the Friday morning the Chairman of the Town Council and two other gentlemen offered bail for these honest and respectable artisans. They were hurried and hustled away from the police barracks. You are very often asking for sureties in Ireland under the Statute of Edward III., but if a surety presents himself you chase him away with batons. On Friday morning a Castle Magistrate, Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald made his appearance in the town of Newbridge. Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald is a magistrate who has distinguished himself by hustling soldiers and counsel out of his Court, and when persons accused before him expressed discontent at being undefended, he commits them to prison week after week for contempt of Court. In the case of my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork, his counsel (the hon. Member for Longford) was expelled from the Court, and when my hon. Friend the Member for Mid Cork expressed his indignation at the plight in which he was left, the magistrate listened quietly on the Bench until my hon. Friend had concluded. Then, after an absence of 15 minutes, Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald returned with an elaborate warrant, which he could not have drawn up in the time, and, in the exercise of a jurisdiction never before exercised, and never suspected to be in existence, he sent my hon. Friend to spend three months in prison. Well, the appearance of this gentleman in Newbridge, on Friday last, was signalled by a second baton charge. Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald entered the police barrack; the police sallied out with batons and attacked every one they saw; in point of fact, they acted as if the people were obliged to imprison themselves in their houses, and as if their presence in the streets was a crime. The next step was for the fourth successive day to despatch a party of armed police to Mrs. Kelly's farm; as soon as the police left the town a party of dragoons, 200 in number, marched from the barracks. They came, I assume, by the order of Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald. They were armed with carbines, and they marched with drawn sabres. They took possession of all the approaches to the town. They did not allow any one to pass in or out of that town; throughout the day locomotion was suspended; a funeral happened to come in the way, and they refused to allow it to pass over the bridge; the mourners had to go up the river bank until they came to a ford, over which they passed with some danger to their lives. How they contrived to get the coffin across I have not ascertained. The police meanwhile had proceeded to the farm. They found Father Kinsella, described as a dangerous person, sawing a plank. They arrested him and conveyed him to Newbridge. He was brought before Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald in the police barrack. His solicitor had applied for admission, and had been refused. The case was heard not in public, but in private. The magistrate refused. This gentleman, bred to official life in India, who would not be considered fit for any magisterial function in any part of Great Britain, is considered good enough to exercise very exceptional magisterial functions in any part of Ireland. The solicitor asked that at least one shorthand writer might be admitted to make a record of the proceedings and enable us to have some check on the system of falsehood that is continually applied to these reports in Ireland, but the magistrate refused to admit a solitary shorthand writer. The affair went on in private. Now, I ask what was the charge against the working men? I need not ask what it was against Father Kinsella. I have read the text of the complaint. He was charged with defying and contravening the precept of Colonel Forbes, but the precept of Colonel Forbes was a precept of civil operation dependent on the ultimate decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, and it was directed to the tenant and not to Father Kinsella. It was a precept to show cause at Newbridge Petty Sessions, and before the case came before the Sessions, and before the determination of the question by the Court of Queen's Bench, the magistrate had Father Kinsella arrested for disobeying the precept. I say, that even if Father Kinsella had committed an offence in disobeying the precept, the course was to summon him for that disobedience, to cause him to appear before the next Newbridge Petty Sessions, and at that Petty Sessions, according to the Landlord and Tenant Act of 1860, the utmost penalty that could have been inflicted was imprisonment for a term not exceeding one calendar month. What course was pursued? The charge of disobeying the precept was heard in private in a police barrack. Mr.

Vesey Fitzgerald came to no finding on the charge. Let it be legal or let it be illegal, let it be valid or let it be invalid, Mr. Fitzgerald came to no finding on the charge, but he put it aside, and putting the charge aside, he turned to the Statute of Edward III., and under that—in reference to an act which, if it were an offence at all, was prosecutable, not before an individual, but before a Court of Petty Sessions, and if a Petty Sessions Court convicted was not punishable by a higher sentence than one month—under that statute, I say, this individual magistrate in private took it upon himself to call upon Father Kinsella to find bail himself, and to get two other sureties, to be of good behaviour. Because Father Kinsella refused to confess himself to be a rogue and vagabond by giving and finding bail under this mediæval statute—a statute long obsolete in England, and never at any time, in England or elsewhere, intended for use except against rascals of evil fame—because Father Kinsella refused to confess himself a rogue and vagabond, this gentleman, bred in India, sitting at a private police barrack, in reference to an offence only punishable by one month's imprisonment, sentenced that venerable and respected priest to go for a period of two months to Kilkenny gaol. He is in Kilkenny gaol at the present moment, and he will be there, I suppose, for the next month, if he can so long endure the ordeal. This is the extraordinary condition of society under the personal rule, as he is fond of calling it, of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester. Father Kinsella, in this quiet town, in this quiet county, having been so arrested and condemned, was taken to a railway station by an escort of dragoons, and when the people assembled at the station and peacefully cheered their departing pastor, the third baton charge of that week occurred, and many persons suffered injuries. The first baton charge occurred when the police provoked it, the second signalled the entry of Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, and the third occurred at the departure of the parish priest. There remained to be dealt with the case of the 17 men arrested on the previous day and kept imprisoned in the barracks all night. These humble artisans—whose crime was that they were endeavouring to live, who were earning a day's wages for a day's work, the legality of which was beyond their capacity to settle—had been imprisoned all night and the succeeding day, when their cases came up to be dealt with. I should here state that the solicitor asked the magistrate if he would state a case for a higher Court in regard to the action against Father Kinsella, but the magistrate refused to do so. The creatures and instruments of this Act were not willing that their criminal pranks should be reviewed by any Court. Well, the magistrate took up the case of these 17 men. He refused to proceed with the hearing that day, deciding that the case should be taken on the day following. Late that night there was another riot, and 16 more men were arrested; so that, in order to prevent shelter being given to 70 poor people, old men and women and young babies amongst the number, the Government have arrested and sent to prison one respected clergyman and 70 or 80 blameless artisans. And, now, I come to a curious part of the case. On Saturday, Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald took up the adjourned case of the 17 men arrested on Thursday, and he was asked by the County Inspector to again adjourn the hearing—and let it be noted that these requests for adjournment and all these proceedings were ordered by telegram from Dublin Castle. On Friday a question had been asked in this House as to the nature of the charge against these men. Up to Saturday it had been disobedience to the precept. On Friday the batches of men arrested on Tuesday and Wednesday having been discharged, either with a caution or on bail, the magistrate turned away from the charge before him to the Statute of Edward III. and called on the men to find bail. Though the offence was one determinable by the Court of Petty Sessions, though the maximum penalty provided by law is imprisonment for one month, yet because these men refused to find bail they were committed by the will of this individual magistrate to prison for two months. On the Saturday occurred the change of front; the charge of disobedience to the precept was abandoned—the authorities seeing that if a charge could be maintained at all it could not be so maintained under that name—and the charge of "unlawful conspiracy"

was made. On this charge these 16 men have been called upon to appear before a Coercion Court; that is to say, they are to be tried for an offence which the law declares to be not determinable by a Coercion Court but by a Court of Petty Sessions. Four batches of working men have been treated in four different ways for precisely the same offence—if it were an offence, and I say it was no offence whatever—and after that I submit the question of the consistency and legality of the course of the Irish Government is one on which even the Member for Dover, in spite of his self-assured smile, would find it difficult to satisfy the House. I have laid before the House as definitely as I can the facts of this case. The events which I have referred to are events which have occurred within the last few days in a peaceful district of a peaceful county. The county of Kildare is a county in which the Sessional Judge and the Judge of Assize concur in congratulations to the people on the absence of disorder and crime. The last criminal calendar for the county, if I remember rightly, included just two cases, which were not cases which need alarm the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland as pointing to any danger or disorder. One was of uttering base coin and the other of petty larceny. But what evil lesson is being taught by the Government to that peaceful place? The people are being given to understand that the more peaceful, the more law abiding and patient they are, the more likely are they to be oppressed. I think it is the duty of the House and of the Members of all Parties in the House to put the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary on his defence. He has been in the habit of boasting lately in this House and elsewhere that the rule in Ireland is his personal rule. ["No, no!"] Yes, I have heard him within the last few days call the Government of Ireland "my rule," just as his subordinate, the late Viceroy of Ireland, used to call his Viceroyalty of Ireland "my reign." Discreditable as the fact may be to the House of Commons, the boast of the right hon. Gentleman is that his rule of Ireland is not the rule of the Queen or of the Constitution, or of the law as you understand it and respect and honour it in this country. His rule is that of a horde of unscrupulous, irresponsible instruments, who rely upon the favour of a Minister practically absolute, owing to the conduct of the majority in this House—who rely upon his favour not only to condone but to reward and applaud their worst excesses. I say it is the duty of this House to put the Minister on his defence, and whether this House discharges or disregards its duty, I think the people of England, unless I am very much mistaken—and especially at this moment the electors of North St. Pancras—will look with very particular interest to the judgment of the House upon the series of acts which I have detailed—a series of acts which, in my humble judgment, exceeded in lawless audacity the worst that has hitherto been heard of in the personal rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester, in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That this House do now adjourn.”—
(Mr. Sexton.)

*(5.15.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, East): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down said that the Secretary for Ireland should be put on his defence. The Chief Secretary has not, so far as he is concerned, the slightest objection to the operation, but, on the contrary, he is always glad to have an opportunity of explaining face to face with those who intentionally or unintentionally—and no doubt the hon. Gentleman has done so unintentionally—“misrepresent the condition of things in Ireland. The speech of the hon. Member has travelled over a considerable amount of ground, and some of the observations he has made appear to me to be not altogether relevant to the issue that is now before us. He began by giving us an account of the unhappy condition of the tenants on the Clongorey estate; and I concede this much to the hon. Gentleman—that I believe the estate is a poor one, that the land is indifferent, and that, as invariably happens under these circumstances, the tenants cannot rank amongst the prosperous class of farmers in Ireland. But I fail to gather either from the speech of the hon. Member or my own reflections on the subject any ground whatever for basing on that fact the conclusion that these persons should be allowed to break the law with impunity. Poverty may be an excuse for much. It is not an excuse for deliberate and organised illegality.

MR. SEXTON: It is a reason, in my judgment, why the Government should not prevent distressed people from obtaining shelter.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will deal with the question of shelter in a moment. I say that the shelter that these tenants are said to have required was owing to their having been evicted, and their eviction was itself the result of an illegal conspiracy started and fomented on the estate, by the friends of the hon. Gentleman. I fail to see that the poverty of these men was an excuse for their action, or that of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite. These tenants were not rich or prosperous; but they were, at all events, well enough off to pay money into the campaign funds, and at the earlier stage of the conspiracy to offer to pay the agent, on condition that the Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) was allowed out of prison. Those tenants have a right to their own opinion as to the legality or illegality, the justice or injustice, of the sentence passed on the hon. Member for North-East Cork; but I submit that if the legality or illegality, justice or injustice of a sentence passed by a Court of Law on any man in Ireland is a ground for some other men not fulfilling their obligations, the chaos which already exists in Ireland where the Plan of Campaign is in operation will not be easily mitigated. The hon. Member dealt with another question which I think irrelevant to the question before the House. He gave a version of the incidents which accompanied the destruction of certain houses from which the tenants had been evicted. I think the hon. Gentleman should have been more careful in his statement of the facts. I did not give police protection on the occasion of the destruction of the houses.

MR. SEXTON: The police were there.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Policemen were there because there were caretakers there, and caretakers have to be protected by policemen, on account of the teaching which has always accompanied the institution of the Plan of Campaign. There were no policemen sent for the purpose of protecting the agent. The police were no more than were there under normal conditions protecting the caretakers, and they had no notice whatever of the proceedings which the agent proposed to take. While I absolutely repudiate every sort of responsibility for affording police protection in a transaction which I heard nothing of before it took place, I must add this general observation: that if landlords and agents in Ireland would take my advice they would be extremely sparing of ever using the methods that were employed by the agent on this occasion; but to say that the agent destroyed the property of the tenants is not to state the facts as they are. The tenants had been evicted because they refused, in obedience to an illegal conspiracy, to pay their rents; and they having by their own fault been evicted under circumstances which prevented their taking the legal remedies which the House has provided for the protection of every Irish tenant in the improvements he has made on his holding, the holding belonged absolutely to the landlord. Whether, therefore, the landlord was right or wrong in destroying the houses, at all events he only did what he pleased with his own. The hon. Gentleman has stated that these tenants were turned out in consequence of excessive arrears being exacted from them; and he led the House to believe that they would have been ready to fulfil their obligations if the landlord had been prepared to make a reduction in those arrears proportionate to the reduction made by the County Court Judge in the rents. I have not a full account of the transactions between landlord and tenant; but I have enough to show that that statement is not correct. I understand that last October, three years' rent being due, the agent offered to receive one year's rent, less 25 per cent, that being the reduction subsequently made by the County Court Judge in the permanent rent of those tenants. The hon. Member has quoted some statements made by the County Court Judge in respect of those tenants, implying that he thought the rents very much too high, and that the landlord was acting in a harsh manner.

MR. SEXTON: And that the arrears should be wiped out.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can hardly believe that the hon. Gentleman has given an accurate version of it. As I understand it, there was a decision that there should be a stay of execution till January, and that the tenants should be allowed to remain undisturbed during that period; but that in January one year's rent out of three should be paid. January came, and the one year's rent was not paid. Therefore, I suppose we may take it that the County Court Judge, having all the facts before him, thought it was an equitable arrangement; but the tenants, acting, I presume, under the advice of the leaders of the Plan of Campaign, absolutely refused to accept the terms imposed by the Judge on that occasion.

MR. SEXTON: The County Court Judge said it was impossible for the landlord to get those arrears; that the poor tenants had built the houses and reclaimed the land from bog; and that it was absurd to say that the tenants could pay.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: But the County Court Judge ordered the tenants to pay one year's rent in January. The tenants have declined to carry out that arrangement. I come now to the action of the police and the magistrates. As I understand the indictment of the hon. Gentleman it consists of two parts. He thinks, in the first place, that the action of the police and the magistrates was harsh, and in the second place that it was illegal. The accusation of harshness rests upon the undoubted fact that those workmen were arrested and handcuffed. The hon. Member forgot to tell the House that the police had provided transport for the prisoners; that the prisoners refused to use it; that the police were inferior in number; and that the general condition of things in Newbridge justified the police in believing that a rescue might be attempted. I have more than once stated to the House my opinion that it is desirable to discourage absolutely the use of handcuffing except in cases where it is absolutely necessary, but that it must, from the nature of the case, be left to the discretion of the officer commanding to decide when it is necessary. I do not know a case in Ireland which has come to my knowledge in which the discretion has been abused. The next allegation of the hon. Member was that the police took the prisoners not by the shortest route but by a long and roundabout way, in order that they might have the pleasure of batoning the crowd. The hon. Member must have known that such a charge is extravagant to the verge of absurdity. It is perfectly true that the way which the police went was not the shortest, but it was by far the widest, best lighted, and most convenient; and there would have been no batoning if the inhabitants of the town had allowed the police to take their prisoners quietly before the magistrate. The hon. Gentleman told the House that one person lost his eye, and that another had his skull fractured. The information which I have received does not bear out that statement. I believe that two persons were injured; but, so far from one having lost an eye, or another having had his skull fractured, they were, I believe, going about next day. The third case of what the hon. Gentleman called brutality was with regard to the alleged action of the military in stopping a funeral. The hon. Gentleman said—and, I think, said truly—that respect should have been shown, or, at all events, that a large amount of licence might have been granted to a funeral going to a place of interment. Perhaps the hon. Gentleman is not aware that the funeral was not going to the place of interment, but was coming back from it; and I think he will admit that simple statement of fact deprives his allegations on the subject of most of its point.

MR. SEXTON: They had as good a right to come back as to go.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: They had as good a right to come back as to go; but they went not by right but by favour. If they went through public streets, where the traffic had to be stopped for the purpose of preserving public order, they went not by right but by favour; and if they came back through streets where the traffic had to be stopped they came back not by right but by favour. The hon. Gentleman gave no reason why the favour should be extended to a funeral returning.

MR. SEXTON: There was this special reason—that their homes lay on the other side of the bridge.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not the slightest doubt that the funeral did desire to come back by the bridge. That is not denied; but the whole of that part of the speech of the hon. Gentleman was founded on this—that a dead body was in the funeral cortège.

MR. SEXTON: I said I had not heard whether the corpse was there or not.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The phrase the hon. Gentleman used was that the funeral might be respected until its functions had been discharged. I apprehend that when the dead was buried its functions had been discharged. I pass now to the far more important question of the legality or illegality of the action of the police and the magistrate in the case. I understand that the first charge brought against the police was that on the first three or four days with which we are concerned arrests were made upon the precept under the Act of 1860 issued by the magistrate. On the face of it the precept entirely justified the arrests. If the right hon. Gentleman opposite will refer to the Statute in question he will see that it distinctly contemplates arrests. So far, therefore, there is no ground for complaint unless the arrests were illegal; and if they were illegal there is a summary method by which any such illegality may be punished. The arrests having thus been legally made under the Act of 1860, on the first day the men on being brought before the magistrate were cautioned and sent away, and next day they repeated the offence. The hon. Gentleman says that these labourers were earning their bread; and he asked, were the labourers to be obliged to carry about with them a revised edition of the Statutes in order to see whether they were acting illegally or not? Well, every labourer in Ireland may assume that when he is brought before a magistrate and told his action is illegal, and further, that at the next Petty Sessions his case will be brought up for final decision, that if he persists in his action he is breaking the law. The hon. Member appears to assume that this precept has only a provisional operation, and has no binding efficacy until it is finally decided at Petty Sessions. But if the hon. Gentleman will look at the words of the Statute and the precept he will see that is not the case, and the magistrate in absolutely forbidding under the precept any further waste being committed was acting entirely in accordance with the law as it is now.

MR. SEXTON: The labourers were ordered to show cause. Does not that imply that the precept was a conditional document dependent on the decision of the Court?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am advised that the precept is not as the hon. Gentleman supposes — a conditional document, but an absolute document. Well, these labourers, having been arrested and having been cautioned by the magistrate, went back and repeated the offence, and on that occasion they were bound over and let out. Some of them went back a third time, and for the third time committed the offence. Then they were bound over under the Statute of Edward III. Next, when they committed the offence a fourth time, they, or some of them, were arrested and brought before the magistrate, and they were summoned to appear before a Crimes Act Court for illegal assembly, of which, I presume, it is hardly denied they were guilty.

MR. SEXTON: On the third occasion they were thrown into a cell and kept there all night, and finally they were sent to prison under the Statute of Edward III.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The third time they were ordered to give bail, and sent to prison in default, and the fourth time they were summoned to appear before a Crimes Act Court under the charge of illegal assembly. What is the extraordinary criticism which the hon. Gentleman passes on this transaction? He says that for the same offence four different methods of procedure were adopted, and he bases on that an invective against the arbitrary and illegal government of Ireland. It appears to me that the action of the magistrate was the most merciful which could be adopted. On the first occasion, when the men might be presumed to be ignorant, they were warned and sent away. On the second occasion, when they must have known that they were committing an offence, they were discharged and summoned. On the third occasion they were bound over under the Statute of Edward III., and it was not until the offence was committed for the fourth time that they were summoned for illegal assembly. The hon. Gentleman has taken occasion to trot out ancient and somewhat threadbare observations upon the Statute of Edward III. He says that it is a statute obsolete in England, and only recently brought into operation in Ireland. That statement has been refuted over and over again. From the days of Edward III., down to 1890, that statute has been in constant use in England as well as in Ireland. [Mr. SEXTON: Against respectable people?] Against people who are expected to break the law. I will not compete with the hon. Gentleman in defining respectability. This Act of Edward III. is not obsolete; it is part of the common procedure of this country, and in Ireland there have been thousands of cases during the last 20 years in which it has been employed, and to say that we are taking down from some ancient armoury this rusty weapon of oppression is to misrepresent the best known facts of criminal legal procedure in this country as well as in Ireland. The last point which the right hon. Gentleman took exception to was the treatment of Father Kinsella. But it is clear from all the circumstances of the case that the one great object of that gentleman was to be sent to prison. He was warned that his action was illegal, and he replied that he would persevere in it whether it was legal or illegal, and a man who publicly declares his intention of persisting in illegal action cannot complain if he is bound over to keep the peace. The hon. Gentleman alleges that the magistrate acted harshly in making two months' imprisonment the alternative to giving bail to be of good behaviour, because he says the maximum penalty for the offence was only one month. But what Father Kinsella was guilty of was unlawful assembly, for which, according to the law both of England and Ireland, the maximum penalty is not two months, but two years' imprisonment.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask what was "unlawful assembly?" Was it disobedience to the precept, which says one month's imprisonment?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Father Kinsella's offence was, I take it, open and violent defiance of the administration of the law, and a man declared guilty of persisting in an illegal course cannot complain if he is taken out of the category of respectable persons. I think I have now gone over most of the specific allegations of the hon. Member. Before coming to a determination in this case I would ask the House to bear in mind a fact which the hon. Member has not referred to—namely, that for three years the Plan of Campaign has been in operation on this estate. The hon. Gentleman told us that Kildare is a quiet county, and that Judges and Magistrates have exchanged congratulations on its peacefulness. No doubt Kildare as a whole is a quiet county. But in Kildare, as in other counties, there is an exception to be made in respect of those districts where the Plan of Campaign exists. There it is that you have this violent resistance to the law, there it is that you have riotous assemblies, there it is that you have the forces of the Crown brought into conflict with the people. The persons responsible for this are those who started the Plan, not those who oppose it. The hon. Member began by stating that in no other portion of the United Kingdom would such proceedings as these on the part of the executive be tolerated. The hon. Gentleman is wrong. If day after day an illegal and disorderly crowd persisted in breaking the law, the law of this country would be strong enough to keep them in order. Are we to be told that because the Clongorey estate is poor, and the tenants are not prosperous and have joined the Plan of Campaign, they are therefore to be allowed to break the law precisely to the extent they desire? It appears to me that the magistrate acted legally when he issued his precept, and that that precept having been defied no action was open to the authorities but that which they took. I hope the House in voting upon this question will see that we are practically asked to say that the law may be broken with impunity when the law breakers are backed up by a powerful conspiracy, and that no heavier blow could be struck at the prosperity of Ireland.

*(5.50.) SIR CHARLES RUSSELL (Hackney): I think there are few who have listened to the course of this debate who will be disposed to deny that the hon. Member who moved the Adjournment of the House was perfectly justified in the course he took, for it will be admitted that it was startling to have announced to the House that, under the circumstances which have been detailed, somewhere about 80 persons have been arrested, some at one period and some at another. Taking the facts as stated by the hon. Gentleman, and not contradicted by the right hon. Gentleman, it appears that there being a number of evicted tenants houseless and homeless on this estate, one of the tenants, a Mrs. Kelly by name, allowed certain alterations to be made in the out-offices attached to her farm with a view to giving some kind of shelter to these poor houseless persons. She was doing that upon a farm, which in point of law was her farm in part, and the landlord's farm in part, for it is too late in the day to deny that a tenant's farm is partly his and partly the landlord's. A number of men were engaged, and peaceably engaged, until the interference of the police, in doing what may, without exaggeration, be termed an act of mercy—erecting shelter for the houseless. Then someone on behalf of the trustees of the estate applied to the magistrate under the ill-omened Statute of 1860 for a precept forbidding such work. I do not desire to discuss this question in any narrow spirit of technicality, and I will, for the purpose of argument, admit that the grant of the precept was within the authority of the magistrate, and that under that precept the constable charged with the execution of it could lawfully make arrests. But I deny that the statute under which this precept was issued was ever intended to deal criminally with such cases as this. It was a gross abuse of the technical and literal powers given by the statute, to apply it to any such case. The Attorney General for Ireland will not deny that Section 35, under which the precept was issued, was aimed mainly at wilful waste on the part of the tenant—waste designed to injure and calculated to depreciate the property of the landlord. I will admit, for the purpose of my argument, that there was a technical right of arrest, but what was the moral justification for the arrest? What was there in the circumstances that would have rendered the ordinary proceeding by summons inadequate to the occasion, and how comes it that the force of police—it looks as if they desired to invite a conflict with the people—that the force of armed police went out for the purpose of making arrests upon the extensive scale they did? Now, let me correct the right hon. Gentleman. He says Father Kinsella was charged with unlawful assembly. Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the magistrate could inquire into that charge, and send a man to gaol for two months—[Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: I never did say so]—or send him to gaol for any period? Did the right hon. Gentleman say that Father Kinsella was charged with unlawful assembly? Surely he did.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I did not intend to say so.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I accept the right hon. Gentleman's statement of what he intended to say, but I beg to assure him he made the statement. The charge against Father Kinsella was, in the words of the precept, that he did, with the other defendants, "assemble on the premises of Mary Kelly for the purpose of proceeding with certain works, namely, the enlargement"—not the destruction or the committal of waste, mark you—"of certain out-houses." This was contrary to the precept, which laid it down that the defendants' proceedings were calculated to create a breach of the peace. Does that justify the proceedings of the magistrate? No, it does not. The offence charged is contravention of the precept, and I wish to know what power or authority the magistrate had to deal with any charge of unlawful assembly. Under the statute it is distinct and specific, after the service by posting of the precept, the punishment is one month's imprisonment and one month only. Ah! but why is this other proceeding resorted to? Because the magistrates know that when under such circumstances honourable men, men respected by their fellows, are called upon to give bail for good behaviour, they regard it as a slur upon their character to which they ought not to be subjected. Therefore it is that resort is had to these proceedings, and this old Statute of Edward III. is misused for the purpose of inflicting a heavier punishment than the magistrate could otherwise inflict. The right hon. Gentleman says the Statute of Edward III. is in force in this country, and of course I know it is, but it has never been applied to such cases as these in England. Refer me to any case where a man holding a responsible position such as this gentleman did—I do not refer to the others for the moment—whose address was known, who had lived his life in the presence of his fellows, and was respected by those who knew him; tell me any case where in England a man in this position has been proceeded against under the Statute of Edward III. This statute has been often referred to, and it might be worth while to call attention to it more particularly. It would be useless to quote the old Norman French. This statute provides that in each county there shall be magistrates whose duty shall be to restrain offenders, and among other duties imposed is that of arresting all "pillers and robbers from beyond seas who have come again, and go wandering, and will not labour as they were wont." Also to arrest such as may be suspected of offences and are not of good fame, and who may be required to give sufficient surety and mainprize for good behaviour. Now, I noticed there was one point in the allegations made of illegality in the action of the police and the authorities on the occasion to which the right hon. Gentleman has not adverted; I mean the breaking of doors.

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I forgot that.

*SIR CHARLES RUSSELL: I say at once it is a criminal proceeding against the spirit of the statute of 1860, for there is no evidence of real waste of property, and it was an insidious method of preventing protection and shelter being given to these people. I say further, that if the arrests were lawful under that Act, they were not needed. It was a wanton disturbance of the peace to bring the police under such circumstances with such a show of armed force, when, names and addresses being well known, a summons would have accomplished the same purpose. The breaking of the doors under the circumstances was illegal. I do not know whether I differ from my learned Friends on this point, but I understand that the doors may be broken after first demanding admission and being refused, or when the person inside is under indictment or known to have committed treason or felony, or has inflicted a dangerous wound, or has escaped from lawful custody; or when a constable can hear that violence is being committed within the house a door may be broken to arrest an offender or suppress an affray when the party within refuses to open on demand. In this case there was, it seems to me on the facts stated, no power to break open the door, and in that particular there has been a violation of the law. Does anyone who has heard the right hon. Gentleman accept the justification he has offered for the handcuffing of this large number of men? I could refer to cases where actions have been brought in this country and heavy damages awarded against officers who, without full justification, of which a jury, and not a policeman, judged, handcuffed individuals unnecessarily, even when charged with serious offences. These are not small and unimportant matters, and are not so regarded in Ireland. For myself I feel little interested in discussing the mere details of what I conceive to be the despotic Government of the right hon. Gentleman. I confess I think it is to a great extent waste of time. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman may be good or it may be bad, but it is not a system which can long stand side by side with a Government supposed to be based on constitutional principles; one or the other must go. I have only discussed the details in this case because it is an instance of the absolute manner in which the right hon. Gentleman in every case stands by those whom he looks to for enforcing the laws, however brutal, however unfeeling their conduct may be, however much they may disregard the rights of private liberty. I say it is an instance, one of a great many we have had, and I think the House is indebted to the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Sexton) for calling our attention to it.

*(6.10.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I will endeavour in the few observations I have to make to avoid discussing this matter in a narrow and technical spirit. The hon. and learned Gentleman has raised a very broad issue which, to a certain extent, is an issue of law. He has referred to the Act of 1860, which he has called an ill-omened Act. It is not for me, and this is not the occasion, to criticise the Act of 1860. That Act has in its spirit been departed from in modern legislation, whether rightly or wrongly it is not for me now to discuss, but this I say, that the provision of the Act now under discussion is as relevant to the relations between landlord and tenant now as on the day after the Act was passed. I mean the sections that provide the means of temporarily arresting proceedings complained of on the ground of waste pending the adjudication of a competent tribunal. But the broad question to which the hon. and learned Gentleman invites the attention of the House is this: he says, An Act of Parliament in this particular case has been wrested from its proper application, that it has been applied to what is not legally really and substantially within the conditions imposed by the Act. Now, with all the hon. and learned Member's research, I do not think he could have read the twenty-third volume of "Law Reports," Ireland, and if he thinks it worth while further to consider the question which has been raised by this Motion for the Adjournment of the House, I invite his attention to two particular cases in which he will find that the very action in question, the destruction or alteration of premises used as an agricultural holding by the erection upon such of what are popularly known as Plan of Campaign huts, has been decided to be a wilful and gross act of waste as between landlord and tenant. One of these cases was brought before not one of those inferior tribunals in regard to which we are accustomed to hear so many adjectives applied, but before the Court of the Vice Chancellor of Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: One of the weakest Judges in the Empire.

*MR. MADDEN: One of these cases was brought before the Court of that most eminent and respected Judge, one of the most learned Judges on the Bench, the Vice Chancellor of Ireland. Another case was brought before the Court of the Master of the Rolls, and this last case was carried to the Court of Appeal. I do not know whether this phalanx of legal authority will be deemed satisfactory by hon. Members opposite, but at any rate it is the best that Ireland can supply: two Judges in Courts of First Instance and the Court of Appeal. If the persons who were defendants in the last instances thought that Irish Judges were affected by any kind of prejudice in regard to such matters nothing would have been easier for them than to bring their case before the House of Lords.

MR. SEXTON: This was a case of erection of huts.

*MR. MADDEN: Alteration of premises by their conversion from a dwelling house with outhouses suitable for an agricultural holding into what are popularly known as huts. I do not think any lawyer will stand up in this House and contend that there is not a stronger case of actual waste if instead of erecting huts on the outskirts of a farm there is an actual conversion into dwelling houses of out-houses suitable for the occupation of an agricultural holding. Therefore, on the main question in which the hon. and learned Member challenges us, the decisions to which I have referred afford a complete and satisfactory answer. How does the matter stand? Allow me very shortly, and in plain English, avoiding technicalities, to tell the House what this precept means. It means that a Petty Sessions Court will be held on a certain day, and that the question of waste will come before that Court for trial. Meantime, says the precept, you must stay your hand from the proceedings complained of, or if you refuse to do that, you must go to gaol. That is what the precept means. I do not know whether a similar proceeding exists in England. I have enough to do dealing with the laws of my own country; but if it does, does anybody doubt that the Executive would interfere in England to prevent forcible interference with the magistrate's precept. The hon. Gentleman says there have been 80 arrests, and surely that very fact shows there was a large force brought together outside the workmen actually doing the act of waste, a considerable body of men who constituted in law an unlawful assembly committing this act of wilful waste. Is it to be supposed that the Courts of Law in England would be so weak as not to meet and punish instantly any such lawless defiance of the authority of a competent Court? There are plenty of remedies open to any person who feels aggrieved by an order made under the Act in question. It may be said that the Petty Sessions is not the best Court to decide cases of waste; and I am disposed to agree. Well, there is under the Act a summary procedure by which one of the superior Courts of Equity or Law can immediately be appealed to. The facts of the case amount to this—that with such remedies at command there was an unlawful and organised defiance of an order legally issued by a competent Court. My hon. and learned Friend mentioned the Act of Edward III., and I notice that a laugh can always be raised in the House by quoting antiquated the phraseology of the Statute and the reference to “pillers and robbers,” always gets a cheer from hon. Gentlemen opposite, but when the hon. and learned Gentleman asks if this Act has been applied to such cases in England, I would ask him have such cases ever arisen in England.

SIR C. RUSSELL: I meant to speak of persons with known addresses and positions, such as those in question.

*MR. MADDEN: Of course I accept the hon. and learned Gentleman's correction. I understood him to challenge the application of the Act to the classes of cases to which it has been applied in Ireland; but if he admits that it would be applied in England to such things as to which it has been applied by a long series of decisions in Ireland; for instance, to the non-payment of rent in 1882, by a decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, to boycotting cattle and acts of that kind; if I understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman admits that the Act can be applied to proceedings of this kind, I have nothing more to say on this subject. But I gathered from his allusion to the Act of Edward III. that he was contesting the application of the Act to that class of cases, rather than dealing with the comparatively trifling question of whether the offenders in this particular case might not have been dealt with otherwise if summoned. The case before the House, I would point out, is still to a great extent sub judice, but I must state that the institution of the proceedings is the action of the landlord, and is not due to the initiative of the Executive. The obtaining of the precept was the act of the landlord, for the protection of his private rights. The action of the Executive in the matter has been what it would have been in any other civilised country—namely, to prevent by lawful means an organised and systematic defiance of the law.

(6.20.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): Those of us who are well acquainted with the cases that the right hon. and learned Gentleman has cited know that they are distinguished from the cases in which the House is now concerned. In the two cases before cited the point was not the enlargement of an out-house, but the erection of a large number of huts upon the land. In the first instance the erection of houses on the holding was decided to be a destruction of the agricultural character of the holding. In the case Steel v. Turner the special point was that the erection of new buildings on the holding was a breach of statutory conditions. I may also remind the House that a tenant may be restrained by the injunction of a Civil Court. The cases are totally distinct from the case under notice, which is the enlargement of a single out-house, which certainly is not a destruction of the character of an agricultural tenancy in any sense whatever, but is rather an improvement of the holding for the landlord. Moreover, the cases cited by the right hon. Gentleman apply to the civil remedies of the landlord; and the commission of waste is not a criminal offence, though, in the case before the House, the Government have made it a criminal offence. Beyond doubt this is a case to which the Statute of Edward III. was never intended to apply, and the Government have acted in defiance of the spirit of the law and the Constitution. Anyone who reads the 35th, 36th, and 37th sections of the Act of 1860, will see that they are intended in the first place to provide a civil remedy for the landlord, and if a criminal offence is established, it is proceeded with before two Justices in Petty Sessions, and, on sentence after trial, only a month's imprisonment can be inflicted. It is clear that proceedings ought not to be taken under the Statute of Edward III. A more flagrant and disgraceful misuse of the statute has never been proved, nor has any clearer proof been given of a criminal conspiracy between the Government and the landlords. The right hon. Gentleman spoke repeatedly of the violent conduct of the people arrested, but I ask, in what did the violence consist? Was there any violence in Father Kinsella's act of sawing a piece of timber? From beginning to end of the affair there was no trace of violence on the part of the accused, and the Attorney-General for Ireland ought to withdraw his imputation of violence, in order not to prejudice the case of the people before the magistrates. I appeal to him to do so. These people will come before Petty Sessions next week, and the magistrates will have the opinion of the Attorney-General that they have been guilty of violent conduct, and, I say, looking at that expression of opinion, and from whom it comes, the magistrates will feel coerced in their decision, unless the expression is withdrawn. But if the Attorney General has made an unwarrantable use of his position to-night, the action of the Chief Secretary in the matter has been simply disgraceful. He has used the words, "It will not be denied that these men are guilty," and after that what chance have the people when they come up for trial in a week's time? This is the most disgraceful utterance ever made in the House of Commons, though perhaps not unparalleled in the case of the Chief Secretary. We know when it was that month sentences began to be imposed under the Coercion Act, after the right hon. Gentleman's speech at Birmingham, in which he hinted at the inconvenience of appeals. This is not the only thing. The House will recollect that a funeral procession has been declared to-night to have marched along a public highway in Ireland only by favour of the Crown. I suppose the Chief Secretary's desire was that after the corpse had been buried the mourners should also bury themselves, as that would be a convenient way of getting rid of them. The policy of the right hon. Gentleman has been to exterminate—in conjunction with his allies the landlords of Ireland—all his opponents—political or otherwise. And now I have some information to give as to the Clongorey dispute. The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the Plan of Campaign was started on the estate by some friends of the hon. Member for West Belfast. The hon. Member for Cork and myself were the first to attend a Plan of Campaign meeting there. That was in 1887, and the meeting was not held till after the tenants had themselves resolved on adopting the Plan of Campaign, in consequence of the landlords' refusal to accept their terms. Everything had been arranged when we went down to the meeting, which was held in the presence of 200 armed policemen and half-a-dozen reporters. Why proceedings were never taken against my hon. Friend and myself for it has ever since been a standing mystery. On the second occasion on which the Plan of Campaign was brought into operation I went down before it was started, and I attended the meeting, at which it was resolved to again have recourse to it. The advice I gave to the tenants on that occasion was a warning to beware of what they were doing, and to be sure that they were in the right, because their conduct would be closely scrutinised in England, but when once they adopted the Plan they must stick to it. They must be sure that they had justice on their side. So much then for the charge that the Irish Members wanted the tenants to join the Plan of Campaign. But I may add in reference to my action with regard to the Clongorey estate that I regret nothing I have said or done; on the contrary, I am proud of it, because there never was a clearer case in which the tenants were right and the landlords wrong. The House has already been informed of the statement of a County Court Judge that this was a case in which the arrears ought to be entirely wiped out, and when the Chief Secretary told us to-night that the agent of the landlord offered to take one year's rent in settlement, he gave a complete misrepresentation of the nature of the offer, which was really to take a year's rent on account, leaving the arrears still standing, and the tenants in perpetual dread of eviction. The offer was not merely illusory; it was an insult and a mockery, and I should have been surprised if any body of tenants, however crushed or humiliated, could have been found to accept such terms. And to show how fairly the tenants on this estate treated the landlords, I may mention that not only did they pay this exorbitant rent as long as they were able, not only did they keep clear of combinations—criminal or otherwise—until they were forced into them by the action of the landlord himself, but it was their custom every year when the landlord had some work to be done on his land either to do it themselves or to pay men to do it. Their conduct towards the landlord was most generous; on the other hand the conduct of the landlord was marked by the grossest ingratitude on record. It was stated by the

Mr. Clancy

Chief Secretary, on the authority of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, that the tenants refused to pay even the reduced rent until Mr. William O'Brien was released from prison. But is that authority worth accepting? I will give an example of the untrustworthiness of the hon. Member's statements. The hon. Member wrote to the Times that the valuation of the property on this estate was £800, while the rental was only £600; but the fact is the valuation is £555, while the rental is £1,009. The Attorney General has given the go-by to more than one of the statements made by the hon. Member for West Belfast. My hon. Friend in the first place referred to the brutality of the police on several occasions last week, and to the attacks made on the people in the county of Kildare, on many occasions since the beginning of the struggle on the Clongorey estate, attacks unparalleled for their wantonness and brutality. I will give but one instance, but I think it will suffice to show the nature of the attacks. As a brother of Mrs. Kelly was being marched to gaol, a sister walked by his side conversing with him, until one of the constables knocked her down. The district inspector gave the order to his men "If any one will not move on give them a dig in the ribs." The chairman of the Town Commissioners of Newbridge, a gentleman highly respected, was thus greeted by the inspector, "Go on now, you know what I gave you before." He was threatened not only with personal assault, but with a repetition of the month's imprisonment imposed on him on a previous occasion. The spirit which actuates this district inspector is the one which prompted Capt. Plunket's telegram "Do not hesitate to shoot," and which prompts the watchword of the Irish police of to-day "do not hesitate to swear." It is the spirit which induces the Chief Secretary to condone and defend every act of the police, however unjustifiable, and so long as he shows a willingness to do that we may be sure he will find willing instruments to carry out his orders. Now, I deliberately assert that these attempts to deprive evicted tenants of shelter constitute an abuse of a statute framed for a very different purpose, and if we could suppose that these things were to go on for an indefinite period, if these assaults and batonings were to continue, if we had no remedy in Constitutional agitation, then the only thing we could have recourse to would be insurrection. But it is the hope that we shall eventually get justice from the English people, the knowledge that these things cannot go on for ever, and that Constitutional means will suffice for the attainment of our rights, that induce us to keep to Constitutional means, and when at last peace comes it will be no thanks to you, for the preservation of peace is not your object. Your aim is to promote acts of violence, and I am only surprised that the people of Kildare have thus kept themselves within the law. Mr. Fitzgerald, the resident magistrate, conducts himself in a manner worthy of a Cadi sitting under a palm tree in the East. He holds his Courts and administers the law, sometimes privately, sometimes in the police barracks, and at other times in the open air, reminding one of some of the revolutionary tribunals of '98. I say it presents to the Irish people a mockery of the British Constitution, and is a public scandal. Both the right hon. Gentlemen opposite this evening have endeavoured to obscure the real issue. The Irish Members do not wish to argue the matter on mere technicalities; they are content to leave it on the broad facts which prove that landlords and the Government have combined to prevent evicted tenants from obtaining shelter, preferring that they should be on the roadside and die of exposure to the wintry weather. We intend to inform the electors of the country that a person who erects a hut for those who are homeless through being evicted, is to be treated as a person of evil fame, even though he be the clergyman of the district, and that he must give bail or go to prison. Men are now being prosecuted for performing the commonest duties of humanity, and they are being treated as felons. This is a simple fact which the people of England will be made acquainted with, and it will not be our fault if the authors of this policy are not made to rue the day when they adopted it. Finally, let me point out that in enforcing this misuse of the law the Government are employing agents who are distinguishing themselves in brutal fashion.

(6.52.) MR. T. P. GILL (Louth, S): I think I should not be doing my duty if I did not point out a very remarkable admission made by the Chief Secretary this evening. He has practically admitted that the reason for denying shelter to the evicted tenants is that they have been tenants under the Plan of Campaign which he has for three years been trying to crush. We are now seeing the commencement on his part of a new crusade against the men whom he has hitherto failed to crush—that henceforth they are to be denied the shelter of a roof. The Attorney General has quoted a decision of the Vice-Chancellor in regard to a similar case to this. I have still another quotation to give him. County Court Judge Darley had a case before him in reference to the erection of certain huts on the Clongorey estate, but he decided that he could not interfere, as the building of the huts could not be looked on as “waste to the farm.” His decision was, however, reversed by the Vice-Chancellor, and the County Court Judge in announcing that fact to his Court the other day, said—

“On the equity side of the Court I was asked to grant an injunction, and to order the levelling of a hut or building into possession of which an individual had been put who was evicted from a neighbouring farm. I had serious difficulty in carrying out that strong power, because to my mind there was no charge that the thing which was done amounted to waste or to such an injury to the property as to call for the interference of a Court of Law. But my decision was found fault with and brought to the notice of the Vice-Chancellor, who took a different view, and directed the case to go back in order that I should order the hut in question to be removed. I take it the Vice-Chancellor took a general view of the proceedings, and held that they were in furtherance of the combination known as the Plan of Campaign. I am bound to act according to the view of the Vice-Chancellor, and if any case comes before me in which the proceeding is of the nature of putting up a building for the purpose of housing persons evicted from other farms—although it may not amount to waste or injury to the farm—I shall consider it a proceeding in furtherance of the Plan of Campaign, and it will be my duty to order the building to be levelled to the ground.”

Therefore, Sir, we have it in clear and unmistakable language that the crime in this case is not doing waste to the farm, or doing any acts which are technically considered to justify the interference of the law, but simply and solely the erection of the shelter for persons evicted from another farm. We are going back to the days of penal laws, and the only parallel I can call to mind is the law, which once prevailed in the Southern States of America, making it a crime to shelter a runaway slave. Just remember how these tenants are being treated. They are unjustly hunted out of the houses which they have themselves built; emergency men, supplied with hatchets and paraffin oil and protected by armed Constabulary, burn or level the buildings to the ground, and then it is made a crime to shelter the people who have thus been deprived of their homes. And all this is done because they have been members of a combination which every test applied to it proves to be just. It is the combination against which the Chief Secretary has hurled all the forces of his Coercion Act, but he has been humiliated and baffled by it, for he has not been able to-day to tell us of one single crime which has stained its history from the time of its starting in this very county of Kildare, nor has the Attorney General been able to point to a single act in the nature of a crime, according to moral law. I think we have arrived at a most extraordinary stage of the administration of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary began by discussing a series of new crimes, and now in the fourth year of his administration, he is enabled to add another crime to his previous list, namely, the crime of sheltering tenants who have been evicted because they have adopted the Plan of Campaign. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, before sitting down, if, having embarked in this course of procedure—if pinning his position to the judgment of the Vice-Chancellor in the case of these huts, he intends to go on in the same way, and, in that case, where he thinks he is likely to stop? If it be a crime to enlarge an out-house in order to give shelter to evicted tenants, simply because they have been evicted under the Plan of Campaign—if it be a crime to aid such persons, where is the right hon. Gentleman to pause in the administration of punishment for this class of offences? The Vice-Chancellor has laid it down that the sheltering of those persons is a crime, because it is an act in the furtherance of the conspiracy. And we know, from what has previously happened, that it is also held to be a crime to give bread to evicted tenants. This being so, we have here a new principle of boycotting laid down by the Coercion Act, and the Government will now find it necessary to boycott all tenants who have come under the Plan of Campaign, treating them as pariahs in the land, and, consequently, refusing to give them either shelter or food. But I would tell the right hon. Gentleman that if he dreams he can by any such procedure intimidate the Irish people into abandoning these evicted tenants and leaving them without shelter or the means of existence, he must have learned very little from his three years active coercion. If there be one fact which more than another his experience ought to have impressed upon his mind, it is this, that so long as there exists, either here or in any other part of the world, Irishmen who have a single dollar or shilling in their pockets, so long will they assist in providing the necessary food and shelter for their evicted compatriots. The more the right hon. Gentleman brings his Coercion Act to bear upon these unfortunate people, the more will he find they are not to be intimidated from the performance of their patriotic duties by all the terrors of the Coercion Act. As he finds it now, so will the right hon. Gentleman find it to the end of the chapter, and although he may have to confess the deep humiliation occasioned by the defeats the tenantry have inflicted upon him, he will at length become convinced that he must go even still further in his iniquities before he will be able to strike terror into the hearts of the Irish people or induce them to abandon the Plan of Campaign.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO HER MAJESTY'S MOST GRACIOUS SPEECH.

[ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Main Question [12th February.] —[See page 128.]

Main Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

(7.18.) MR. A. THOMAS (Glamorgan, E.): Mr. Speaker, the people of Wales are dissatisfied with the condition of their affairs, and I do not think I shall have much difficulty in showing that they have cause for dissatisfaction. Ever since the annexation of Wales to England, it has been the policy of English Governments to Anglicise the Welsh people, and treat the country generally as if it were a corner of England, but after 350 years the people of the Principality are still distinct in race, language, and custom. Out of the 1,700,000 inhabitants of Wales over a million speak only the Welsh language; at the same time, I believe, above half the Welsh people are not capable of understanding conversation in English. Twenty years ago, when the Education Act was passed, I thought it would sound the death-knell of the Welsh language. I have lived to know better, and I say that, thanks to the enlightened policy of the present Vice-President of Education, not only English but Welsh is taught. I can very well remember that some 30 years ago, to use somewhat of a slang phrase, it was not thought by Welsh people in position the "correct thing" to speak in Welsh. Now, if a claim is to be established on popular consideration, one of the readiest ways is to speak in Welsh. The most successful men in the Principality, and the most eloquent, can speak with equal facility the English and Welsh languages. One of my principal reasons for bringing this question before the House is that great difficulty has arisen in the Courts of Justice because of many of the people of Wales not understanding the English language. I have here the Statute of 27th Henry VIII., cap. 36, enacted in 1536. It commences thus:—

"Albeit the dominion, principality, and country of Wales justly and righteously is, and ever hath been, incorporated, annexed, united, and subject to and under the Imperial crown of this realm, as a very member and joint of the same, whereof the King's most royal Majesty, of mere drote and very right, is very head, King, lord, and ruler; yet, notwithstanding by cause that in the same country, principality, and dominion, diverse rights, usages, laws, and customs be far discrepant from the laws and customs of this realm; and also because that the people of the same dominion have and do daily use a speech nothing like consonant to the natural mother tongue used within this realm; some rude and ignorant people have made distinction and diversity between the King's subjects of this realm and his subjects of the said dominion and principality of Wales; whereby great discord, variance, debate, division, murmur, and sedition have grown between his said subjects: his Highness, therefore, of a singular, zeal, love, and fervour that he beareth towards his subjects of his said dominion of Wales, minding and intending to reduce them to the perfect order, notice, and knowledge of the laws of this his realm, and utterly to extirpe all and singular, the sinister usages, and customs differing from the same, and to bring about an amicable concord and amity between English and Welsh."

It was further enacted that only the English language be used in all Courts of Justice, &c., and to interdict the enjoyment of every kind of office throughout the King's dominions to persons using the Welsh tongue on pain of forfeiture unless they adopted the English speech. Of course the latter part of this statute is a dead letter, but as far as concerns the language used in the Courts of Justice it is still the law of the land. Well, Sir, on many occasions we find great difficulties arise. Men are charged with high crimes and they do not know what transpires at their trial because of their inability to understand the English tongue. On the 19th March, 1889, Richard Evans, of Merthyr, was tried on a charge of wilful murder, and he was sentenced to 12 months' imprisonment. The prisoner did not know what his sentence was, and, in his ignorance, he turned round in Court and said, "Am I to be hanged?" I will give one more case; it is rather long ago, it is true—the 24th January, 1888. I received a letter from the solicitor who was in the Court at the time. The case lasted for three days. The writer says—

"I was present at Carmarthen Assize Court on the 24th February, 1888, when David Rees was sentenced to death by Mr. Justice Stephen for the murder of Thomas Davies on the 12th November, 1887. Every one in Court was simply amazed at the apparently indifferent demeanour of the prisoner when the dread sentence was pronounced. He was taken down, and then it was discovered that he had not understood that he was a doomed man. He asked the jailor in Welsh (he was a Welshman and understood scarcely a word of English) what was to be done with him. The jailor replied by asking him if he had not understood what the Judge said, and the prisoner said 'No.' The jailor thereupon hurriedly sent word to the Sheriff, who informed the Judge that the prisoner being a Welshman did not understand he had been sentenced to death. His Lordship at once returned into Court (he

I have given these two cases, but of course there are many more recurring daily in the smaller Courts. It may be said—"Why do you not have interpreters?" We certainly have interpreters, and some of them work very well. I have a case which has been sent up to me by a friend, and I will give the House the details of it as a further illustration of my point. It seems that a Welsh farmer borrowed a sum of money from a bank on a note-of-hand, the arrangement being that he was to repay the money in three instalments. Well, when the last was paid the bill was passed to the farmer over the counter, and he went out of the bank. Subsequently, when the cashier made up his accounts, being so much short, he concluded that the mistake lay between himself and the farmer, and the latter was arrested. When the trial came off, the farmer was afraid to trust himself in the English language and asked for an interpreter, and now comes the curious part of the incident. The farmer said he paid the money and the bill was passed over the counter to him, but the interpreter translated it "snatched" across the counter. The foreman of the jury, who understood Welsh, objected to the interpretation, saying it was not correct. The case turned on that, and the farmer was acquitted. We are constantly hearing a great deal about interpreters in Wales, and there is much feeling on the point to-day, the present system in many parts of the Principality being strongly complained of. At the meeting of the Montgomeryshire Joint Standing Police Committee, Mr. A. C. Humphreys-Owen called attention to the necessity of securing the attendance of a competent interpreter at Quarter Sessions, and moved the appointment of a Committee to consider and Report on the best means of securing that object. He said everybody must have noticed the difficulty often experienced at Quarter Sessions and Assizes in the matter of interpretation of evidence given in the Welsh language. It was wrong in principle, he continued, that the police, who were more or less always regarded as connected with the prosecution, should be employed for the purpose. It appears that a rev. gentleman, named Ambrose Jones, in a certain case refused to be sworn as a witness unless he could give his evidence in Welsh, and he was threatened with prosecution for contempt of Court for his refusal. And here I would allude to a pronouncement which must have weight with hon. Gentlemen opposite. I do not say whether the rev. gentleman was right or wrong, but this is how a highly respectable Conservative journal—the North Wales Guardian—commented on the case:—

"Although much abuse has been heaped upon the head of the Rev. Ambrose Jones, of Ruthlun, nothing more monstrous can be conceived than that magistrates speaking no Welsh should have at their disposal the persons and property of Welshmen who speak no English. In very many cases heard in Courts in some parts of Wales, the Court is completely at the mercy of the interpreter, and Welshmen ought not to rest content until this shameful scandal is remedied."

I submit that this case discloses the existence of that which is nothing short of a national scandal. I hold that it is rank injustice that where three-fourths of the people speak Welsh, the business of the Courts should invariably be transacted in English. I know there are Judges who could hear cases in Welsh if required; indeed, some of them have already done so. It might not be right for me to give names, but I could do so if necessary, and show that when both parties had been agreed, the whole of the proceedings in a case had taken place in Welsh. We certainly ought to have Welsh-speaking Judges. Prisoners have a right to be tried in the language of their country. I would now refer, very shortly, to another aspect of this case, namely, the question of distress for tithes, and I maintain that the mode of distress is oppressive, while the amount of goods distrained upon is frequently greatly in excess of the amount of tithe due. Hon. Members opposite may find it difficult to accept this, but they are in the habit of forming their conclusions as to the condition of Wales, from reports they see in the English newspapers, and I must confess that if I had no other source of information than the English Press, I should also be inclined to look upon the Welsh as a lawless race. There have been certain tithe riots in Denbighshire, but in the very district where the disturbances have occurred, it has been the pleasing duty of the foreman of the Grand Jury at the Sessions to hand the Chairman a pair of white gloves. That I consider a good reply to people who complain at the lawlessness of the Welsh people. As to the manner in which tithe distraint is conducted, in the first place a summons is issued, then the sheriff's officer appears on the scene, and generally attaches all the crops of the farmer. Supposing there are four or five ricks, he goes and attaches them, and nothing more is heard of the case until some months afterwards—it may be five months afterwards—when the sheriff again appears. The farmer, in the meantime, has found it necessary to live, and to feed his cattle, and very rightly has used some of the hay. Action is then taken for pound breach. The Report of an Investigation Committee on this point says that distraints have been levied by agents of clerical tithe-owners, and that the cattle and goods distrained upon have been left an unreasonable time upon the farms; that action for pound breach has been taken against many farmers, and treble the original amount thus extracted from them; and that costs have been run up to an enormous extent—in one case over £98 having been paid in respect of a tithe claim which originally was £10 15s., in another case execution having been levied for £71 in respect of a tithe claim which originally was £6 17s. 6d. Other instances of exorbitant imposts and oppressive exactions are given. In one case, a farmer was sued for pound breach, whereas he had done nothing, and had never been distrained upon. In one case, that of John Thomas, Tyrhos, Cardigan, distraint was effected in March for a sum of £7 18s. 3d. due for tithe, two stacks of hay and one of barley being seized. In June, four and a half tons of prime hay, valued at £6 10s. per ton, were taken away, and no account of it has yet been received. The barley is still on the premises, and the farmer has, since the spring, been obliged to purchase fodder for his cattle. In the case of Mr. David Griffiths, Penlan, Cardiganshire, the farmer concerned appeared personally to set forth his grievances. The amount due from him as tithe was £10 15s. 7d., and the goods seized consisted of one rick of hay, value £5; stack of hay, £10; and three stacks of corn, £24. The farmer put into consumption all the corn and part of the hay, nothing having been removed by the bailiffs. A writ was served on June 20th for £32 (that being treble the value of the original amount), under an allegation of "pound breach." The farmer consulted a solicitor, who wrote to the bailiff, and forwarded a cheque for the £10 15s. 7d., this being forwarded "in full discharge" of the original claim and costs. The cheque was accepted, and a receipt returned, and the cheque came back through the Clearing House in ordinary course, duly endorsed. The date of the receipt was June 26th. This money was paid before judgment could have been legally signed against the defendant in respect of the claim for £32. On August 18th, notwithstanding what had been done, the Sheriff entered upon the premises with a warrant for £81, and left a man in possession. The defendant, who has a large family, paid £88—the £81, with £7 costs—to pay out the execution, which he did under protest. So that he has paid £98 15s. 7d. in respect of a tithe liability of £10 15s. 7d. In another case, that of Mr. Evan Davies, Rhydwen, Crymmych Station, the sum due as tithe was £6 17s. 6d.; and, in February, distraint was levied on two cows. On the 21st May the farmer was served with a writ for £21 1s. 6d.; and because of the manner in which service was effected he considered that he was not duly served; therefore, did not consult a solicitor and take the necessary steps to resist the claim. Subsequently execution was issued against his goods for £71 7s. The Sheriff was in possession, but could not sell; and the defendant was most anxious to sell, for he wished to leave the farm, but was unable to do so because of the Sheriff being in possession. To show the amount of tithes due, and the amount of the distraint in this case generally, it will be sufficient to mention the following:—One year's tithes: David Evans, Brynllwelyn, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes claimed, £6 15s. 8d.; goods distrained, £60. David Jones, Esgergarn, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes, £1 14s. 6d.; dis traint, £38. Timothy Evans, Esgerfynwent, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes, £3 8s.; distraint, £100. D. T. Gilbert, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes, 8s. 5d.; distraint, £13 10s. Two years' tithes: Daniel Evans, Brithder, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes, £4 to £5; distraint, £15; distrained three times. Daniel Davis, Ffynonygog, Gwernogle, Carmarthen, tithes, £3 15s. 6d.; distraint, £40.

*MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that it is not competent for him to dwell on the Tithe Question, as it is the subject of a Bill in Parliament. Of course he can call attention to it in general terms as one of the grievances that Wales suffers from.

*MR. A. THOMAS: I will only add that if there is to be any change in the present law relating to tithes it can only be satisfactory so long as it is accompanied by a measure for the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church. I regard my Amendment as a most moderate one, as, indeed, all proposals which emanate from Welsh Members are. We find that Ireland has in this House one law officer, and would possibly have two if the Government could find a seat for the second. Besides that, there is the Chief Secretary to the Lord-Lieutenant, and not even his worst enemy can say that the right hon. gentleman's post is a sinecure. The case of Scotland is almost more analogous to that of Wales, for she has a Lord Advocate, another law officer, and a Secretary for Scotland. The right hon. the Member for Mid Lothian, in his then capacity of Prime Minister, in 1884, speaking in reply to a deputation urging the necessity for the creation of a State Department for Scotland, said—

“Although Wales has no separate Administration or representation of any kind in the administrative system of the country, it has many of the features and feelings of a distinct nationality, and within the last two or three years the claims of Wales for certain arrangements for its own benefit have been recognised both in laws and in administrative Acts.”

And the present Secretary for Ireland, speaking in reference to the same matter at Edinburgh, on January 16th, 1884, said—

“It is not the measures that are most important that are passed, but the measures entrusted to the most important Minister.”

Mr. A. Thomas

Hence, by similar reasoning, if we had a Minister for Wales we might reasonably expect better legislation, adapted to the wants of the Principality. Justice demands that some such plan as I suggest should be adopted in regard to Wales. Wales has always been loyal and law-abiding, and has ever stood by England in her weakness and in her strength. Whatever may be the fate of my proposal, certain I am of this, that sooner or later—I hope sooner—a proposal similar in terms to mine will be accepted.

Amendment proposed, at the end of paragraph 16, to insert the words,—

“And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that more satisfactory arrangements for the administration of the affairs of Wales are imperatively required, and that a separate and independent Department of State should be created for the conduct of distinctly Welsh affairs, presided over by a Minister acquainted with the national characteristics of Wales.”—
(Mr. Alfred Thomas.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

(7.55.) MR. P. MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): In seconding the Motion, I will confine my remarks to the first part of the Amendment, namely, “And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that more satisfactory arrangements for the administration of the affairs of Wales are imperatively required,” and then I will endeavour to show that unless we get some such earnest of our individuality as we seek to obtain we shall have no alternative but to devise some other method by which our desires and aspirations can be realised. My hon. Friend has truly said that Wales has always been loyal. I trust it always will be loyal; but there are occasions when the angry passions of men rise to such an extent as to bring about disasters regretted by all classes of the community. I am told that the time was when an Irish Member getting up in this House found the Benches empty, as they are this evening; but now, if an Irish subject is before the House, it commands the whole attention of the House. That is what Irishmen have done for their country by agitation. I hope, as a loyal Welshman, that the Government will consider the very modest request that Wales has made. It seems to me that Wales has been the Cinderella of the sisters. She has been neglected in every conceivable way; but perhaps the fairy may come along, and Wales will take the lead, as Wales has done before, in the affairs of the Empire. [A laugh.] Well, Wales has taken a prominent part in the affairs of the Empire before, and I hope she will do so again. Wales is nearly unanimous in her desire for recognition. Of the 30 Members, 26 belong to the Party which at least claims to be the Party of Progress. I think the time has arrived when there should be some re-construction of our Constitution. Wales has claims for recognition beyond Ireland or Scotland, for there is no Irish Member and no Scotch Member who can get up and address the House in his native language; at least they cannot carry on a debate or address their constituents in their native tongue, as many Welshmen can. Ireland has a Chief Secretary, and if it had not it might be in a far more disastrous condition than it is to-day. It is because I respect law and order that I sympathise with the Irish people, who have been the victims of this and every other Government. The Empire has grown too large. There are already 29 Parliaments sitting in the British Empire, which do the legislative work which this House, in my opinion, is unable to perform. We have no one to appeal to in such a case as the disaster which happened in Wales the other day. No doubt the Home Secretary gives all the attention to such matters he can, but still it would be more satisfactory if there were a representative of Wales seated on the Treasury Bench. There would then be someone to whom we could appeal in regard to the questions of the Disestablishment of the Church, the Tithes, and other matters with reference to the feelings that prevail in the Principality, and in order to bring about legislation beneficial to the country. England has five Universities, Scotland four, Ireland two, but Wales has no University. Degrees can be obtained in all the faculties in the other countries, but no degree can be obtained in Wales. Again, in Wales there are no learned societies which have a legal standing or which can give to the people degrees and other honours. Wales is certainly entitled to such a mark of recognition. Then there is no royal palace in Wales. In all the other parts of the Kingdom, even in Ireland, there is a royal palace. The fact of the Local Government Bill being printed in the Welsh language by the Government is evidence of the necessity of some recognition of the Welsh nation. As special legislation for Wales we have had the Sunday Closing Act, and an Intermediate Education Act, which are also recognitions of Wales, and now we are asking for the Disestablishment of the Church, for a Tithes Bill, and other measures. Having this special legislation already granted, and desiring, as the Welsh do, further legislation, I maintain it is a very moderate request to ask that we should be recognised not as a separate nation, but as a part of the English nation having peculiar characteristics and peculiar aspirations. In asking for a Welsh Minister, we have a precedent in the recent appointment of a Minister of Agriculture. That Minister has been appointed just when the country has practically given up growing wheat, and about all he can do is to induce people to eat a few more vegetables in the shape of Brussels sprouts or something of that kind. I could have understood a combined Minister of Agriculture and Mines, who would have looked after everything relating to the land. Then we would have had someone to appeal to in reference to the sad disaster the other day, and in reference to all the mining difficulties which exist in this country; at all events we should have had some person who would advise the Government upon matters of far more importance than the mere growing of Brussels sprouts, and that sort of thing. What is the feeling in the Principality as to the point raised by the Amendment? It is that out of 30 Members, 26 sit upon this side of the House, and these 26 Members must necessarily be of one opinion. I take it that they are all of opinion that the country is entitled to recognition in the shape either of a Minister or a Separate Legislature. Let the Conservative Members too, reflect before they vote against the Motion, what may be the consequences if they vote against the Motion and determine that Wales should have no recognition either in the shape proposed by the Motion or by Home Rule which may be asked for hereafter if the request made in this Motion is not granted.

*(8.8.) MR. KENYON (Denbigh District): I do not think the two speeches to which we have listened can be seriously meant. I regard them very much in the light of fishing inquiries, to find how far their colleagues and the people of Wales will go in the direction of what is called Home Rule. To use a vulgar expression, the hon. Gentlemen are waiting to see how the cat will jump. If my hon. Friends had exercised a little patience and waited another week they would have found that their speeches would have been more singularly appropriate to the festivities of St. David's Day than to the present occasion. I am rather curious to see how the Colleagues of my hon. Friends on the other side of the House will receive the Motion. I fancy they will, like a certain character, "smell the cheese but not put their noses into the rat trap." I admire the courage of my hon. Friend rather more than I admire his discretion, because I do not think there was any necessity for him to come to the House to ascertain what the feelings of the Welsh are upon this subject. He might have ascertained it easily enough if he had taken the trouble to be present at the meeting of the North and South Wales Federation, which I believe was held in Carnarvon this year. Upon that occasion there were great searchings of heart. I have not got a report of the meeting with me, but I remember that threats were thrown out upon the great Denbigh leader (Mr. Gee), and that the delegates were implored not to show their differences to the outside world, and the hon. Member for East Glamorgan was called in to pour oil on the troubled waters. My hon. Friend might, without coming to the House of Commons, have ascertained sufficiently the feelings of the Welsh people upon the question of Home Rule; that is to say, he might have ascertained it as far as this, that at any rate, whatever the opinions of some may be upon the subject, the opinions of Welshmen in the aggregate are not made up upon the matter. I thought we should have had from my hon. Friends an exposition of several national characteristics to justify the Amendment of my hon. Friend, but the deficiency of arguments in support of the Motion reminds one of the heading to a celebrated chapter on snakes in Hooker's work on Iceland:—"There are no snakes in Iceland." There are no national characteristics in Wales so distinct as to justify such a proposal as that made by my hon. Friend. The principal arguments relied on relate to the difference of language. That is, no doubt, a difficulty—particularly in regard to the interpretation of evidence in Court. But it is an exceedingly partial difficulty. Many parts of Wales are as English as England. In Radnorshire, for instance, you cannot find a man who can say "Dim Saesnag." In the mining districts of Denbighshire, and in a large area of Flintshire, the prevailing language is English, and the same may be said of Pembrokeshire, and of some parts of Breconshire and Montgomeryshire. The difficulty is, therefore, a partial one, and affords no reason for the sweeping suggestion made by my hon. Friend. In the matter of land tenure there is hardly any difference between England and Wales. I recently visited Derbyshire, and the Highlands of Scotland, and I would rather farm in any county in Wales than in the bleak and arid districts of Chatsworth. There is bad land in England and in Wales; there are bad farms in Wales as well as in England. I am told that 26 Members out of the 30 who represent Wales are in favour of this Motion, but I should like to see how many of them will follow my hon. Friend into the Lobby on this question. There is only one reason which might entitle the Welsh people to a different treatment and consideration from that bestowed on other parts of the Empire. The largest number of them are Nonconformists, and they think, and I think not altogether without some plausibility, that their difference of religion shuts them out from employment and possibly from consideration at Westminster. Well, I own that the Welsh may have some reason to think that their interests have not been sufficiently considered in some matters, such, for instance, as the Tithes Question. But still I hardly think that the Motion my hon. Friend has made, and the remedy he proposes, will give satisfaction to the Welsh Nonconformists, or promote the prosperity of Wales. I sympathise with national sentiment; it is a noble sentiment; but the proposition before us is neither fish, flesh, nor good red herring. It is marked by a narrow provincialism which may develop into Bumbledom or something worse. The hon. Mover can ascertain the real wants and wishes of Wales, and also the remedies which may best be applied to them. He can encourage the influx of English capital and intellect to assist the hard sound common sense of the Welsh, of which he is himself so good an example. If, instead of launching out into these vagaries, he would endeavour by these means within the pale of the Constitution to promote the prosperity of our common country, he will find both Englishmen and Welshmen on both sides of the House ready to assist him in his effort. I hope the hon. Gentleman will take what I have said in good part, and I will conclude by asking him, as an earnest of his repentance and the commencement of a better life, to at once withdraw his Amendment.

*(8.50.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I had hoped before rising to find some expression of opinion forthcoming from the Treasury Bench, but as no right hon. Gentleman rose I feel compelled to intervene to elicit that expression of opinion. My two hon. Friends have made very interesting speeches, and have said a great many things that are perfectly true as, for example, that there are constant miscarriages of justice occurring in the High Courts from the ignorance of the Welsh language, and that the claims of Wales have not received that recognition which, as a distinct nationality, it deserves. As to the Amendment, I should like to see it cut in two. I am ready to adopt the premises of my hon. Friend without his conclusions. I do not suppose it will be denied that the affairs of Wales, with one single exception, have been neglected. On that exception I am willing to lay all stress. I refer to Welsh intermediate education. I wish to give the Vice-President of the Council full credit for having done his best with this important and, on the whole, exceedingly beneficial Act for Wales. But having done this I am afraid I must stop. Take one of the questions upon which Welshmen feel most keenly, the Disestablishment of the Church. On this question—as the hon. Member for Denbigh has admitted—there is practical unanimity among Welsh Members. Look at the Division List on the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Swansea last year, and you will find that out of 30 Members for Wales 25 voted in favour of, and only three against the Motion; and if that is not practical unanimity I do not know what is. If there is any strong feeling the other way there was a splendid opportunity for displaying it in the Mid Glamorgan election, occasioned by the lamented death of my late friend Mr. Talbot. The Conservatives had six weeks to select a candidate and they scoured the country for the purpose. At last they chose a certain Mr. Mortimer, but he ran away as soon as he got to the constituency, and no doubt showed his wisdom, for if he had stood the result would have disclosed the nakedness of the land. For two years my hon. Friend (Mr. Dillwyn) ballotted to get a day for this most important subject—this burning question for Wales, and not only did he fail to get facilities from the Government, but they actually took away from him the day which the chances of the ballot had given him, and he could only avail himself of the fag-end of a Tuesday evening. And now the Government meet our demand for a Disestablishment discussion by the promise of a Tithes Bill. That seems to me very much like asking for bread and getting a stone. But when I come to the second part of the Amendment I must part company with my hon. Friend. We have heard a good deal about Home Rule for Wales lately, and I am afraid we shall hear a good deal more of it if a deaf ear is turned to Welsh claims. Now, Home Rule may mean a great many things, but it does not mean this Amendment. The hon. Member for Denbigh was quite wrong when he said this movement was in the direction of Home Rule; it is quite in an opposite direction. As regards Home Rule, this Amendment is a distinctly retrograde movement [“No, no”]. I am speaking only as regards the question of Home Rule, and I will show my hon. Friend who says “No” why it is retrograde. It is not in the direction of decentralisation but of centralisation. Of course it has been said there is a precedent for the establishment of such a Department of State. We are reminded that for five years the Scotch have had a Secretary of State; we know that for a considerably longer period, for 90 years, Ireland has had its Secretary of State. It is said, and I admit with perfect truth, that on the whole the claim for nationality on the part of Wales is at least as strong as that of Scotland or Ireland. [An hon. MEMBER: It is more so.] More so. In one respect our claim is stronger than that of Scotland, we have a separate language, while Scotland has only an accent. As regards the claim of distinct nationality then we have as good ground as Scotland or Ireland; but I should like to ask hon. Members from Ireland what benefit their country has derived from the establishment of an Irish Secretary? In the event of this Motion being carried, and a Secretary of Wales appointed, there is only one gentleman whom the Government would think of appointing, and that is the Postmaster General. I have the greatest possible respect for the administrative abilities of the right hon. Gentleman, but I cannot help thinking that the same qualities and the same opinions which entitle the right hon. Gentleman to the confidence of the University of Cambridge would not entitle him to the confidence of the Principality of Wales. The right hon. Gentleman is as strong a Party man as there is in this House—I do not object to that, I like a good strong Party man—but we are bound to look at the matter from all sides, and I cannot help thinking that if the right hon. Gentleman was appointed principal Secretary of State for Wales his efforts would be directed to setting the Church of England on its legs and doing all he could to depress and discourage Dissent. Would my hon. Friends be satisfied with that sort of recognition of the rights of Wales? For my part, I am bound to say—while wishing to avoid anything personal—that so long as Government is carried on upon Party lines we must have for the moment a Party man, who will do the best for his Party, and we are face to face with the fact that the Party opposite is represented among Welsh Members by four Members as against 26 on this side. Though I do not yield to my hon. Friends in the desire to see the just claims of Wales recognised I should prefer something like the proposal made two years ago by my hon. Friend the Member for the Arfon Division of Carnarvon, that Welsh measures and Welsh questions should be referred to a Standing Committee mainly composed of Welsh Members. Still more should I desire that the County Councils, which are thoroughly patriotic and representative popular Bodies, should be formed into a sort of Grand Council for Wales, with legislative or quasi-legislative and administrative powers in regard to exclusively Welsh questions. I cannot help hoping that my hon. Friend will not press his Motion to a Division. It has produced a very interesting discussion, and I should be sorry to see the Welsh Members, who upon most questions are so united, present a divided front on this subject. Therefore, I venture to hope my hon. Friend will be satisfied with what has taken place, and withdraw the Amendment.

(9.2.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): The speech which has just been delivered by the right hon. Gentleman brings out very plainly the contrast there is between the Resolution on the Paper and the arguments we have heard advanced by the Mover and Seconder. I do not think that any of the arguments advanced by either the Mover or the Seconder of the Amendment really support the creation of a fresh Administrative Department for Wales; and the right hon. Gentleman has just stated that the creation of such a Department, presided over by my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, and conducted on principles consonant with the views of the present majority of the House of Commons, would give no satisfaction. The right hon. Gentleman told us that the Welsh people want the Disestablishment of the Church in Wales, the foundation of a Welsh University, and changes of that sort, but these are matters of policy and not of administration, and it is quite obvious that the remedy for the grievances of hon. Members opposite is a change in the majority of the House. You cannot expect to get from the present majority changes which they regard as mischievous in the highest degree. The interesting facts laid before the House by the Mover and Seconder really did not touch the question of administration. The hon. Member for East Glamorgan animadverted in nounfriendly sense upon the administration of justice; he thought it was not satisfactory because it was not conducted in the Welsh tongue. I hope I have not misunderstood the hon. Member. [Mr. THOMAS expressed dissent. Then I was wrong; but I understood him to say, at all events, that two men had been sentenced to death, and did not know the nature of the sentence until they were informed by a friendly Welsh attorney. I understood him also that there had been bad mistakes in interpretation, and especially in one case, in which the difference was between the snatching and the voluntary handing over of a Bill, which might have seriously affected the result of a particular action. Again, I understood him to complain that it was sometimes necessary to have recourse to the police to interpret. [Cheers.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer that complaint; but I have known of cases in which both parties have desired that the police should interpret, as they were most reliable and faithful.

*MR. A. THOMAS: I took no exception personally to the police acting as interpreters. In my own experience, for many years as a magistrate, they have done so very satisfactorily. * But I mentioned cases which had come to my knowledge where mistakes were made.

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member, then, was stating not his own opinions, but the opinion of anonymous prisoners. At any rate, the only inference we can draw is that he desires that proceedings in the Courts of Justice should be in Welsh.

*MR. A. THOMAS: Not totally so. I say I think it is a great injustice that a man should be tried in his own country in a language which is not his native tongue. I do not wish the proceedings in Courts of Justice to be conducted wholly in Welsh; but I say the prisoner should have the option of being tried in his native tongue.

MR. MATTHEWS: The substitution of Welsh for English in the proceedings of Courts would require consideration on grounds which have not been named, for the change would exclude from Welsh trials English Judges and nine-tenths of the English Bar. The present Lord Chancellor, when at the Bar, for a good many years assisted justice in Wales to the universal satisfaction of the inhabitants, and he appeared to possess the confidence of Welsh suitors, who availed themselves of his services, although he could not speak Welsh. Therefore, the suggested change would involve disadvantages to suitors as well as advantages. In Welsh causes and cases there must be many English witnesses, and their evidence would have to be interpreted, possibly by the police. Again, there might be complaints of imperfect interpretation. Another topic which the hon. Member dwelt upon was that of tithe distrainments, and he complained of various matters arising out of excessive distrainments; but I do not think I need go into details, because the arguments obviously led up to the declaration that the disestablishment and disendowment of the Church in Wales could alone give peace and satisfaction to the country. As to the allegations of excessive distrainments, the law provides a perfectly good and sufficient remedy without setting up a Welsh Minister. The case of Scotland has been referred to; but there is no analogy between the position of Wales and that of Scotland. I cannot say that, personally, I viewed with any particular enthusiasm the creation of the office of Secretary for Scotland; but still there was a good deal to be said for a Secretary for Scotland, a country which has different laws and institutions from those of England. There are differences in law and administration affecting Poor Law, lunacy, education, and fisheries, and a separate administration was convenient; but no such differences exist in Wales, which on these points is in complete identity with England. The administrative work of a Secretary for Wales would practically be nil. I have inquired what amount of correspondence relating to Wales takes place in the Home Office. The year 1889 was one of feverish activity in Welsh affairs by reason of the tithe disturbances, and yet the number of letters received at the Home Office from county and borough officials in Wales was only 209, while the communications at the Scotch Office amounted to 50,000, so that the volume of business was a sufficient justification for administrative division. The hon. Gentleman suggests that the creation of a Welsh Secretary would gratify national feeling; but I do not see how Welsh national feeling is to be gratified by the creation of a useless institution, or how Welsh Members are aggrieved by the fact that they have an equal right of appeal with all English Members to all the Ministers in the House. The Home Secretary is as much a Minister for Wales as for Sussex or Hampshire. It can hardly be expected that a Welsh Minister could have a seat in the Cabinet, and therefore Wales would hardly gain in this respect by having a Minister of her own. They must not expect the present Ministry to go with them in their views about Disestablishment, or on the tithe question, because these, as I said before, are matters of policy. But every Member of the Cabinet is as much bound to attend to Welsh affairs as he is to English affairs, and speaking for the Home Office, I am not conscious of the slightest difference in the mode of dealing with Welsh and English affairs. No one could desire more than I do that the traditions and the literature of Wales should be cherished; but why should that lead to an administrative change which would be awkward and clumsy? I submit that no reason whatever has been adduced for setting up a method of administration which is reactionary, which would be of no good to anybody in Wales, and which nobody in Wales really wants. If the friends of the hon. Member get into power they will be able to pass those legislative changes which they so much desire, and the want of a Welsh Secretary will not prevent their doing so; while, on the other hand, if hon. Gentlemen opposite do not succeed in turning out the Party now in office, the fact of having a Welsh Secretary would in no way help them to get what they desire. There is really nothing in the absence of a Secretary for Wales which ought to aggrieve or cause any pain to sound sensible Welsh feeling, and therefore, I think that this Motion ought to be rejected.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question again proposed.

(9.21.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I wish in—

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): I beg to call attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present.

*MR. SPEAKER: There are 40 Members present now.

Mr. Matthews

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish, in moving the Amendment which I have put on the Paper, to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is not, in my opinion, a Party question. It is one which will meet with as much opposition from a section of the Liberal Members of the House as it can possibly do from the Conservative side of the House, and the reason is not very far to seek. These legislative restrictions, which I hope will shortly be imposed on labour by international effort, will place political parties on their proper basis—a position they are rapidly assuming in Germany; they will divide them into two parties—the workers being on one side and the middle classes on the other. Whether that is a consummation devoutly to be wished for is a point on which I will not trouble the House. You, Sir, have rightly no doubt confined the discussion within narrow limits, and consequently I am precluded from entering on certain aspects of the case, while a Bill brought in by an hon. Member dealing with an important branch of the question also prevents me touching upon that particular subject. But the limitation, I am thankful to say, enables me to make out the strongest possible case for legislative interference with adult labour, for that case is to be found in the aspect of internationalism. I suppose it is incumbent on me to show that there is some demand for legislative interference not only in this country but in the colonies as well as in Europe and America. It is often said that there is no real demand for it from the working classes in Great Britain; and hon. Members will get up and say that they have conversed with the most intelligent of the working classes among their constituents, and have found that they are opposed not only to the measure, but even to the discussion of it. And that is not to be wondered at when one knows how these conversations are conducted. Enthusiastic meetings are held on the Irish Question, at the end of which a few words are said on the Labour Question by hon. Members who themselves stand in opposition to the interests of labour because they are themselves employers. One can easily imagine the nature of the conversation on the exposition of the eight hours question from an employer's point of view.

The hon. Member says to the intelligent workman—"My good man, there is a fellow called Cuninghame Graham, and there are others also, who wish to restrict the hours of labour and to prevent you making good terms for yourself. If you wish these restrictions to be imposed on your labour, I suppose that I, as your Member, must vote for the Bill; but if we reduce the hours of labour you cannot reasonably expect to receive the same wages for eight hours as for ten." And the working man, who perhaps has worked for the Member ever since his boyhood, and who fears he may be thrown out of work if he expresses a different view, says, in reply—"Well, no; if my wages are going to be reduced I not think I am in favour of it." And then when he leaves the men and meets his pal, the latter says—"Well, Jack, what did he say?" the reply being, "Oh, the same old game. The Irish Question first; and we don't want to enter into any question of interfering in the relations between capital and labour." A proof that there is a demand in the country for legislative interference with adult labour is to be found in the increased support the movement is receiving in this House. Many more hon. Members are now pledged to the principle than there were a year ago, and this change is alone due to the pressure of their constituents. At every bye-election, too, we find both the candidates rushing forward to support the principle; for political honesty after all is an undetermined quantity. The growth of the demand is equally apparent abroad, for foreign delegates at foreign Congresses vote for legislative interference. It is well-known that when the question was first brought before the Trades Union Congress at Swansea three years ago the delegates of the working class expressed many of them marked disapproval of it. When it was put to the vote only eight delegates were found to have the courage to record their opinion in favour of it. But at the Congress at Dundee last year, in spite of the fact that there had been a delicate and skilful manipulation of the votes when a plébiscite was taken, it was found that the votes in favour had increased to 68, and there was only a small majority against the Motion. Surely this affords some slight indication of the increased demand for legislative interference with adult labour. I am pretty certain I shall get the votes to-day of many hon. Members, not because they approve the principles I am advocating, but because they know their constituents will withdraw their confidence from them if they place political questions higher than social ones. Some of the trades were represented at the Conference, and some of them were not able to send delegates. It is, however, a matter of notoriety that the battle of the dockers, in which some 60,000 or 70,000 were more or less engaged, was fought primarily on this question of hours; and it ensued in this: that 62,000 men had their hours of labour reduced from $10\frac{1}{2}$, and in some instances $11\frac{1}{2}$, to eight hours. It is the opinion of the men who conducted that agitation, that in order to enable them to maintain an eight hours day the restriction should have the confirmation of Parliament. I think we may take it as a tolerably conclusive fact that there is a deep-seated desire on the part of the workmen generally for a restriction of the hours of labour, and that this demand is one which is not got up by agitators, and those who speak at street corners, but has been enforced by the accredited delegates of the great Trade Unions, who have represented it to be the wish of the men on whose behalf they spoke that their case should be laid before Parliament with a view to legislative action. Let me now turn to the case of the bakers, among whom there has lately been a severe agitation, not only on the part of those employed in this trade in London, but also on the part of those employed in Aberdeen, Edinburgh, and other places; and what has been the result? Why, that their hours of labour generally have been reduced to the extent of some 30 per cent. They were united and almost unanimous, although perhaps not quite so unanimous as the gas stokers, in desiring to see that the practical outcome of their agitation, obtained by their own unaided efforts, should be confirmed by legislation. Within the last four or five months another agitation has been going on by the railway men in favour of a general restriction of the hours of labour. The right hon. Gentleman below me (Mr. J. Morley) seems to differ from me, and to think that it is not the wish of the Executive of the railway men that the 10 hours a day which they are asking should be confirmed by Act of Parliament. I am informed that their wish is as I have expressed it; but it is a question, on which it is easy to satisfy oneself, and if on further information I find I am in the wrong, I will tender an apology to the right hon. Gentleman. We have also had the tramway men uniting and agitating for a reduction in the hours of labour, and responsible men at the head of their Union tell me that they would not object to seeing the 10 hours a day, which they are claiming, confirmed by Act of Parliament. It may be argued that this is only a 10 hours question; but surely the principle remains in both cases; and if the Legislature makes up its mind to granting a 10 hours day, it may also on the same ground pass a measure adopting a day of eight hours. It has been objected that this sort of legislative interference would have the effect of driving trade from the country, of reducing the national output, and destroying the profits and capital of the employers. I have always held, both in this House and out of it, that the employers take far too great a share of the national means, and that a larger portion of the wealth created by the men, whether in railways, mines, factories, or any of the other industries, might equitably be given to labour, and that if this were the case trade would not be driven from the country, but a fair margin of profit might still be left to the employers. But if it be argued that by restricting the hours of labour we shall drive trade away from the country, I think I shall be able to show that in some industries at least this would not be the case. It will also be incumbent on me to try and show that the demand for legislative interference is as great in other countries as it is in this. It is often said, and with some show of reason, that it would be impossible for us in this country to maintain our commercial superiority if we were to shorten our hours of labour, because some foreigners are in the habit of working longer hours and are in receipt of smaller wages. All I have to say on that point is that if we are to engage in a mere race of production—if we are to urge our workmen into a sort of universal sweating struggle with other nations as to which can produce articles cheaper than the others, simply in order that the employers may realise great fortunes, I, for one, have no hesitation in stating that I am not greatly concerned in the result, whether the proposed reduction enables us to maintain our commercial superiority or whether it does not. But I think I shall be able to show that not only are we not the country in which most has been done to shorten the hours of labour, but we are a country in which, if we do not bestir ourselves, longer hours will be worked than in any other European country; certainly much longer hours than are now worked in America, Australia, and most of our colonies. If I succeed in making out a case on this point I think I shall have gone some distance in removing the scruples hon. Gentlemen now entertain in regard to this, to me, very plain, but to them most tortuous and difficult question. Now, what is it I am going to ask the House to do? I am not asking the House to pledge itself now and for ever to a cast-iron Eight Hours Bill, rendering it impossible for any man in any trade whatever to work more than eight hours a day. That, I admit, would be a most unreasonable proposition, and one for which I do not think the great bulk of the working men in this country are prepared. What I am putting before the House is a proposition of very different import. I am merely asking the Government, for the honour of this country and the welfare of the working classes, as well as for the national credit as a community of national reformers—because, let an Englishman be a Conservative or Liberal he always claims to be an international reformer—not to place the British representatives either at the Berne or the Berlin Conference in a different position from that of the representatives who will attend to speak on behalf of other Powers. I put it to every man in this House as an Englishman, as a man who respects and loves his own country, whether he can calmly contemplate the idea of the representatives of this country, which hitherto has constantly been showing the way in every reform, social and political, having to take a back seat among the representatives of the other European nations? I think

hon. Gentlemen can easily imagine the sneers that would be indulged in by the foreign representatives when, having entered upon the discussion of the important question of an International restriction of working hours, the British representatives felt called upon to retire and leave the foreign delegates to carry on the discussion by themselves. It is for this reason that I have placed my Amendment on the Paper; it is because I hope to show the House there is not only a demand in this country, but a similar demand in America, and in all our Colonies, for International legislation on the subject that I desire Her Majesty's Government to take some cognizance of the invitation addressed both by the Swiss Republic and the Emperor of Germany to Great Britain to unite with the other Powers in considering this important question. It is a fact, which I think is corroborative of my argument, that we are now finding municipality after municipality, Town Council after Town Council, inserting eight hours' provisions in their projected local legislation. What, I ask, is the action of the London County Council on this matter? I believe there are Members of this House who have the honour of holding seats in that assembly, and I ask them whether on every occasion on which questions such as these have come under their discussion strong expressions of opinion have not been given in favour of the insertion of eight hours' provisions in the different local Acts springing from that Body? Gentlemen who have studied the question know that the largest Trades Union in the world is that of the Amalgamated Engineers. That Society has ramifications throughout the three Kingdoms, and if there is any combination that can do anything for the men belonging to it it may well be supposed to be that combination. Well, what do we find to be the case? That Trades Union, which comprises some 655,000 members, sent to Paris last July two delegates, in the persons of Mr. John Burns and Mr. Evelyn, who were instructed to vote for the eight hours day. Those delegates carried out their instructions in the same manner as the other delegates, and it must be remembered that they represented a class engaged in what is well known as skilled labour, and quite as capable of knowing their own wants and wishes as any Member of this House. I believe, Sir, I should be precluded by your ruling from even alluding to the vote of the Trades Council at Dundee with reference to the Bill introduced in the name of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lanarkshire, and, therefore, I will not trench on that ground; but may be permitted to say that the Resolution was voted without one dissentient voice by the delegates present, and was subsequently confirmed by the 365,000 miners whom they represented on that occasion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. Morley) grounds his objections to this proposal, more than anything else, upon the difficulty of regulating labour in this country when there is no demand for it in other countries, and the hon. Gentleman the junior Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) has busied himself with some observations in the same sense, a similar attitude having been adopted by the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) who is not now in his place. I will endeavour to deal with the question in an International sense, and to some extent I am able, from personal observation, to afford information on this matter to the House. I was myself sent as a delegate to the International Labour Conference in Paris last year; there were practically two Conferences there. But taking the two Congresses as one they formed a complete body of nearly 1,000 working men. The discussions which took place led one day to the passing of Resolutions in favour of the International limitation of the hours of labour, and those Resolutions were practically passed unanimously. It is often said that our working classes do not wish to join the foreign working classes because their modes of procedure are different. I naturally expected that I should hear some blood and thunder and terrible speeches when I attended the Conference, but Spaniard, Italian, German, Frenchman, and American, made precisely the same class of speech that you listen to in your Trades Union hall or Radical Club on Saturday evening. They complained of the long hours of labour, and of the women of their various countries being engaged in occupations unfit for them.

They said—"Our employers grow rich and we remain poor; we are half-starved; we work long hours; we come to this Congress to get an expression of the opinion of the working classes of Europe and America upon the most important and vital of any questions with regard to which we can assemble together." While this Conference was sitting, an International Congress of Miners was being held. There was not one dissentient voice in that large representative Congress when the proposition was put that the question of an eight hours day of labour should be made the subject of legislative interference, and we find that during the last few months there has been an extensive strike of miners, and their first demand has been legislative interference in favour of the eight hours day; and similarly in the Austrian Dominions, and in the Belgian coalfields. Surely, these men know their own affairs better than any Member of any Parliament. I find I have received an ally where I least expected to find one—the German Emperor, whom no one will accuse of being revolutionary or Socialistic. His Majesty, for reasons which I do not presume to analyse, has chosen to make a most remarkable pronouncement; it may be for an ulterior motive, but I am quite content to take it on trust, and be thankful for assistance from an unexpected quarter. Far more significant is the return of 21 Socialist Members to the German Reichstag—men who belong to the Socialist Party, to which I belong myself. The first plank in the platform of these representatives is that the working day should be restricted to eight hours. The increase in the Social-democratic vote shows that the demand for legislative interference in the question of an eight hours day is assuming proportions far greater than perhaps hon. Members are aware. I find in a Return of three years ago that the total democratic vote was 93,000. I find last week it had risen to 116,000. In 1887, the total social-democratic vote throughout the German Empire was 774,000. I find that last week it had risen to almost a million—an increase which my colleagues and friends, Messrs. Bebel and Liebknecht, attribute almost entirely to their advocacy of the restriction of the hours of labour, because they have by so doing placed before the German people a tangible plank on which men of many sections can unite, instead of losing themselves amidst vague vapourings and talk of hypothetical revolutions. I wish to bring before hon. Gentlemen, and especially the Members of Her Majesty's Government, that other Legislatures have also been called upon to deal with this question. It is not two months ago that the subject of an Eight Hours' Law was introduced into the French Chamber, I need hardly say it was negatived, though it received a modicum of support, clearly showing that it shadowed the minds of the electorate of the country. In the Legislative Chamber of Holland, too, an Eight Hours Bill was introduced, though it met with a fate similar to that of the French Bill. I have received a letter from a friend in the Belgian Chamber this afternoon enclosing his speech on the introduction of a Ten Hours' Bill, which met with the fate of the Dutch and French Bills; but I presume my friend would not be deterred from introducing an Eight Hours Bill, if it was conclusively proved to him that it was desired by the working classes of the country that such a law should be introduced. I wish now, Sir, to turn to the aspect of the question in America and in our Colonies. In some of the States of America Eight Hours' and Nine Hours' Bills have been passed. In Connecticut and Pennsylvania there are special agitations in the State Legislatures to introduce the eight hours' day into those States. In those States the hours are 8½ and 9. [An hon. MEMBER: And 10 and 12 hours.] That does not in any respect affect my argument. I have received letters from the leaders of the trades in those States, saying that they were applying to the Legislature to have the eight hours day confirmed, because they feel that the frequent occurrence of strikes was driving away trade and deteriorating their own social position. It is precisely because I agree with these men as to the extreme undesirability of strikes, and because of the enormous waste of energy and capital which they entail, together with the danger of social turmoil, that I advocate this International legislative restriction of the hours of labour, by which these consequences would be avoided. Turn ing to our own Colonies, I find that in Canada, a Royal Commission has recently been appointed; and it has sat and delivered its Report upon the relations between capital and labour. The Commission has unanimously reported in favour of a nine hours day. I do not know whether the Canadian Government intends to take up their recommendations, but I do know that there is a keen agitation amongst the workers of Quebec for an eight hours day, and there is an equally keen agitation amongst the workmen who already work eight hours to have a confirmation of the system by the Dominion of Canada. By the authority of Sir C. Dilke I find that the workers in Cape Town, Grahamstown, and other towns of the colony are forming eight hours leagues. They are instructing their Members to introduce Bills into the Colonial Parliament, asking for the same for the working classes in South Africa as has been asked for in Germany and France. In the Australian Colonies it is a matter of public notoriety that eight hours is the normal day. In Queensland, a Bill was passed through the Lower House of the Legislature to fix the normal working day at eight hours. It was rejected, naturally, by the vote of the Upper House, just as if we passed a Bill in this House it would be met by the factious opposition of the hon. Member for Northampton, and also by noble Lords who sit in another place. I have what I consider to be much stronger evidence than this in the Colony of Victoria. I find it has become the practice in that colony for Local Authorities to insert an eight hours provision in all the contracts which they enter into. In January of last year, in passing a Tramways Act, the Parliament restricted the hours of work to eight per day. And these are not rash assertions. Anyone can verify them who chooses to do so; and if I have been wrongly informed in what I have stated I shall be in the position of Hamlet—I shall receive my shame and the odd bit. But if I am right I think I have proved conclusively that the foolish terror which exists in this country with regard to the legislative restriction of the hours of labour does not exist in Germany or France or America, and certainly not in our Australian Colonies. In New Zealand eight hours is recognised as the normal day; but the workers of that colony are not satisfied, any more than those in the other colonies, with this general recognition, and are beginning to instruct their representatives to bring before their Parliament propositions for the restriction of the hours of work. If, therefore, concurrently with the agitation which I have endeavoured to show exists in this country there is one going on in Australia and America, surely all honourable and fair-minded men who wish to do justice to their fellow-countrymen will do what they can to remove the load of toil which is crushing our working classes in many instances to the ground. They will, I think, see that this international movement affords ample opportunity for meeting the wishes of the working classes. By coming to the aid of the large class who are overstrained and overworked the House will atone for many injustices in the past; and I plead on behalf of those who provide us with our hats, our hosen, our food, and even our seats in Parliament, that we may adopt the principle of restricting the hours of labour by international agreement or at least authorise our delegates to be empowered to discuss it. I beg to move the Amendment standing on the Paper.

(10.5.) MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): In seconding the Amendment, I desire to say that, in consequence of the protracted length to which the debate on the Address has extended, I shall confine my remarks to a narrow compass. [Ministerial cheers.] Well, if the debate has been protracted it is because the administration of right hon. Gentlemen opposite offers so many points of criticism. But in justice to myself and my constituents I must say that though I accept implicitly the terms of the Amendment I by no means concur in the general terms in which my hon. Friend has supported it. I am by no means satisfied that there does exist a sufficiently large demand on the part of our working population for an eight hours day, or any other limit, to justify Parliamentary interference. I have made inquiries in well-informed quarters, and this is the result. Among the Lancashire cotton-spinners the preponderance of opinion is against the eight hours movement. Among the engineers there is a great difference of opinion.

*MR. GRAHAM: My hon. Friend will not deny that the Amalgamated Society of Engineers gave instructions to their delegates at the Paris Conference on the subject. Those delegates were Messrs. John Burns and Evelyn.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES: I am not drawing my inferences from what took place at that Conference, but from entirely independent sources of investigation. At the same time, I am decidedly of opinion that the main objections which are urged against legislation for the limitation of the hours of labour, and notably the objections urged by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley), are not at all sufficient or conclusive. The stock argument used is that combination among the working classes is able to produce the desired result. Certainly, I have heard that in my hon. Friend's own constituency in Lanark the miners, who are in a much less organised condition in Scotland than in this country, have been able by combination to obtain—certainly in the neighbourhood of Hamilton—a reduction of the working days. It seems to me that it is quite open to the Trades Unions throughout the country to combine to secure an Eight Hours Bill if they please. I would like to observe, however, that in certain trades combination is an absolute impossibility. In small isolated industries, or branches of industries, combination is impossible; and I know of one case recently where an attempted combination of the kind ended in disastrous results to the persons employed. It has been urged as a very serious objection to the proposal that the margin of profit secured by capital at the present time is very small in certain trades where the foreign competition is very marked. I think there is great force in that argument. If you take the cotton trade in Lancashire at the present time you find the margin of profit is very small; and if you were by a compulsory law to reduce the hours of labour there the result would apparently be that the manufacturers would be unable to carry on their production in competition with foreign countries. The object of the Amendment is to see whether we cannot by some international movement reduce the hours of labour so that a particular industry shall not be injured thereby. It is not an unreasonable request to make of the Government. It has received, in principle at least, the co-operation of the great German Empire. It has received the friendly recognition of, I think, most, if not all, of the great Powers of Europe; and there is no doubt a growing feeling among the working classes of this country that it is desirable to establish some more legitimate and fair apportionment of the hours of toil than at present exists among our principal industrial trades. I notice that the noble Lord opposite (Lord R. Churchill) has dealt with this question. I unfortunately did not receive from his speech on the subject the light and leading which I had a right to expect. He intimated that he was inclined to entertain the question favourably. What we want is not empty rhapsodies in favour of this proposition, but solid argument to show what we can accept and what we cannot.

Amendment proposed, at the end of paragraph 16, to insert the words—

“And we humbly represent to Your Majesty that the increasing desire of the working classes in Europe for legislative restriction of the hours of labour renders it desirable that this subject should be discussed by the representatives of this Country who are to be appointed to attend the International Conference on Labour Legislation at Berne or Berlin.”—(Mr. Cuninghame Graham.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

*(10.15.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The Amendment moved by my hon. Friend has the inconvenience which attaches to all Amendments to the Address, which are not intended to challenge by a direct Vote of Censure the existence of the Government. It forces discussion upon the House under exceedingly inconvenient conditions. The Mover of the Amendment more than once intimated that he was confined in his remarks because important parts of the question were fixed for discussion in this House. That was a reason for not moving it at all at a time when it cannot be properly discussed. I have been a little puzzled since I listened to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman who so ably did not second the Amendment. Had I not known that he would be perfectly incapable of any such artifice of the Bar, I should have thought he had risen for the purpose of damaging the case of the Amendment as much as possible at the very earliest stage of the discussion. I would point out to the House that we do not know at present—or I do not think we do—that there is to be any Conference at all at Berlin which will deal with the question of the hours of adult labour. No doubt the Mover of the Amendment is much better acquainted with facts that have not happened than I am; but he must pardon me if I express a doubt as to the accuracy of his information respecting what the German Emperor meant by the language he used.

LORD R. CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): The limitation of the hours of labour was one of the first subjects in the programme of the Berlin Conference put before the public by the newspapers.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I am afraid the noble Lord has not given the subject that attention which he usually bestows upon matters, for though the rescript is hardly capable of that construction, there are limiting words addressed by the Emperor to his State Council which are capable of an absolutely opposite construction. Until I have some official information on the subject I prefer not to commit the House to a declaration as to something which is to happen at the Conference at Berlin—a Conference as to which I understand no official invitation has yet been addressed to Her Majesty's Government, and certainly none has been communicated to the House. The matter is now, according to the newspapers, before the Council of State on the invitation of the Emperor, and some of the questions to be considered will, if they are considered, prevent any dealing with the hours of adult labour at all. As to the Conference at Berne, I understand from the usual sources of information that the Swiss Government, in the declarations they have issued respecting the hours of labour, have not dealt with anything but the labour of women and children. I notice that the word "adult" is omitted from the Amendment, and I am not sure what the Mover of the Amendment means by that omission. Indeed, I am not sure that he knows what he means himself, because on a previous occasion he said he would not be so unreasonable as to prevent any man working more than eight hours a day.

*MR. GRAHAM: What I said was that I did not propose at present to come before this House and ask for a cast-iron Eight Hours Bill, and that I merely asked the House to empower the delegates sent to the Conference to discuss the question.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Of course, I should not press on the hon. Member words which he did not mean to use; but I thought I heard him say—and I took it down at the time—that he would not be so unreasonable as to prevent any man working more than eight hours. As the hon. Member did not mean that—

*MR. GRAHAM: Or say it.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Or say it, I must apologise for the defectiveness of my memory. But I do not understand the phrase "cast-iron" Bill. Either it means eight hours or it does not. If it is more, then it is not eight hours; and if it is eight hours, why then it is eight hours. I object to language being used to people up and down the country which means one thing, and when the speaker is tackled about it is found to mean something else.

*MR. GRAHAM: I will explain to the House what I did mean.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I must really object to the hon. Member's interruptions.

*MR. GRAHAM: I have been accused with using language which means one thing at one time and another at another.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Mr. Speaker—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. Cuninghame Graham.

*MR. GRAHAM: What I meant was this: I did not wish now, even if I had the power, to pass a Bill which would prevent people working more than eight hours. I wished to apply a Bill of the kind, by steps, to miners and workers in Government workshops, and then to trades and industries throughout the Kingdom which should declare themselves in favour of it.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I am afraid that we are now much in the same place. Miners and Government workmen are shut out of the discussion to-night, because of other notices standing on the Order Book, and I do not know what is meant by proceeding by steps in the restriction of the hours of labour to trades and industries throughout the Kingdom. I would ask the House to note how excessively necessary it is to be careful on matters of detail. The hon. Member said that of the delegates who attended Paris one represented a Trades Union which numbers 650,000 members. The number of members of all the Trades Unions registered in the country—and the majority are registered—is nothing like that. The Trades Union of which he spoke is a very powerful one, and I think it has some 46,000 members. If you have to knock 600,000 odd off such a number, it shows that it is possible to have some carelessness of statement. Now, Sir, I trust that I have the interests of working men of this country at least as much at heart as any other Member. I have always been in favour of shortening their hours; but I have never been in favour of ruining their industries. The hon. Member said that one of the delegates at Paris was sent to represent that powerful Union, the Amalgamated Engineers. Well, he only claimed to be sent by one branch of the Union, namely, the London branch.

*MR. GRAHAM: I wish to explain. I am aware that there is no Trade Union that has 600,000 members. I must frankly confess that I made an error in the figures. I took one figure for another, and read 600,000 for 60,000; and I apologise to the House for making the mistake. As to my statement about the representation of the Amalgamated Engineers at the Conference, all I can say is that Mr. J. Burns, whom I have seen this evening, was my authority, and Mr. Burns distinctly told me that the delegates represented the entire engineering trade.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will leave it there, only saying that, as far as my information goes, the delegate just mentioned represented his own branch, and his own branch alone. These, however, are matters of detail so trifling that one would not deal with them in this House were it not that they form part of the general exaggeration which characterises the statements made on this subject. With regard to the wording of the Amendment, I do not think it is, or ought to be, the duty of any Government to send representatives of this country to a Conference to discuss possible law-making in which they have no intention of taking part, and which they may intend to oppose. I thoroughly and heartily approve of the position taken up by Lord Salisbury last year: that, while willing that a discussion should take place on various topics expressly stated in which representatives of this country should join, there were two matters to which only vague reference had been made—the restriction of adult labour and the question of output—which our representatives should not be empowered to discuss. Unless the Government wilfully means to fetter this country in its industry, it would never be mad enough to give our representatives any power of discussing the restriction of that marvellous output which has carried this country so far in advance of all other nations. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment said that there were countries, such as the United States, where such laws as he proposes are already in force. For my own part, I think it would have been fairer to the House if the hon. Member had utilized the Parliamentary paper laid on the table last year on my Motion and had told us that there are several States in which eight hours is the normal day except, when otherwise agreed, and others where overtime work is to be paid for as extra. But there is overwhelming evidence in the Report of the Commissioners of Labour that in none of the States have these laws been enforced, and the percentage of eight-hour day labour is less than it was 50 years ago.

*MR. GRAHAM: Quite true.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: The hon. Member says quite true. If so, he should have told it to the House, instead of referring to matters which instead of telling for the Amendment, as he wished the House to believe, told against it. What does eight hours mean? Take the textile trade. The hours in that are about 56½ per week. Are you going to reduce them to 48 hours, giving the same pay for 48 as for 56½ hours? [Mr. GRAHAM was understood to dissent.] I wish you could be restricted now, if you will permit me to say so. I feel the need of asking some indulgence of the House, and I hope I may ask the indulgence of my hon. Friend. I hope he will permit me to complete my poor argument in my own way, because it is a subject on which I neither wish to make jokes or to administer rebukes. We owe something to the Labour Statistical Department of the Board of Trade for the information given by it; and I hope that in future all Returns will give the number of hours worked in different trades in this as compared with other countries. The hon. Member did not say whether the men whose hours were restricted to 48 were to receive only 48 hours' wages, nor did he explain how the margin of profit would enable anything else to be done, especially as in the textile trades there is said to be no sufficient margin to bear this increase. The hon. Member who seconded the Amendment suggested that we should negotiate with other countries to keep ourselves in the same position of advantage as that in which we now are. This shows a confidence in the generosity of other nations which we have not always shown to them. Do you think that the men will consent to have their pay reduced? The case of the Mover of the Amendment is that the working men are so badly paid now that life is unendurable. Are you going to take an eighth or a sixth off their wages so as to make their life still less endurable? The hon. Member said that there was, or ought to be, a margin, and that if not it did not concern him, even though the manufacturers were driven away. But if the manufacturers go the manufactures go to. It is a question of giving enough employment to a population which, crowded in big centres, sometimes becomes unmanageable when misled by thoughtless enthusiasts, who tell them that the Government should find them food and clothes. I do not know that it would be at all needful to address the House at any length on this subject, because the Mover of the Amendment has been demolished by his Seconder, were it not that I have some suspicion there are statesmen who look with favour on the hon. Member's proposal. The noble Lord (Lord R. Churchill) is entitled to rank among the statesmen of this country, and he is looking with a sympathetic eye, and perhaps with some slight favour, on the movement. In Germany the looking at the question with some slight favour has led to playing with it on the one hand, and repressing the movement on the other. The poor wages, the long hours and the terrific burdens of the great populations of Europe, seem to me to be due more than anything else to the pressure upon them of exaggerated armaments, which diminish the purchasing power of the wages earned by the working men, and take away a large number of men from the circle of producers, making them only consumers. One of the best courses we could adopt, if it were possible—which I am afraid not—would be to preach to the nations of Europe not to have their peace establishments higher than their war establishments used to be. It is said that in Great Britain there is a demand among working men for the restriction of the hours of labour by law. I deny it. I do not deny that there is some demand; there are demands for everything. I deny, however, that there is a general demand. I regret that the hon. Member who moved the Amendment has alleged that there has been skilful manipulation of figures at the Dundee Conference. The hon. Member is well aware that out of more than 300 Trades Unions making returns to the Registrar—and there are some that are not registered—only a very small minority took any pains to vote at all, showing that the bulk of them were indifferent to the expression of any opinion upon the subject. Although Circulars were sent out to every Trade Union, only a very few replied; certainly 250 did not reply. I think that in fairness this should have been stated to the House. My own means of judging the opinion of working men has not been limited to conversations with my constituents after speeches on the Irish Question. I hear the hon. Member say that he did not specify me; but certainly there were certain allusions to factious opposition on the part of the junior Member for Northampton. I know they were kindly meant, or not meant at all. Well, both internationally and nationally for the last 25 years of my life, outside the Trades Unions—for having, I am sorry to say, never learnt a trade, I never had the right to belong to any Trade Union—I have mixed in these questions at least as much as any living man in this country; and I say that, even if the Trades Unions were unanimous on this subject, which they are not, you must remember that the bulk of the labourers, skilled and unskilled—I am sorry for it—do not belong to any Union. Although I cannot speak in the same familiar way as the hon. Member of the leaders of popular movements abroad, I have come across a good many of them, and amongst them M. Yves Guyot, the French Minister of Public Works, and he has given me an entirely different view from that stated by the hon. Member of the feeling in France on this question. I would ask the House to judge of the accuracy of the hon. Member's statements by one little instance. He told us that last year there were in Paris two Congresses on trade matters, but that they were practically one. Well, that is practically just what they were not. They were practically two. They would not work together, or do anything together. They both voted, for what?

*MR. GRAHAM: For an eight hours day.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: For an eight hours day for everyone? Well, that would put an end at once to the textile industries of this country. It would close at once some of our best foundries; it would close the bulk of those great works that have placed England in advance amongst the workshops of the world. It is not friendliness to the poor man to propose what you are proposing. His wickedest enemy could not do worse, for you are proposing to render impossible the industries in which many men gain their livelihood. Nor is it true that the working man's lot is unendurable, or is becoming more unendurable. There is distress, too much distress; long hours, too many long hours; but the hours are far shorter than they were when I was a lad—far shorter than they were when I commenced to be active amongst the people. The people's homes are better in the majority of instances. It is perfectly true—and I admit the great difficulty surrounding the fact—that in a huge collection of population such as you have in London you get extremes of poverty and misery that are appalling. But your eight hours will not touch that. It has nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. Bradlaugh

You talk of hypothetical revolution, and you tell us accurately enough that in the Marxist Party, to which you belong, this Eight Hours Question is one of the first planks. One of the features of the Marxist policy approved by the hon. Mover was the destruction of the bourgeoisie. But these are vain words, or wicked words, if they are words which really mean that you can destroy one class in the interest of another in any civilised community at all, much less that you can do it here. I know more both of the workmen and their employers than the hon. Member. It has been my good fortune to hear many men of different trades speak well of their employers, and to hear them speak sympathetically of the difficulty in trade crises of carrying on large industries in which large amounts of capital are sunk. It is perfectly true that by some happy accident, or by some skilful enterprise, an employer occasionally amasses an enormous fortune; but that is the exception and not the rule, and many an owner of mills, or an employer who is engaged in some other great branch of manufacture, has to watch with the greatest care the narrow margin which enables him to conduct his business. If Parliament were to sanction such a proposal as this, it would mean that we can regulate the conditions of labour, and regulate them better than they can be regulated between employer and employed. I understand the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Atherley-Jones) to suggest that whatever in combination the men may be able to effect between themselves it is open to Parliament to secure by process of law. My hon. and learned Friend is a good lawyer, but he is a bad legislator if that is his view. It has been urged that sanction of this kind given by Parliament helps to form public opinion. It is no part of the duty of Parliament to form public opinion on this question. It is the duty of Parliament to legislate for the prevention of crime, to prevent frauds of all kinds, to protect the weak, where they needed protection, against injury from the strong. It is the duty of Parliament to legislate where the conditions are such as to endanger life or limb. It is not the duty of Parliament to interfere between employer and employed in the conduct of their own business. Neither is it true that this proposal involves an international question capable of decision by an international law. The standard of comfort differs in various countries; the wages are not the same, and values are not the same. I am in favour of shorter hours of labour; but I do not believe that any Statute Parliament can pass will have the effect of shortening those hours. The hon. Member (Mr. Cuninghame Graham) referred to the Returns relating to this subject in America; but he did not quote from it, and very wisely so, because he would have had to quote exactly the opposite to what he told the House, and the test is easy, the Return is on the Table. In the Library there is that magnificent volume on Work and Wages, which forms part of the last Census Return of the United States of America; and in the Reports of the Commissioners of Labour published by the most advanced and most settled States, there is evidence, over and over again, from the men themselves that the law has failed to shorten their hours of labour that combination has done it. In one case—in the Federal Law—and in several of the State laws there has been an enactment that men should only work for a certain number of hours a day. The men themselves have rebelled against that because it shortens their wage by one-fifth per day, and they absolutely made arrangements to break the laws by making enactments for hour labour instead of day labour. They engaged to work for periods of hours at so much per hour, with special stipulations to evade the law which it is said they are so anxious for. I do not think the hon. Member dealt quite fairly with the House. He talked about eight and eight and a half and nine and nine and a half hours of labour in European countries. He surely must know, if he has taken the pains to read the Return laid on the Table of the House to which I have referred, that there is no country in Europe in which the average hours of labour are as short as those he has quoted. He must know that even if there are compulsory laws, as there are in one or two countries, those laws are evaded with the connivance of the working men. This proposal will, in my opinion, have a most demoralising effect upon the labouring classes. Let the working men encourage a spirit of self-reliance, and settle their hours of labour for themselves. Parliament cannot make backbones for men who have not got them, and to legislate for the weakest and most helpless would discourage the strongest and most vigorous in the continuance of their efforts they have hitherto made, and which have advanced this country before the other nations of the world. What is the real object of these plans for the restriction of the hours of adult labour? Restriction of output. What does that mean? It means that we shall stimulate foreign endeavour in every case where foreign nations have access to raw material—and I know no case in which we have a monopoly of it—we shall stimulate them to drive us out of every foreign market in the world. If that is what the hon. Member is contending for it may be one of the weapons of the Marxist Party of social revolution; but even if I am to be denounced as factious and to be told that the whole of my constituents will vote against me, which I do not believe, I will vote for what I believe to be the benefit of the people and I will not allow any illusionary will o'-the-wisp to be danced before their eyes, which will only lead them in a quagmire from which the Marxist Party would not rescue them. I was astounded at one phrase that fell from the Mover of the Amendment. I understood him to say that on purely economical grounds the workmen have been agitating in their Trades Unions and their clubs. I have heard that some of the advocates of an Eight Hours Bill are rather hard on those who stand on economical grounds. I am inclined to traverse the hon. Gentleman's suggestion. I do not mean to say the hon. Member has been purposely incorrect, but I think he has been most unfortunate in misunderstanding the expressions of opinions of those he comes in contact with. It is true there is a Party which had its origin in Germany and which was driven to this country by the brutal coercion of some of its members some 30 or 40 years ago. It is true that that Party of social revolutionists exists; but I do not believe that its methods have taken deep root in the hearts of our people. It is perfectly true that if you go to men and say—

"Would you like the 5s. you receive now to be paid for working half the time," you would get a vote "Yes"; and one of the advanced members of the Marxist Party, in a book sent to me this week for review, says that the hours of labour are to be reduced to a minimum of two and a maximum of five. Let the working men in their organisations, without our help, settle for themselves what they want. Our duty as legislators is, when they are unfairly treated, to speak for them here; when we find them cheated, to bring in laws for their protection; when we find their lives endangered, to legislate if we can to diminish the danger, although we can do very little in that way, and we should do very much more if we can to make them more sensible of the danger they run, and more impressed with the necessity of combining to protect themselves from the consequences of danger. It is certainly no part of our duty to regulate the conditions of labour. The Mover of the Amendment said this is no Party question. I hope it will not be. Social questions will grow fast enough in this country without their being made the battledore and shuttlecock of personal ambitions and Party exigencies. I appeal to Members on both sides of the House—do not give any hesitating vote, and do not, for fear of offending somebody at the moment, vote in favour of this Amendment unless you are prepared to go much further still, and put the clock of England back to the time when this Parliament or its predecessor did regulate the hours of labour, as was thought in the interest of employers, and failed, masters and men combining against it. If the feeling of the working classes is in favour of short hours, we shall have them; if the feeling is hostile to such, your laws ought not to go against that feeling. If you are going to shorten the hours of labour and restrict production, where will you find the new wealth that is to keep the ever-increasing millions of this country? I can understand those in favour of Revolution voting in favour of this Amendment, but I, always in favour of Reform and against Revolution, will give my vote in the Lobby against it.

*(11.2.) MR. BEAUFOY (Lambeth, Kennington): I shall not for a moment

attempt to follow the hon. Member for Northampton through his very elaborate arguments, but perhaps I may be allowed to say a very few words from the point of view of practical experience which, from an Assembly of practical men, may claim attention. I disclaim the character of a thoughtless enthusiast, but I have given careful consideration to this subject upon which we are engaged, and, having put my opinion into practical operation and in position, to give some sort of judgment as to the result. First, we are told there is no general desire on the part of workmen throughout England for any restriction of the hours of labour. To this I can say that I represent a constituency which includes a large number of gas workers, railway employés and others with whom I am in constant communication, and I find there is a most anxious desire among those two classes I have mentioned that there should be a limitation of the hours of labour to eight hours a day. Then we are told that the result of such limitation would be a great decrease in the output of manufactures. Of course, I should be unwilling to say this might not be the case in some trades, but I may venture to give the practical result within my personal knowledge. For six months the hours of labour of my employés have been reduced from nine and three-quarter hours to eight hours, and the result, in this instance, has been to secure a larger output than before and to reduce the overtime by 75 per cent. I may safely say, in a general way, that the output has not been diminished, but has rather increased. I cannot say if this would hold good of all trades, but there is the result of my experience. We are told that it is no part of the duty of Parliament to stand between masters and men, and how far that may be so I am not prepared to say; but inasmuch as this Amendment only raises the question whether it is possible and desirable to consider the hours of labour, it would be most unwise for Government to refuse such a discussion. Many working men must be dissatisfied with the present condition of things in England; on the one hand, we have hours of unusual length and low pay, and on the other hand, we have no work at all, and the only resource left—the workhouse. From the workmen's point of view this is a matter of the greatest importance, and it would ill become the friends of labour to set themselves against a full and fair discussion.

(11.7.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I was rather sorry to hear the speech of the hon. Member for North-West Lanark (Mr. Graham), for while I agree with his Amendment I am in the unfortunate position of being unable to agree with his speech in support of it. The Amendment is in favour of the Government taking part in the Labour Conferences at Berne and Berlin—the speech was in favour of a general Eight Hours Bill. Now, what inclines me to vote for the Amendment is this: A Committee has taken a vast amount of evidence in regard to the Sweating System, and that evidence tends to show that there are trades in this country in which work is carried on for terribly long hours. A large number of persons in London work not for 10 or 12 hours, but for 16 and 20 hours out of the 24. We have not yet had the Report of that Committee on the Sweating System, and it is probable or possible that when we do get it, it will contain some recommendation for shortening hours of labour. But if this Committee appointed by the present Government should make such a proposal, and if the Government reject the proposition now made, their hands will be tied and they will be unable to give any effect to the recommendation in the Report of the Sweating Committee. Taken in connection with the possible recommendation of this Committee, it seems to me the proposal of my hon. Friend is an eminently practicable one. It is a proposal that we shall try to find out if foreign workmen will agree with our workmen to limit the hours of labour. The result of such a Conference may be attended with the greatest possible benefit for the working classes, although the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), who, I am sorry to see has left his place after delivering his speech, says of the proposal that from the wickedest enemy of the working classes no proposal could be worse. That is what the hon. Member says of a proposal that the working men of this country should have the opportunity of knowing if foreign workmen will co-operate for limiting the hours of labour. The hon. Member made another astonishing statement. He said, as regards labour, the only duty of Government was to protect the lives and limbs of the workers. I should have thought the duty of the State went a little further than that, and included protection for the health of labourers. But the hon. Member in his desire, I suppose, to get cheers from the other side, which he is always doing now—I am glad to see him return to his place—says the only duty of the State is to protect the life and limbs of the labourer. Would he not include protection to health?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Certainly, from diseases that may be serious.

MR. PHILIPPS: I am glad to get that extension of the definition. Further, the hon. Member says, "You cannot supply backbone by law to the weaker members of the community." Can't you? I think the hon. Member supported the Ballot Act, which was to supply backbone to those who needed it, and nothing else. If the hon. Member is consistent in his desire to get cheers from hon. Gentlemen opposite he should move to repeal the Ballot Act and similar legislation. Then the hon. Member said that if we reduce the hours of labour we stimulate foreign competition. Yes, but that was unworthy of the hon. Member, for he begs the whole question. We are debating an Amendment which embodies the proposal that we shall try and find out, if we reduce hours of labour here in England, whether foreign manufacturers and workmen would co-operate with us, and, by international agreement, make this reduction of hours general throughout Europe. That is in itself an important thing upon which to be satisfied, and it is a matter not disposed of by a few words from the hon. Member behind me. The hon. Member endeavours successfully to get cheers from the other side of the House; but in spite of anything he has said, there are many Members who will support this very moderate proposition, a proposition which commits nobody to anything, and which is, therefore, in our present state of information a very excellent proposition. It is a proposition to find out if there is any truth in the statement that if British workmen reduce their hours of labour foreign workmen will take advantage of that to take the bread out of their mouths. I do not believe that foreign workmen will do anything so stupid. Generally speaking, they work longer than our people do; and I believe if we reduced our hours foreigners would reduce theirs in proportion, still keeping the relative distance. At all events, there are doubts about the matter which this proposal is intended to solve, and I hope the Government may be able to tell us that they propose to accept the invitations sent out from Berlin and Berne.

*(11.15.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I will only intervene for a few moments, and that in reference only to one particular industry—the cotton trade of Lancashire. Several speakers have referred to the effect of shorter hours on this great industry. I have been connected with the trade all my life, and have taken considerable pains to discover the length of the hours of labour in the different countries engaged in this industry. I would call attention to one matter which has not been touched upon in the discussion to-night, and that is the growing competition this trade has to meet from Asiatic labour. The trade of Lancashire has suffered immensely in the last 10 or 15 years from the growing competition of the cotton factories of India. A large business has been wrested from us, and there have been occasions when both employer and employed have suffered loss and distress through this cause. The House will realise the nature of the competition when I mention that while the Indian mills work 80 hours a week—and I may call the attention of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh) to this fact—it supports the argument in his speech, to which I listened with much interest—at the present moment the Indian factories work 80 hours a week, while in Lancashire we are restricted to 56½ hours. One result of this is that the Indian cotton trade has been growing by leaps and bounds, while our trade has been stationary in comparison. In the last 20 years the consumption of cotton in the factories of India has increased 1,000 per cent., while the increase in England has been 25 per cent. During the same period the increase in the Continental factories of Europe has been 120 per cent., and in America 130 per cent. Further, not only are the hours of labour so much longer in India, but the rate of wages is just a quarter of the rate in Lancashire. Cotton mills in India have, in several instances, paid dividends of 30 and 40 per cent., while the average rate of profit in Lancashire in the last few years has not been more than 3 per cent. We have in the town of Oldham 90 co-operative concerns; their accounts are published and open to public inspection, and the works are largely owned by members of the working classes, and I can say, after having studied the accounts with some care, that if you take the figures for five years back, and take profit and loss together, you will find that these concerns have not paid, on an average, more than 3 per cent. Now I ask the House, would it be possible to put any additional burden on a trade already so heavily handicapped? Remember, the hours of labour are also longer in Germany, France, Switzerland, and even in America. I went through Central Europe two years ago, and I inquired specially in all the principal towns as to the hours of labour in factories, and I found that, as a rule, those hours were from 15 to 20 per cent. longer than the hours in England—while wages was 20 to 30 per cent. less. The great difficulty in compulsorily shortening the hours of labour would be that you would cripple our foreign trade. If we did not depend upon our foreign trade, you might make a good many experiments, perhaps without very much risk; but we have a total import and export trade of 2,700 millions sterling; the life of our people, in fact, depends upon it, and we cannot afford to make such experiments with it. It is carried on under the hottest and closest competition, and no country competes with us more severely than Germany. I have very little faith in any International agreement for shortening the hours of labour being carried out. No agreement has ever been carried out for reducing the armies of foreign nations. Mutual jealousy prevents any such International agreement, and so long as you have France and Germany filled with hostility to each other you cannot expect any arrangement for shortening the hours of labour being honestly carried out. I believe, on the whole, the scheme is illusory and impracticable, but I hope and believe that the influence of public opinion and the higher moral sense of the community will steadily tend to a wholesome reduction of the hours of labour. I shall rejoice to see the hours of toil lessened and the toilers get more of the product of their labour. Though I cannot agree with the hon. Member's Motion I recognise the high motives that have actuated him in his endeavour to carry out a principle that is a credit to his humanity.

*(11.20.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Considering that the terms of the Motion contemplate particular action on the part of Her Majesty's Government abroad, it is perhaps desirable that some statement should be made on their behalf. From one point of view I think it will be conceded that this discussion will not be without its use. I would be the last to remark unfavourably on the differences of opinion which have been expressed on the other side of the House, as the question so nearly affects the welfare of large masses of the community in this country, and is one to which the attention of the deepest thinkers has been directed. It is, therefore, not surprising that men equally actuated by the most benevolent and patriotic motives should take different views. It cannot but be useful that on a question of this kind opinions should be expressed by gentlemen who have deeply studied the subject, and who have given materials for future thought and for careful consideration of this question when it comes before the House in a more concrete form. It is unfortunate that I shall be obliged to deal very restrictively in the reply which I make on the particular form of the Amendment, for Her Majesty's Government have received from the German and Swiss Governments invitations to Conferences on the laws affecting labour, and the replies to those messages cannot be communicated to Parliament until they have been received by the Governments to which they are addressed and the consent of those Governments has been obtained to the publication. It is in no narrow or technical spirit that such reserve is maintained. It must be evident that in negotiations on such momentous questions the invitation itself might be subject to modification in consequence of views expressed by other nations. The premature announcement of the intentions of one Government might thus prejudice the interest at stake, and consequently, I think I need not offer an apology for reserving a statement as to the intentions of Her Majesty's Government until a fitting time. A question has been given notice of for to-morrow, and then I hope I may be able to state what reply has been made to the German Government. Her Majesty's Government have received information to-day that the Swiss Government, in view of the proposals of the German Emperor, and of the parallel lines on which their own proposals have moved, have resolved for the present to abandon the intention of holding a Conference at Berne. But as to the Conference at Berlin, it is impossible for me to state at present the purport of the reply made to the invitation, and I cannot but think that in these circumstances the House will not press on the Government an Amendment which would fetter their liberty of action. This I can say, that the German invitation has been replied to in no unsympathetic spirit. The questions involved deeply concern the welfare of our own population, as well as the populations of other countries, and the invitation has been considered by Her Majesty's Government in a spirit suitable to that in which it has been tendered.

(11.25.) LORD R. CHURCHILL: Mr. Speaker, it has been my fortune to listen in this House to many statements and explanations made by Under Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs. I have always thought there was a great deal of unnecessary pomposity and secrecy about the attitude which the Foreign Office—no matter which Party is in power—adopts on these occasions. All my experiences, however, which have been varied and numerous, have been put into the shade by the performance of the right hon. Gentleman who now represents the Foreign Office in this House, for although the debate has been going on for some time, and notice was given of the Amendment more than 10 days ago, the right hon. Gentleman is only able to inform the House that in answer to a question which is to be put to him to-morrow he might be able to say what reply Her Majesty's Government have made to the Government of Berlin. The position of the right hon. Gentleman is this. The right hon. Gentleman intimates that one word said to-night indicating the tenour of the reply which Her Majesty's Government have made to the German Government might be of the greatest possible danger to the question at stake, but he added that to-morrow he might be able to reply without any danger accruing therefrom. I have heard many Foreign Office answers, but I never heard one to come near that. Then the right hon. Gentleman went further and said that Her Majesty's Government had received news to the effect that the Swiss Government have decided to abandon their project of holding a conference at Berne. The right hon. Gentleman was very candid, but that information was announced this very morning in every newspaper. The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the reply to the Government of Berlin had not been unsympathetic. I really do not quite know what to make of that. I can quite understand that negotiations with Foreign Powers, or matters which might at any moment cause International disputes, ought not to be prematurely made public. But this is a matter of a totally different character. On social questions of this kind, on which diplomatic negotiations have taken place before, and a certain attitude has been taken up, it does seem ridiculous that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs is not instructed by the Foreign Secretary to tell the House frankly and plainly what has been the upshot of the invitation which has been sent by the Government of Berlin. Everyone must think that there is not the slightest rhyme or reason in concealing from the House whether the Government has adopted, with regard to the Berlin invitation, the same attitude as they adopted with reference to the Conference at Berne. From the answer of the Under Secretary, I suppose there has been a modification in the terms of the answer. I thought there would have been, and I think that this declaration might as well be made in this debate as at question time in the House. I cannot, of course, vote for the Amendment, as it is an Amendment to the Address. I regret the practice of bringing forward on the Address Motions which have no legitimate connection whatever with it, but which ought to take their chance with private Members' Motions. But, as the subject has been raised, I will put in a plea for discussion of the matter. If the eight hours movement, or a movement for some restriction of the hours of labour, is an unsound one, nothing could demonstrate its unsoundness better than Parliamentary discussion, and in a great manufacturing country like this for the Government to say they will not discuss such a subject appears to me to be the most foolish and most short-sighted attitude they could take up. I could understand the Government sending a delegate to a foreign country and instructing him to argue against such a proposal. At any rate, then, by taking such a course full information on the subject would be at the disposal of Members of Parliament and everyone else. The speech of the hon. Member for Northampton has been a mixture of banter, rhetoric, and assertion. The banter was not first class, but so far as the hon. Member himself is concerned it was effective. The rhetoric, too, was not first class, and the assertions were very loud and strong, and more or less appealed to the emotions. The speech called forth loud manifestations of feeling on the Government side of the House. In fact, while the hon. Member was speaking, and as I took the part of a philosophic observer, the interesting problem passed through my mind—which would be the first Member of the House to take his seat on the Treasury Bench, the hon. Member for Northampton or the right hon. Member for West Birmingham. The hon. Member for Northampton said that the Government had no right to take part in any foreign Conference on social questions unless they were prepared to legislate upon those questions. That seems to me a most untenable proposition. If they will not discuss those questions in a Conference at Berlin, they will have to do so in the House of Commons. The hon. Member has alluded to the state of affairs in America, and has said that laws regulating adult labour in that country have either been evaded or been futile, but the fact that such laws have been passed proves, at least, that they were adopted with popular assent and approval. Therefore to take up the dogmatic position that there is no demand is both childish and unsound. The hon. Member has carefully omitted all reference to Australia, to which we are bound by nearer and closer ties than we are to America, where the people are not inferior to us in ability, resource, education, or knowledge, and yet where the eight hours system has for a long time been adopted. In that very valuable work by Sir C. Dilke, Greater Britain, this passage occurs:—

“In the Australian Colonies the eight hours day prevails and is all but universal, as in the towns of South Africa the nine hours day is as far as European labour is concerned. . . . The eight hours day of labour has the full approbation of the whole community.”

It may be said, perhaps, that the eight hours day has been obtained by custom and not by law, but a further passage from the same book shows that in the Australian Colonies it is customary to insert in public Bills dealing with work carried out by Government a provision relating to the hours of labour, and that in some private Bills clauses fixing the day's work at eight hours have been inserted. Sir C. Dilke said with reference to the result of this eight hours system:—

“In Australia the effect of the eight hours and at the Cape of the nine hours day is socially conservative—that is to say, the comfort conferred by it on the working classes prevents agitation and revolutionary tendencies.”

This was written by a student of modern history and society who did not attempt to excite public opinion for any object of his own, but wrote to demonstrate facts and facts alone. These references were worth infinitely more than the speech of the hon. Member for Lanarkshire and the fervid rhetoric of the hon. Member for Northampton.

*MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I should like to inform the noble Lord that in my humble way I have already quoted the passages which he has read to the House.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I am glad to hear it, because a twice told tale is more likely to impress than a once told tale. Now, I will refer to the extraordinary position taken up by the hon. Member for Northampton. The hon. Member says it is not the duty of Parliament to form public opinion. How many Members of the Radical Party will support the hon. Member in that assertion? I have always thought that it was the proudest boast of that Party that the greatest reforms of the last century have all been owing to the way in which it has formed public opinion in this House. I shall be surprised if it is possible to find one Radical Member who does not express profound disagreement with that opinion. Then the hon. Member said that it was not the business of Parliament to interfere between employer and employed for the regulation of adult labour. Why, for the last quarter of a century the operation of the laws passed in this House has been to restrict, modify, and control adult labour directly and indirectly. From the day when the first Factory Act was passed Parliament has been regulating the hours and time and operation of adult labour. [An hon. MEMBER: No.] I cannot argue with the hon. Member who dissents; I can only advise him to enlarge the scope of his studies and not to intervene rashly in the discussion of subjects of which he evidently has an imperfect knowledge. Then the hon. Member for Northampton said that it was the duty of Parliament to protect the weakest against the strongest. Have I quoted the hon. Member correctly?

Lord R. Churchill

*MR. BRADLAUGH: No, I said more than that; I stated what it was the duty of Parliament to protect the weakest against.

*LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL: I put down the words at the time. But is the hon. Gentleman prepared to assert positively at the present moment that labour is stronger than capital?

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I made no such assertion at all. I will, if necessary, repeat what I did say.

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I am not perfectly clear that the hon. Member did not say that capital and labour did not respectively represent the strongest and the weakest.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I am sure the noble Lord does not intend to misrepresent what I said. Shall I repeat it?

LORD R. CHURCHILL: I prefer to rely on my own recollection. I listened with concentrated attention to everything which the hon. Member said, and I am not certain that labour with regard to capital is not occupying the relation of the weaker to the stronger. We have heard a great deal about the narrow margin of profit and the extreme danger-of doing anything that will cut down for the capitalist the margin of profit on which he conducts his enterprise. But I have not been able to detect lately where that narrow margin exists. The income-tax and revenue Returns certainly do not show a narrow margin of profit in trade, and we must also bear in mind the enormous number of limited companies started every day, and such matters as the dividends of railway companies, which are now very largely in excess of those of former years. Do these undertakings show a narrow margin of profit? This narrow margin of profit is a fine assertion when it is put forward, and I admit that the eight hours movement is a cutting of profits, but it does not mean a lowering of wages. I cannot, however, accept the narrow margin of profit on the assertion of the hon. Member or on the indignant assertions of the hon. Members behind me. In these social questions I believe in a sympathetic attitude. The hon. Member did not allude to the mass of unemployed in the country, and yet the mass of employed to unemployed is a feature of great social importance not paralleled abroad. Do not, therefore, let us adopt a dogmatic attitude in these social questions, but let us, for one party as well as for the other, adopt a sympathetic attitude; let us examine the demands of the labouring classes and look at the matter from their point of view, and, having done so, if we are obliged to disagree from them, let hon. Members endeavour to show their reasons for doing so by means of instructed and enlightened argument and by a total absence of anything like dogmatism.

(11.52.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I wish to make an appeal to the House on this question. There will be ample opportunity during the course of the Session for a renewal of the discussion on a much wider scale. The Government are anxious, but are unable, to take part in the discussion as freely as they would wish to to-night, and seeing that time is now so important to the interests of the country, and that it is also desirable, in the interests of the working classes, that fuller discussion should be allowed on this matter, I do trust that the House will agree at once to come to a decision upon this Amendment, and enable us to-night to dispose of the Address.

*(11.53.) MR. CREMER, (Haggerston): I do not propose to prolong the debate so as to prevent a Division being taken, but I wish just to say a few words before we go into the Lobbies, to explain the reasons why some hon. Members on this side of the House intend to vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I wish it to be clearly understood that they are going to vote for it because it simply proposes that an inquiry should take place, and that by voting for the Amendment they are not necessarily pledging themselves to the principle involved in the Eight Hours Bill. I regret that so much time has been taken up in discussing the Eight Hours Bill rather than the principle involved in the Amendment of my hon. Friend: I hope the Government will accede to the principle in the Amendment, because while I have very little faith in the good likely to result from such a Conference, it shows that we are getting on when a Monarch of a first-class power steps down from his throne into the popular arena and practically says to his subjects:—

“ I admit your grievances, and I am prepared to discuss them with you; I will do more. I will invite other Governments to assist me in the discussion of your grievances with a view, if possible, of mitigating the evils from which you suffer,”

I think the Government ought to assent to the invitation and to reject the advice of the noble Lord the Member for South Paddington, by accepting the principle of the Amendment. The noble Lord made some extraordinary assertions. He said that the Government of this country were in a better position than any other Government to dispel any illusions on the question of shortening the hours of labour, and then he wound up with the extraordinary declaration that he should vote against the Amendment of my hon. Friend. It seems to me that the position taken up by the noble Lord on the question is utterly illogical, and I hope that the Government will not take his advice, but will accept the principle embodied in the Amendment. I admit that personally I have not much faith in the inquiry which will take place at the Conference because of the quarter from which the proposal comes. I have no particular faith in monarchs or in the prescriptions which they, from time to time, propound for the social and economic grievances of the mass of the people. But, seeing that machinery has multiplied the power of production to such extent as to render unnecessary prolonged hours of labour, I hope that the Government will agree to take part in the inquiry which it is proposed to hold at the instigation of the Emperor of Germany.

*(11.59.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: Are we to clearly understand that the Government during the Session will give us a further opportunity for discussing this subject?

THIRD READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: With regard to the question which was asked me last night by the noble Earl Kimberley, I am not quite certain that I properly heard or understood the discussion which occurred between him and the noble Lord Selborne, who also referred to the matter. However, I have now got the figures, which are already familiar to those who take part in the Black Rod Committee, and I can state them exactly. The actual saving which has been made on the occasion of the new arrangement involving the appointment at the Table of your Lordships' House is £1,400; and the amount is arrived at thus: the reduction in the salary of the office, in accordance with the Committee's Report, accounts for £600 per annum; the transfer of Mr. Thesiger from the list of Parliament Clerks, where his salary was £600, rising to £1,000, accounts for £600 more; and the abolition of the office of Secretary of Presentations accounts for another £500. That makes a total of £1,700. On the other hand has to be taken into account, as I am now informed, the appointment of a new Clerk in the Parliament Office, with a salary beginning at £100. An allowance has also to be made for the officer by whom the large personal correspondence of the Lord Chancellor must be carried on in relation to ecclesiastical matters, and that correspondence will not cease or diminish merely because the formalities of presentations are transferred by the Bill to the Clerk of the Crown. I may mention, for the information of the noble Lord who put the question, that this matter was not arranged by me, but was recommended in 1874 by a Royal Commission, and was agreed to in a correspondence which occurred in 1884, before I was in office. What has taken place will not diminish or alter the character of the arrangement by the fact of the transfer of the duties from one person to another. The amount of the allowance was fixed at £200 by the Commissioners, who recommended the abolition of the Presentation Office—an office which, I need hardly say, was far from being a sinecure. So that the noble Lord will see there has been a considerable saving effected. There has been some question as to the saving effected by the recommendation of the Black Rod Committee, acquiesced in by me, and carried out, though it was competent to me under the Statute to have appointed somebody else, had I not considered myself bound by the undertaking, as far as it was an undertaking, of my predecessors. But I think there has been a saving effected by the new arrangements, which include the appointment of Mr. Thesiger. The House, of course, understands that reductions, corresponding more or less to the two largest items in the calculation, would have followed the appointment of any other gentleman from the Parliament Office to the vacant place at the Table; but the particular appointment which I took the opportunity of making carried with it two further advantages which could not have been otherwise obtained—the rejection of an engagement to abolish the Presentation Office, and the consequent saving of £300 per annum. As I have said, the saving is £1,400, and by the appointment of Mr. Thesiger the saving has been £300 less than it might have been had I not taken him. That, I believe, is how the figures are arrived at, though I confess I did not quite understand them the other night, nor indeed do I now entirely, as neither set of figures appears to be quite accurate.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am obliged to the noble and learned Lord for the answer he has given.

Bill read 3^a (according to order), and passed, and sent to the Commons.

CATHEDRAL CHURCHES BILL.—(No. 14).

SECOND READING.

*THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE: My Lords, the Bill for which I have to ask a Second Reading this evening is, I believe, identically the same as that which was passed by your Lordships two Sessions ago, and therefore it might seem that I should best discharge the duty I have to perform by simply asking for the Second Reading. But I bear in mind that a great deal has passed during these two years, and also that in all probability—I may say, certainly—many of your Lordships are not as familiar with the subject of cathedrals and cathedral churches as I am myself. I may tell your Lordships that, as Dean of Ely, I served a long apprenticeship in matters affecting cathedrals, and it was in the course of that apprenticeship that I learned the details of the governing rules and regulations under the Cathedral Statutes. The fact is that a large number of our cathedrals—I will not say all of them, but certainly a large number of them—are placed in the position of having Statutes of considerable antiquity, which, like many other antiquated things, are totally unfit for present-day use. For example, the Statutes of the Cathedral of Ely date from the reign of Charles II., and those of the Cathedral of Carlisle, with which I am now connected, date from the time of King Henry VIII. I need not say that many things have happened since even the later of those two dates, and that it is probable changes will be required in the rules and regulations with regard to those cathedrals, as in reference to others similarly constituted; but the cathedrals are in the unfortunate position that they have stereotyped Statutes which nothing short of an Act of Parliament can change. I brought the subject before this House more than 10 years ago; and on that occasion the late Lord Beaconsfield, who had had his mind independently directed to the subject, proposed that a Royal Commission should be appointed for the purpose of going into the whole subject of cathedrals and their government. Her Majesty was pleased, at the recommendation of Lord Beaconsfield, to appoint such a Commission, and I had the honour to serve upon it. The late Archbishop and a number of gentlemen, including the present Lord President of the Council, worked very hard upon it for a number of years. We took a great deal of evidence with regard to the different cathedrals; we made a Report as instructed by the Commission upon each cathedral separately; and we presented a General Report as to what we thought ought to be done upon this subject. This Bill is the outcome of the recommendations of Her Majesty's then Commissioners. It was discussed, though not exactly in its present form, two years ago in your Lordships' House, and after being considerably discussed it was modified in Committee, and it has now got into such a condition that I am able to say it is approved of by all those who are intimately connected with these matters—that is to say, all the Cathedral Bodies, I believe, without exception, are desirous that this Bill should pass, and there is no substantial opposition to it in any quarter whatever. Now, what has been the history of this Bill? I had the honour of introducing it two Sessions ago into this House, and, as I have said, it was then carefully discussed and modified and brought into its present form. It went then to the House of Commons, and there, like a great many other Bills, was altogether lost—it went in, but it never came out. Last year it was thought desirable to try the opposite course of introducing the Bill first into the House of Commons, in the hope that if we had a favourable ballot it might stand a chance of being read a second time. Well, my Lords, we had a most unfavourable ballot—I think the number we drew was about 289, or some such comfortable number, and the result was, as might have been expected, that it never came on at all. It was blocked by one Member, and I cannot find that there was any other Member who sympathised with him. At all events, that delightful process of blocking, which is so great an institution in another place, entirely defeated this Bill, and it never came on for a Second Reading at all. It is no use complaining in this House of what takes place in the other; but it is, at all events, a relief to my feelings to say that I think it is a hard case that a Bill which has practically met with no opposition, simply owing to certain rules and regulations of the House of Commons, has never had an opportunity given to it of any opinion being expressed upon it at all. I know positively that the leaders in the House of Commons are in favour of it, and I know, certainly, that if it had a chance of coming to a Second Reading it would pass without difficulty, and yet, owing, as I have said, to certain technical rules, the Bill could not come before the House, and last year it accordingly died what may be called a natural death. This year I do not know what the success of the Bill may be, but it has been thought wise to begin the process the other way; to ask your Lordships to be kind enough to give it a Second Reading in this House, and then to send it down to the other House, in the hope that it may possibly get a Second Reading there. It is very difficult to prophecy what may happen: at all events, it is very difficult to prophecy at present with regard to the Bill; but I cannot help thinking that seeing the importance of the subject with which it deals, and the fact that it is the result of the hard work of those who sat on the Royal Commission, there must be sufficient freedom and wisdom in the House of Commons to give it a Second Reading. My Lords, I can only conclude by saying that having worked upon this subject for a number of years, and having given to it a great deal of time and attention, the day will certainly be one of the happiest of my life in which this Bill having been passed Her Majesty shall be pleased to give her assent to it.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

COUNTY COUNCILS AND LOCAL RATES.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*THE EARL OF HARROWBY: My Lords, I rise to call attention to the financial engagements which were made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the President of the Local Government Board when the Local Government Act was passed in 1888; and to inquire whether Her Majesty's Government are prepared to consider the possibility of making provision during the present Session for the fulfilment of those engagements, so that the County Councils of England and Wales may receive, without further delay, the additional sum of not less than £700,000 per annum in relief of local rates which was promised to the ratepayers? I do not think it is necessary that I should make any apology for asking your Lordships' attention for a short time to a matter which greatly affects the County Councils throughout England and Wales. For I am well aware that many of your Lordships have taken a very keen and active part in these new and important Bodies having been elected to them by the new popular constituencies established by the Act of 1888. I feel it is a matter of importance that Her Majesty's Government, and others outside this House, should be aware that on these matters of finance a very deep interest is taken by all the County Councils of the United Kingdom. Now is the time when we ought to make our voices heard in regard to local taxation, because, doubtless, the financial proposals of the year are now being finally arranged. I think it is best that I should, in the first place, recall to your Lordships' recollection what the financial engagements were to which I allude, which were finally made in connection with the Local Government Act, 1888. Those financial engagements were stated by Mr. Ritchie very fully at the time of his introduction of the Bill. I will shortly recapitulate what they were, and I beg your Lordships to remember that upon the financial proposals of the Government with regard to this great measure the favour with which it was received largely depended. The proposals were the following: All grants in aid of rates formerly made to the County Authorities were to cease. The effect of that was at once to knock off £2,600,000 per annum. Instead of that grant in aid the County Authorities were to receive in future from the liquor licenses, £1,378,000; from other existing licenses, £1,590,000. Beyond this, from personality in some form or shape, Mr. Ritchie stated they were to receive £1,800,000, and from new licenses they were to receive £826,000, making a total grant from the Imperial Exchequer to local taxation of about £5,600,000 per annum. As to both these latter grants he declined to state from what special source they would be drawn: throwing the responsibility of this upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Deducting, therefore, the old grants-in-aid, which were to the amount of £2,600,000, there was what was called by Mr. Ritchie throughout the discussions in the House of Commons, a round sum of £3,000,000 per annum to be furnished in aid of local taxation from Imperial sources, in addition to the £2,600,000 formerly given by the abandoned grants in aid. That, I hold, was the key to the whole of the Government proposal with regard to the Bill of 1888. Personally, the Chancellor of the Exchequer afterwards told us, was to be made to contribute to local taxation by means of making over to the Local Authorities about half the Probate Duty: the new licences were to be what were called the Wheel and Van Tax and the Horse Licenses. But your Lordships will observe that in all the early discussions upon this great measure the details of these new grants in aid were left entirely out of the discussion by the President of the Local Government Board. He simply adhered to the one great principle that it was necessary and fair to give an additional subvention of £3,000,000 sterling per annum to the Local Authorities in relief of local taxation. That was the constant burden of every speech that he made. I will go on to consider a little further, if your Lordships will allow me, what was the tone which was adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer with regard to this great matter. The Chancellor of the Exchequer went into this question of Imperial and local taxation most carefully, and he put this question to the House. He said he thought he ought to ask to what extent the ratepayers were entitled to the relief which was to be given to them, this additional and new relief of £3,000,000 sterling per annum; and he then went on to protest strongly against this relief being considered simply a relief to what he called the squirearchy, and he impressed upon the House of Commons that a very large portion of that amount would go "to the relief of the poorest class of ratepayers in the poorest towns of the Kingdom." I quote his words. He then proceeded to point out that of late years there had been an enormous increase in the rates levied on houses and lands, and stated that in the 20 years from 1868 to 1888, the local rates had risen from £16,000,000 to

£26,000,000 per annum—a total increase of £10,000,000 per annum in 20 years. And he reminded the House that the case was worse even than it looked, because that increase in local rates had taken place at a period of very depressed trade, and when the value of land had enormously decreased. Then he summed up the position, by saying he thought he had fully proved the case that the ratepayers were entitled to the relief (that is the £3,000,000 sterling per annum), which the Government proposed in that Session to give them. He then went on further to claim for his proposals that they were conceived in a just spirit, that it was an act of justice, and not an act of mercy, which he was proposing towards the oppressed ratepayers of the United Kingdom. He concluded his statement of the financial arrangements proposed by the Government by saying that the financial adjustment which he now proposed was to be a final settlement between the local ratepayer and the Imperial taxpayer, that he had felt great difficulty in making the adjustment between Imperial and local taxation; and that the circumstances of the time were such that they had been obliged, once for all, to settle the contributions to local expenditure, and so to place them upon a firmer basis. Now, my Lords, what was this final settlement? It was that this £3,000,000 sterling per annum was to be paid over in addition to the grants hitherto received by the Local and County Authorities. We must always remember the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that this was a thing to which the ratepayers were entitled, and that this grant was by no means equal to the heavy growth of rates, but he was afraid it was all that Parliament could give. It was stated to be a final settlement between the local and Imperial taxpayers, not a gift or an act of mercy, but an act of justice towards the local ratepayers, something to which they were entitled. Now, what is the result at present after that careful treatment of the matter, and final pronouncement as to what was just, by the greatest financial authority of the day? It comes to this, that instead of there being £3,000,000 per annum to the good at the disposal of the Local County Authorities, they have only about £2,200,000 per annum—that is to say, almost a third less than was stated to be what was due to the ratepayers. My Lords, I think I have made out a case showing that this matter is one requiring the gravest consideration, and one which we may very properly press upon the attention of Her Majesty's Government. I would remind your Lordships that during all the debates in the House of Commons there was no hint whatever given that if the Wheel or Cart Tax and the Horse Duty were not accepted by Parliament, this subvention of £3,000,000 a year would be reduced. I have very carefully studied the debates, and I do not find that that was ever held out; on the contrary, it was always considered that that sum represented what was fair and just to the Local Authorities, and that the Government would have to find the £3,000,000 somehow or other. The first hint of danger was given in this House. My noble Friend Lord Balfour of Burleigh, in his able statement of the case, certainly did throw out a doubt on the subject when he said that—

“The relief to local taxation would be not less than 5d. in the £1 if the Wheel Tax, &c., were authorised, but that it would only be 3½d. in the £1 if those taxes dropped.”

But that was only in allusion to the chances of House of Commons procedure at the close of the Session. My Lords, this is no light matter. I have the honour to be Chairman of the Staffordshire County Council, and as far as I can make out from the statements of our experts, the loss we have sustained by the reduction of the £3,000,000 to £2,200,000 is something like £20,000 a year, which is a serious loss to the ratepayers. Well, the Bill passed into an Act in August, 1888, and it passed with the general understanding that £3,000,000 was to be the amount given. There was to be an Autumn Session, and it was supposed that the final arrangements would then be made. The Chancellor of the Exchequer was besieged by questions upon the subject of the Wheel Tax and the Horse Duty. His answers were all in the same vein: he scorned the idea of their not passing. Up to the 29th of November his answers were hopeful and buoyant. Then, at last, the fatal 29th November came, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer adopted a different tone. He said the condition of public business was such that it was impossible to go on with the Wheel and Cart Tax and the Horse Duty that Session. They had to be abandoned owing to the state of business in the House of Commons, and he threw out, apparently, merely a suggestion that it might be better thereafter to ascertain what the County Councils themselves thought about those taxes, so that the Government might be guided somewhat by their opinion. That was the first sign of the new policy which was adopted on this subject. Well, the Session closed, and Parliament met again in 1889, and the first real discussion upon this important financial question took place when the Budget was brought before the House of Commons. I am afraid we must come to the conclusion that though the Chancellor of the Exchequer had been most ardent in favour of the ratepayers in 1888, and could find no words too serious in which to speak of their injuries in the past, and to express his intention of setting those injuries right, other people had wooed the Chancellor of the Exchequer during the Recess. The words which I will read to your Lordships from his Budget speech were alarming. He spoke of the advocates of local taxation reform as Cormorants who were dipping their hands in his pockets, and then he said—

“It belongs entirely to the Municipal and County Authorities to say whether there will be a revival of this tax:”

“It is rather the President of the Local Government Board who has to do with these matters than the Chancellor of the Exchequer”

—a very different tone indeed from the sympathetic language of 1888. The tone of sympathy and compassion for the local taxpayer had vanished, and that individual was now represented as appearing in the form of a pauper at the gates of the Imperial Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman doubtless allowed that the Government would still continue to give the subject their serious attention; but he said that it would be for the Local Boards to take the initiative in regard to any fresh taxation; and that, if their local resources proved to be insufficient through not having these taxes, they might move in the matter. The right of the ratepayers which was before acknowledged in every way, to receive this sum was now apparently dropped. Their right to this distinct sum was entirely put aside, and I am afraid we cannot conceal from ourselves that the Chancellor of the Exchequer's mind on the subject was altogether altered. There is one point which must not be overlooked, to which will particularly call your Lordships' attention. It was said when the subvention of £3,000,000 was first made over to the Local Authorities, that the taxes were increasing taxes, so that the receipts from them would increase with the growth of the wealth of the country, and would meet the growing local expenses. Therefore if we are now told that as the receipts from the Probate Duty and the old licences have increased there is not the same claim for the £700,000 or £800,000 promised from new sources, that is no answer to us, because that very increase was promised and considered when the Chancellor of the Exchequer promised the £3,000,000. So much for that subject. Now with regard to the Wheel and Cart Tax and the Horse Duty. When it is said that the Local Authorities should themselves decide whether they desire them or not, I beg your Lordships to observe that the Government could not more successfully have thrown an apple of discord between town and country than by asking them to express an opinion upon these measures. It is exactly a matter which would separate town and country, and I think it was rather an unfair act to throw this responsibility upon them. With regard to the taxes themselves, I hope your Lordships will understand that I am not arguing in favour of the Wheel and Cart Tax or the Horse Duty or anything of the kind. I do not think it would be right for your Lordships in this House to express any distinct opinion with regard to imposing fresh taxation. And for myself, I entirely decline giving an opinion upon the merits of that tax, and I do not think it is the business of the Councils to do so. It is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to decide what is the fairest tax to be imposed, taking everything into consideration, as to the relative burdens of different classes of ratepayers and taxpayers. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said it was the most difficult thing to adjust the balance between local and Imperial taxation, and he announced that this £3,000,000 per annum might be considered as the final determination of the matter. I would once more most emphatically deny that it is the business of your Lordships' House or of the County Councils to express any opinion upon this subject whatever, while I hold that the Government, having committed themselves most strongly upon this grave subject, and Parliament also having expressed itself most strongly upon the question of this subvention, we have a right to claim this sum from some source or other from Her Majesty's Government. I do not believe that these great popularly elected Local Bodies will ever give up the subvention of £800,000 a year now that it has been once promised them, and I cannot think that any Government can decline for long to give this large portion of the subvention upon which the Act of 1888 was based. And why should they decline to give it now? Surely they should not do so at this moment when, in all the counties of England, we want all the aid we can get. The first starting is necessarily costly, and it is at first starting that the counties specially require all possible financial assistance. I need only allude to the heavy cost of putting in order the whole roads of the country disorganised by the House of Commons' action in sweeping away turnpikes without supplying proper and fair means for their maintenance to show the pressing need at present for aid to local resources. Then I would venture to remind the House and the Government that all over our counties leading men of business in all the various and very different walks of life have come forward heartily and warmly to give their time and thought and trouble to the starting of these great County Councils. If it is found at the end of the three years that, owing to the lack of this £800,000 a year, there is bitter disappointment felt at the results and at the financial condition of the Councils, those people who have come forward and taken the chief part in them will be the first to be blamed by the local constituencies. So that I venture to appeal to Her Majesty's Government on behalf of those who have come forward to promote the success of these important new institutions to make their path in future as easy as possible.

and to enable them to manage successfully the finances of the Councils by giving them this subvention as promised. I claim it, however, not only as a matter of policy but of right, and I take my stand upon those distinct assertions of the greatest financial authority of the day,—the Chancellor of the Exchequer—when he said his proposal was fair and just, that he proposed to make a final settlement of the matter by this subvention of £3,000,000, and that his scheme which he then brought before Parliament and the nation was the relief which was due to the ratepayers of this country. My Lords, I ask Her Majesty's Government the question which stands in my name.

*EARL STANHOPE: My Lords, I trust I may be permitted to say a few words in support of my noble Friend's speech: He has very clearly and ably traced the origin of the promise of Her Majesty's Government to assist County Councils at their first starting. I may say that the County of Kent, with which I am connected, is deeply interested in this question. Not only the Chambers of Agriculture, but our County Councils have passed resolutions in favour of this proposal. My noble Friend has quoted opinions expressed, and statements made, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, not only in propounding his Budget, but also in answer to various questions which were put to him; but I may say that I have a later quotation, which seems to me to be rather more encouraging than those made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reply to a question put to him in May last by Mr. Swetenham, Member for Carnarvon. His answer was this—

“Beside the Wheel Tax, the Bill in question proposes the introduction of a Horse Duty, and I may say the President of the Local Government Board contemplates the re-introduction of that proposal; but it is for the County Councils to realise that it is only a strong and general opinion on their part, that would justify us in taking up the question.”

Now that is exactly what the County Councils have done. They have passed resolutions asking Her Majesty's Government for assistance in reference to local affairs. The subject has been treated so exhaustively by my noble Friend that I would only say in addition, undoubtedly at starting these County Councils the local expenses are largely increased. In my own county there have been a great many contested elections, and they are paid for out of the county rates. Then there is no doubt that the keeping in order of the county roads will be an increased burden. I cannot say what it will be in our county as regards the exact financial results; but I know that instead of there being a saving there has been an increase; and I foresee, though I believe our County Council is doing the business exceedingly well, a still larger increase. I do not expect that an answer will be given to-day; but I hope that the speech of my noble Friend will draw the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the matter when he is in a week or two, if he is not even now, considering his Budget proposals. I earnestly hope that the forcible way in which he has brought the matter before the House will lead to its being considered in another place.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the noble Earl has, undoubtedly, drawn attention to this subject in an exhaustive manner. I only wish that my noble Friend could have done so in the presence of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as the subject is one to which my attention has only lately been directed. Of course, I am not so well acquainted with the matter as my noble Friend, who has looked thoroughly into it; but there is one thing which I am bound to notice and emphasise from the beginning, and that is that the system of direct grants from the Exchequer for local purposes has ceased. Direct grants were taken away and resources were to be found from local means, as well as from particular sources; those from personal property to a certain amount were alluded to in the Budget of my right hon. Friend. But with regard to what was undertaken, I am instructed wholly to deny that there was any financial engagement as to the special sum, or as to the special means to be taken, except that they were to come from local resources. Your Lordships are quite as well aware as I am of the history of the Wheel and Van Tax, and of the Horse Duty. As soon as the Wheel Tax was proposed exemptions were claimed from all parts of the country: it was asked whether a cart taking such and such things, or used for such and such purposes, would be exempt, and so it went on, so that with one thing and another the Van Tax would practically have been exhausted by the exemptions. With regard to the Horse Tax also, it was so far from being accepted by the agricultural body that it became almost impossible to proceed with it, and the two taxes proposed were attacked in such a manner that they had to be abandoned. With regard to the future, all I can say in respect of this matter is that though it may still be desirable that additional means should be found, they must not be looked for from direct Imperial taxation, but in some way or other from what I may call local resources. That is really all I can say at present upon this question. I am told that practically a similar question to this which my noble Friend has asked has been or is about to be asked in the House of Commons, where it will naturally receive a more exhaustive and fuller answer than I can possibly give. I can only say that I have given as satisfactory an answer as I am able upon the present occasion, and I must leave the matter for the reply of my right hon. Friend elsewhere.

*THE MARQUESS OF RIPON: My Lords, the noble Viscount can hardly expect that his reply will be very satisfactory to those who are interested in the question of the finances of the County Councils. I quite feel the difficulty in which my noble Friend the Viscount is placed, particularly at the present moment, and I trust that the answer he has given is not to be taken as a final answer and an end to all our hopes, because, as the House will see, the case is a very strong one indeed. When the Act of 1888 was passed one of its most important portions was the financial portion. No one is better acquainted than the present Chancellor of the Exchequer with all the questions which have been debated for so long with respect to local finances; and when he told us in 1888, as the noble Earl has pointed out, that he was making a proposal which he thought was a just one, offering a subvention to the County Councils, to which he admitted the ratepayers were entitled, in the form of an additional grant of £3,000,000, I think those who are interested in the County Councils were entitled to suppose that the Government would fulfil that expectation, and would give in aid of the local rates a sum of at least £3,000,000. Now, what happened, as your Lordships are aware, was that, in consequence of the failure of a particular proposal of taxation, that sum was reduced by some £800,000—that is to say, by more than one fourth. It appears now to be the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer towards the County Councils to say that it is for them to devise the taxes, by and out of which their funds are to be supplied; but I contend, with the noble Earl opposite, that that is in no respect a proper duty for County Councils; it is doubtless for them to say that they are entitled to grants if they feel they are entitled to them, but as long as those grants are to be made on the authority of Her Majesty's Government it is surely for Her Majesty's Government to say from what source those grants are to be derived; it is for them to make their proposals to Parliament, and for Parliament to determine upon them. If Parliament does not choose to have the Van and Wheel Tax and the Horse Duty, I contend it is the duty of Her Majesty's Government to fulfil the expectations they held out, and to provide by some other means this £800,000. I think, my Lords, the Earl of Harrowby did not quite state the case for the immediate consideration of this question as strongly as he might have done. It is not only on account of the special expenses which fall upon these Councils at their initiation and at the commencement of their work that this money is now particularly required; but it is also because the County Councils have had expenses thrown upon them by the action of the Government which they did not at all anticipate. Government grants in aid ceased at an earlier period than was expected by the County Councils. It was supposed that those grants would cease on the 31st March, 1889, that they would be paid up to that date, and that then the County Councils would enter upon the receipt of their funds, and would be able to carry on their work without further grants; whereas those grants have in most cases ceased several months before the 31st March. In the case of the West Riding of Yorkshire, of the County Council for which I have the honour to be chairman, the additional cost of maintaining the main roads for the financial year preceding that in which their financial operations began was no less than £40,000. That sum was not covered by the Government grant; and in the course of the current financial year we have had to pay that £40,000, in addition to the usual sum of £90,000, for the maintenance of our main roads. The same thing has occurred again in respect of other grants for medical officers and other officials. There is great doubt entertained in that case as to whether the course taken by Her Majesty's Government is legal. The question has been raised by the West Riding County Council, and an action is soon to be tried before the High Court. But I do contend that when, by the action of the Government, these extra charges over and above those which belong to the first twelve months of the existence of the County Councils have been thrown upon them, it is of special urgency that the question raised by the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) should be dealt with without delay, and that the deficit in the means which it was promised to the County Councils they should enjoy — should be made up without further delay. The responsibility for doing so appears to me to rest upon Her Majesty's Government. A Resolution on the subject was passed in the County Council with which I am connected with absolute unanimity, and I believe similar Resolutions have been passed in almost all the other County Councils of the country. I venture to assure Her Majesty's Government that if they do not do something to fulfil what I have no hesitation in saying are the just expectations of the County Council, they will find themselves troubled a good deal with many and loud outcries from the important Public Bodies which they themselves have created.

LORD BASING: My Lords, I cannot help expressing my satisfaction that your Lordships have devoted this portion of your time to the consideration of what is certainly a very important, and may become a very burning subject. There can be no question that the County Councils throughout England have been very much dissatisfied by the failure of Parliament to provide something to fill the gap occasioned by the dropping of the Wheel and Van Tax. It is easy to pick faults in any proposal which may be made, and I am far from saying that the Wheel and Van Tax, as originally proposed, would have been popular. In fact, no new tax is popular—it would be true to say that all new taxes are unpopular and perhaps difficult of collection. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer, having proposed this tax for the purpose of giving aid to the County Councils, or of enabling that aid to be granted, allowed so many and so considerable exemptions to be made in regard to the different classes of persons that the tax was frittered away, and people considered that it would have been no longer a fair or equal tax. That having been the result of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's proposal it would be rather hard on the County Councils to impose upon them, that which it was not their business to give, the expression of an opinion in favour of the re-introduction of that tax, or the responsibility of finding a substitute for it. The Government tied themselves to a plan; that plan failed, for what reason I do not care to inquire more closely; and I think they are bound to find some substitute for that which they proposed in order to provide the subvention which they admitted it was their duty to grant.

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I will not again travel over the ground which has been already so ably traversed by the speakers who have preceded me; but I wish to supplement the statements of my noble Friend who introduced this subject, and my noble Friend who followed him, by calling attention to the more than probability of the expenses of the main roads going on in an accelerated ratio. Parliament has decided that turnpike tolls should never be renewed, at least as far as the word "never" applies to anything in legislation—it has set its face decidedly against the renewal of turnpike tolls. Now, the consequence of the lapse of the old Turnpike Acts and the absence of any new legislation with regard to one subject which they dealt with very effectually, namely, the width of the wheels of vehicles carrying very heavy loads, has been a saving of shillings to those who provide timber trucks, and heavy waggons for carrying beer, flour, stones, and so on. There has been a small economy possible in the construction of those vehicles, but it has cost pounds to the ratepayers for the additional repairs to the roads which have been rendered necessary by the use of those vehicles. As one broad-wheeled waggon or timber-truck after another wears out, or becomes disused, my experience has been (and I speak as one who from the commencement of the Highway Act has occupied the chair of a Highway Board) that they will invariably be replaced by others having cheaper and narrower wheels, which do enormous damage to the roads in all directions. A very large proportion of those vehicles issue from the towns. Timber, of course, is generally not cut in the middle of a town, and at all events it has to be transported from the place where it grows on trucks or waggons. But heavy brewers' drays and millers' waggons are very likely to issue from the towns, and the increasing damage done to the roads of the country by the transport of enormous weights on very narrow wheels since the lapse of the Turnpike Acts, and in the absence of any corresponding provision of a like nature to ensure some protection to the roads, is becoming a more and more serious matter. I think that gives the County Councils who are now charged with the repair of the main roads an additional claim upon the Government for the fulfilment of, what I consider, something very like a promise on the part of the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and, at any rate, to some general legislation with regard to wheels which will renew some of the protection and safeguard to the roads of the country which existed under the old Turnpike Acts, but which subsists no longer in the absence, as far as I am aware, of any provisions in any legislation passed since the expiration of the Turnpike Acts.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, I think it is perfectly clear, from the words of the Lord President of the Council, that this is entirely a question for the House of Commons. My noble Friend behind me said, as I understood, that some of the functions of the County Councils could not be performed by the magistrates; but their small numbers in comparison with the number of magistrates would not be sufficient to carry out the business of the country. I assure your Lordships there is a great dissatisfaction at the way in which this Act is being carried out. There are enormous grants already given to the County Councils, and they should be content with those grants. In the last Money Bill that was before the House, I believe, in the Local Government Bill there is a clause providing that the County Councils cannot originate Bills for the ratepayers; they can only defend Bills. Almost every County Council has petitioned for new taxes to be granted to them; but they have already the Probate Duties and the Licensing Duties, and I am satisfied that the hasty legislation which was carried on in a most unusual manner through both Houses of Parliament is bearing no good fruit. My Lords, I am an old man, and I did not think I might live to see this day, but I have felt it my duty to remonstrate against the hasty passing of such a measure as you have passed. You must remember that every extra grant you propose has to pass through the House of Commons. Consequently you are initiating legislation, but you have done very little. Speaking of the County Councils, one of their own Body said rather irreverently perhaps, that it was a case of "much jaw and little wool." My Lords, I do not think it is possible these small Bodies, meeting a few times at a distance from their homes, can ever get through the business of the counties in the way that the magistrates of each county did. The system of election is entirely faulty; it is founded upon the course of the Municipal Elections in Ireland, by which there is cumulative voting for owners provided for. In fact, it is faulty in principle, and I am quite sure that until you have what was proposed in this House on the County Electorates Bill, that every householder shall have a vote, you will do no good. Instead of that, they are only £10 occupiers or owners. That, my Lords, was a very retrograde movement. In 1881, upon the Enfranchisement Bill, it was proposed to take a £10 rental. That system was opposed by many eminent authorities, who said that the principle of scot-and-lot voting was safer than the system of rental. In 1866 a Bill was thrown out because it was based on rental. Rating is the true principle, and you will find that the system is one that cannot work. You cannot expect 60 people to do the work of 200, and of several other Bodies besides. I felt fully justified in moving the rejection of the Local Government Bill on the First Reading, but my Bill was not allowed even to lie on the Table. That was the first instance I ever knew of such discourteous conduct towards any Member of this House, and nearly the oldest Member. I trust this question will receive attention, and if any attempt is made to repeal the Local Government Act of Scotland, which abolishes several most useful Bodies, I hope it will meet with more support than the Motion which I made the Session before last, when my Bill disclosing the irregularities in both Houses of Parliament was thrown out on a First Reading, and not allowed to be printed.

House adjourned at half-past Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday 25th February, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—THE CORK UNION.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the refusal of the Vice Guardians of the Cork Union to the request of Mr. William D'Esterre Parker, who has been an elected Guardian for the past 30 years, as expressed in the following letter:—

"Sir,—In consequence of the numerous complaints which have been made to me by the poor people in receipt of outdoor relief in the Monkstown Division whose weekly stipends have been reduced, I will thank the Vice Guardians to allow the relieving officer to let me see the application and outdoor relief book on Saturday for the purpose of ascertaining the correctness of their complaints, with the view of bringing the question under the consideration of the Vice Guardians, in the hope that, when the individual cases are fully inquired into by them, they will be good enough, at this particularly inclement season, to discontinue the reduced scale, and allow the poor what they were in the habit of getting, except in any cases where the circumstances had since altered. — Faithfully yours, W. D'Esterre Parker ;"

and why this request was refused this gentleman?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Vice Guardians of Cork Union did not see any reason to direct the relieving officer to produce his books for the examination proposed. To permit such a practice on the part of individuals would tend not only to an unnecessary waste of time of relieving officers, but also to an undue interference with the discharge of their duties; but the Vice Guardians informed Mr. Parker that they would carefully consider any case he might bring before them. It is the case that Mr. Parker has been a Guardian for many years.

*MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): May I ask whether, in the present extraordinary administration of the Poor Law in Cork, any facilities will be given to the ratepayers or their representatives to supervise or ascertain how outdoor relief is granted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not believe that anything contrary to law is going on in Cork.

*MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what is the amount of the expenditure per head in Cork Workhouse, including establishment charges?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS IN BRADFORD.

MR. BYRON REED (Bradford, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to a memorial from inhabitants of Bradford, praying for the re-opening of the postal receiving office in Market Street, Bradford, which was closed some months ago by official orders; whether he is aware that great local inconvenience has resulted from this closing of a post office in an important thoroughfare; and whether he will now be prepared to give instructions for the re-opening of the office?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the postal receiving office in Market Street, Bradford, was closed after the branch office in the next street, Tyrrel Street, had been opened for postal business, it being considered better to distribute the Post Office accommodation more equally by opening another receiving office in Thornton Road, a little further from the branch office than Market Street; especially as there are already two letter boxes in this street, one at each end of the Town Hall. This has accordingly been done; and, as I informed the hon. Member by letter on the 23rd ultimo, I should prefer to wait and see how far the result is satisfactory before making a further change. But I shall be anxious, above all things, to meet the convenience of the locality.

POLICE SUPERANNUATION.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been directed to the Report of the Select Committee to whom the City of London Police Bill, 1889, was referred, urging the desirability of dealing with the whole question of police superannuation throughout England, including the Metropolis; and if he now sees his way to introduce a Superannuation Bill for the Metropolitan Police, and one for the Constabulary Forces, upon the lines of the Acts obtained by Lincolnshire and the West Riding of Yorkshire, or otherwise to redeem the promises held out to the Constabulary by many of his predecessors for some 20 years, or otherwise to take action upon the recommendations of the Police Superannuation Committee which reported in 1877?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Yes, Sir; I have had my attention called to the Report and the Statutes referred to in the question. The subject of police superannuation is now under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government, and I hope before long to be able to inform my hon. Friend what course the Government will take with regard to it.

NATIONAL SCHOOLS AND POLITICAL SPEECHES.

MR. FRANCIS STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that on the 13th of February, at the National School at Aldeburgh, Suffolk, which is in receipt of a Government grant, the schoolmaster, who acts as secretary to the local branch of the Primrose League, distributed a number of copies of political speeches of a highly controversial character, printed under the auspices of the Woodbridge Division Conservative Association, among the boys of his own standard, and among the monitors of the other standards, for circulation, expressing at the same time the wish that the parents should read the publications in question; whether practices of that kind meet with the sanction of the Education Department; and whether any steps will be taken to prevent their recurrence?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): It would, of course, be very wrong for teachers to utilise their position in school for Party objects; but I am informed that the schoolmaster in question is not secretary of the local branch of the Primrose League, and that he handed the speeches to the boys after school hours upon his own responsibility.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether application was made two years ago by the labourers of Dinder, in Somerset, to have the poor's land of that parish let as allotments under "The Allotments Extension Act, 1882"; and whether the Trustees have taken any steps to carry out the above Act; and, if not, what action the Charity Commissioners propose to take to enforce the law?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Commissioners are without information as to the application mentioned in the first paragraph. They have repeatedly urged the Trustees to give the notices required by the Act, and, in the result, notice of letting a portion of the land amounting to 11 acres was given on December 25th last, directing applications to be sent in before February 15 instant. The Commissioners are informed by the Trustees that up to that date no applications have been received.

*SIR W. FOSTER: I should like to ask whether the land belonging to the Trustees offered for allotments is not at a considerable distance from the village?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I believe that 21 acres out of 24 are at a considerable distance from the village. The Commissioners have been pressing upon the Trustees, and will continue to press upon them, the desirability of effecting an exchange of the land.

DISTRIBUTION OF PAMPHLETS BY RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether complaints have reached him that John Henry Gregory, a rural postman, attached to the Deddington Post Office, in or since October last, at a time when he was delivering post letters, and was in uniform, distributed in North Aston prints of letters addressed to the Banbury Guardian, and signed "Lion," and "Justice," which had not come by post, nor bore any postal address, and which reflected on the conduct of Mr. William Churchill, of Deddington, and defended the conduct of Police-Constable England, with regard to a charge against Mr. Churchill, which was heard before the Deddington Bench on 27th September last; whether the distribution of such prints by a postman on duty is permitted by the Regulations of the Post Office; and whether such distribution was with the knowledge or approval of the Postmaster of Deddington?

*MR. RAIKES: Complaints to the effect mentioned by the hon. Member have reached the Post Office. The postman Gregory gives his assurance that he was not on duty when he distributed the prints or leaflets in question; but, be that as it may, their distribution by a postman at any time, or under any circumstances, constituted a clear breach of Regulations, and he has been seriously admonished and cautioned as to his future behaviour. The distribution of the leaflets was without the knowledge or approval of the Postmaster of Deddington.

THE BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is now in a position to give the House any information as to what course the Government is likely to adopt with regard to the proposed International Conference on the condition of Labour in Foreign Countries?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir JAMES FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have expressed their willingness to take part in a Conference proposed by the German Emperor to examine into grave questions with respect to the welfare of the working classes, the solution of which may be facilitated by international co-operation, in accordance with the principles of legislation accepted in this country.

THE PRIMROSE LEAGUE.

MR. BROADHURST: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the national schools at Baston, Lincolnshire, were closed on Friday afternoon the 14th inst. to allow of preparations being made for a Primrose League entertainment in the school-room that evening; and, if so, whether it is within the right of managers of national schools to close such institutions to facilitate the holding of political meetings?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: I know nothing of the circumstances to which the hon. Member refers. Every public elementary school must be open 400 times in the course of the year in order to obtain a grant; but if that requirement is observed, there is nothing, so far as I am aware, to limit the discretion of the managers in granting an occasional holiday.

IRELAND—RAILWAY AT ARDGLASS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government have received the Report of the inquiry, held on the 24th January, in Ardglass, by Mr. John G. Barton, C.E., into the desirability of constructing a Railway from Ardglass, via Killough, to Downpatrick, there to join the Belfast and County Down Railway; whether he is aware that last season herrings were often sold in the morning, when they could be carted to Downpatrick, as high as £1 per mease of 635, and in the evening of the same day as low as 2s. 6d. per mease, from want of facilities for their carriage, while they have even sometimes been left to rot on the shore, and that as much as £68,000 worth of herrings have been taken in a season at Ardglass by English, Scotch, Irish, and Manx boats; whether his attention has been called to the recommendation contained in the Report of the Royal Commission on Irish Railways, 1888, that and whether, considering the very great value of this short proposed Railway for the development of the fishing industry of Ireland, the Government will grant the assistance required for its construction?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think it would be premature for Her Majesty's Government to make any statement at present in regard to light railways.

THE LONDONDERRY POLICE.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY (Londonderry): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to a report in the Derry Journal of a case before the Derry Magistrates, on the 5th of last December, in which two boys were charged with throwing stones at the police, and in which one boy, named M'Daid, was sentenced to 14 days' imprisonment, and the other, named Clifford, to 14 days' imprisonment, and also to five years' confinement in a reformatory; whether the charge against Clifford was merely that he had aided and abetted M'Daid; whether the police constable who made the charges said that he saw Clifford among the other boys, but he did not see him throwing any stone; and whether, under the circumstances, he will take steps to have that part of the sentence on Clifford which relates to confinement in the reformatory remitted?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Having regard to the previous convictions of Clifford, one of which also involved detention in a reformatory in 1886, remitted subsequently on memorial, it would not appear to be for the young offender's benefit that he should now be discharged.

LE CARON.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department—

ment whether Mr. Anderson handed to Le Caron a considerable number of documents, in addition to those which were produced before the Special Commission; whether, with regard to his answer to a question on the 15th of March last, that he knew nothing of any documents other than those which were used by Le Caron in Court, he can state whether he now knows if Mr. Anderson kept any list of the documents handed by him to Le Caron; whether all the documents, whether used in Court or not, have been returned to Mr. Anderson; and whether the Home Office will allow Mr. Anderson to have the custody in the future of these and other confidential documents?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have given to the House from time to time all the information which I consider that I ought to give consistently with my public duty with regard to the documents in question. In obedience to what has been the tradition of this House with respect to the secret service, I must respectfully decline to answer the question of the hon. Member.

MR. COBB: May I ask whether the right hon. Gentleman has any more knowledge on this subject now than he had on the 15th of March last?

MR. MATTHEWS: I informed the House a short time ago—I forget the date—that all the documents had been returned. That is the only answer I can give to the hon. Gentleman.

THE ROYAL YACHTS.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will be good enough to inform the House of the result of the recent surveys held upon the Royal yachts Osborne and Alberta; whether it is correct that the hulls of both vessels are in a large measure unsound; and if he can state the amounts necessary to be expended upon the hulls, outfits, engines, and boilers of each vessel for the purpose of making them seaworthy?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Some of the timber and inner planking of the Alberta amidships above the turn of bilge are decayed. The stern and some of the timber and planking at the bow, and some of the timber and planking right aft, are also more or less decayed. These are the principal defects. The Osborne has not been found unsound. A little of the outside woodwork at the bow is rotten. It is proposed to expend £9,000 on the Alberta, including cost of annual outfit, and about £5,000 similarly upon the Osborne.

MR. GOURLEY: Does that include the cost of the machinery?

*LORD G. HAMILTON: Yes — the repairs.

NORTH AMERICAN FISHERIES.

MR. GOURLEY: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have recommended, or intend recommending, the Government of Canada to extend the modus vivendi of the Chamberlain Treaty of Washington relative to the North Atlantic Anglo-American fishery disputes; whether they will recommend that the modus vivendi arrangement shall continue, pending a final interpretation and adjustment of the Treaty of 1818; and, when he expects to be able to place upon the Table of the House all correspondence relative to this and the Behring Sea fisheries?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The modus vivendi in regard to the Canadian fisheries can only be renewed by an enactment of the Parliament of the Dominion, which is now sitting, and which it is understood will consider the question during the present Session. Negotiations are proceeding in regard to the Behring Sea fisheries. Under the circumstances, no pledge can be given as to the date of the presentation of Papers.

SCOTLAND—THE DEATH DUTIES.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the case that, in the case of transference of property from the dead to the living, personalty in Scotland pays a Probate Duty of 3 per cent on the capital sum bequeathed, whilst Feu Duties and Ground Annuals pay only a Succession Duty of 1½ per cent on the capital sum, and that based on a life interest of the party succeeding; whether Feu Duties and Ground Annuals pay any local taxes; and whether any good reason exists for this difference of Government duty on the two classes of property?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): Personalty in Scotland, as in the rest of the United Kingdom, pays 1½ per cent Probate Duty to Imperial Taxation, while Feu Duties and Ground Annuals also pay 1½ per cent irrespective of rates of consanguinity. There is no direct charge for local rates in respect of Feu Duties and Ground Annuals; the Feu Duties and Ground Annuals being included in the valuation of the property, upon which valuation local taxes are paid. I may remind the hon. Member that I explained the reasons for the difference of the duty on real and personal property in the Budget Debates of 1888 and 1889.

*MR. CALDWELL: Is it not the fact that personalty pays to the Exchequer 3 per cent, in whatever way the amount is ultimately divided, whilst realty pays only 1½ per cent?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Yes; but I do not think the hon. Member has studied the history of the question. Only 1½ per cent is paid to the Exchequer, and the other 1½ to local funds.

*MR. CALDWELL: But Feu Duties and Ground Annuals contribute nothing to local funds.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I must refer the hon. Member to other Members of the Government, who are far better versed in these matters than I am.

ALLEGED HARSH SENTENCE—CASE OF C. J. GAY.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State of the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on Friday, Mr. Cooke, Metropolitan Police Magistrate, sitting at Marylebone, sentenced Charles John Gay to one month's imprisonment with hard labour for stealing two oranges; whether Gay had 14 years' good character; whether it was his first offence; whether his employer declined to prosecute; and whether, in this case, any portion of the sentence can be remitted?

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I would also ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the fact that this was Gay's first offence, and that he had 14 years' good character, he will advise that the remainder of the sentence be remitted?

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has been called to this case. Gay had been five weeks in the service of the employers whose goods were under his charge. He had 14 years' good character from former employers. It was his first offence. He was prosecuted by a detective in the employment of the London and North-Western Railway Company. I am informed by the learned magistrate that he was satisfied that Gay had broken open two boxes, from one of which he took oranges and from the other sweets, and that for this reason the learned magistrate thought it necessary to pass a sentence of imprisonment. Having regard to all the circumstances I have determined to recommend the remission of half the sentence.

INDIAN SUBJECTS CLASSED AS "ALIENS" BY THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the case, as reported in August last, the Transvaal Government has classed Her Majesty's Indian subjects as "Aliens," and forbidden them to reside within the Transvaal; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to redress this grievance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): At the request of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India I will answer the question. It is the case that the Government of the South African Republic decided that traders from British India should be subject to the laws and regulations of the Republic affecting Chinese, Arabs, and other Oriental aliens. These Indians have not been forbidden to reside within the South African Republic; but are at present subject to serious restrictions under a law which was passed in 1886, for the removal or mitigation of which Her Majesty's High Commissioner is now in communication with the Government of the Republic.

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bill to improve the working of the Trustee Savings Banks will be introduced?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The introduction of this Bill, which I hope to introduce at an early date, has been deferred, pending the settlement of an important action which may tend to define the liabilities of Trustees.

ADMIRALTY CONTRACTS—THE ASBESTOS COMPANY.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the recent case of Bell's Asbestos Company v. Davis and Selfe, and to the report which appeared in the Financial News of the 21st instant of the meeting of the Company; and whether, considering that the practice of bribing subordinates in the employment of users of asbestos was defended by the Chairman of the Company, and that an amendment directed against the practice was defeated by a large majority of the shareholders present, the Admiralty will give directions that no person connected with this firm shall be admitted into Her Majesty's Dockyards, and that no more orders shall be given to the Company?

LORD G. HAMILTON: My attention has been directed to the report of the meeting of this company, and to the defence by the chairman of the company of the practice of obtaining the goodwill of the employés of users of asbestos by the payment of moneys, the vouchers for which were excluded from the auditors' scrutiny. A practice so reprehensible and demoralising requires prompt repudiation on the part of those dealing with the company. The Admiralty contracts with this company terminate on the 30th of June. I have directed a letter to be written to the company informing them that after that date they will not be on the list of Admiralty contractors.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS—TWY. FORD.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, on the 5th January, 1889, the Buckingham Rural Sanitary Authority passed a Resolution to put into force the compulsory clauses of "The Allotments

Act, 1887," in order to provide allotments for labourers of the Parish of Twyford; that, on the 31st of August last, this Resolution was rescinded; and that the labourers of the Parish of Twyford were by published placard, on the 10th of October last, the day before the polling day in North Bucks, answered that the required land was granted for the purpose; and whether the Twyford labourers have now got the allotments demanded under the Act of 1887; and, if not, whether there is any reasonable prospect of their obtaining them under that Act?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): From the correspondence which has passed between the Rural Sanitary Authority of the Buckingham Union and the Board it appears that on the 5th of January, 1889, the Authority passed a Resolution to the effect that the compulsory clauses of the Allotments Act, 1887, should be put in force in order to provide allotments for labourers in the Parish of Twyford, and that on the 31st of August last, this Resolution was rescinded. I have no information as to the placard which is stated to have been published on the 10th of October last. The Board have been informed that the Sanitary Authority have been in communication with the rector of Lincoln College with a view to acquiring suitable land for the purpose of allotments. The sum asked for the land (£850, free from any tenants' compensation) is said, and certainly appears to be, a prohibitive price, and on the 21st of this month the Authority informed the Board that there is no other suitable land in the parish that would be convenient for the purpose of allotments. The Board regret this result, and that no allotments have as yet been provided. The Bill, however, which has been introduced providing for an appeal to the County Council will, if passed by the House, afford those interested an opportunity of obtaining further consideration of the matter.

TRIVIAL OFFENCES—CASE OF THOS. BARNES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it has come to his notice that Thomas Barnes was committed by the magistrates of Cirencester, for stealing an almond cake on the 1st January, to take his trial at the Quarter Sessions which will be held some time in April, whilst the Gaol Delivery and Assizes will be held by Mr. Justice Hawkins on Monday next; and whether, as the youth in question has been already in prison for nearly two months for what is a trivial offence, if committed, and as he cannot be indicted at the Assizes, he will consider if he might now be released, and a nolle prosequi be entered?

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has not been called to the case of Thomas Barnes except by the hon. Member's question. The Assizes Relief Act, 1889, enables Justices to commit to Quarter Sessions, even though Assizes intervene, prisoners whose offences are fit for trial at Quarter Sessions, but the Justices still retain discretionary power to commit prisoners for special reasons for trial at the Assizes, and it has been generally understood that Justices may regard as a special reason the fact that committal to Quarter Sessions would involve long detention in prison. I cannot adopt the course suggested by the hon. Member, but I will communicate with the committing Justices, with a view to the prisoner being let out on bail, should the circumstances prove to be as stated.

THE WHEEL AND VAN TAX.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the County Councils have replied to his circular inquiring their views as to the Wheel and Van Tax; whether the large majority of the Councils that have replied have declared in favour of the tax; and whether he has discovered a substitute for the tax; and, if not, will he re-introduce the measure?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member's question has revived the memory of a most equitable and much reviled tax. I have issued no circular to the County Councils. I have received a large number of memorials certainly expressing strong views in favour of the tax, but those memorials generally deal only with the Van and Wheel Tax, and do not deal with the larger question, namely, as to the licensing in regard to pleasure horses. On that point I have received no memorials. The hon. Gentleman asks whether I have discovered a substitute for the tax, and, if not, whether I will re-introduce the measure. I would remind him that the relations between the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the ratepayers have now been closed, that it is for my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board to discover local taxes, and that he will be the hero or the victim of the next tax which is proposed.

PERJURY IN ENGLISH COUNTY COURTS.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his honour Judge Chalmers, in his reply affirming the prevalence of perjury in English County Courts, suggested any remedies; and, if so, will he state to the House the purport of such suggestion?

MR. MATTHEWS: Judge Chalmers expressed his opinion that it was difficult to know what remedy to suggest. He did, however, suggest that some good might be done if a small and summary punishment were provided for County Court perjury.

SUPPLY OF COAL TO BARRACKS.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the War Office if he is aware that a clause proposed to be added to the conditions of contract for the supply of coals to various barracks does not give any relief to the contractor in the event of a strike entirely beyond his control; and has the omission of such a strike clause received his sanction?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): By a circular issued on the 19th inst. a clause was added to all coal contracts to the effect that if the contractor were precluded from completing his contract by combination of workmen or strikes, the circumstances of each case would be specially considered by the Secretary of State for War.

IMPORTATION OF FROZEN MEAT.

MR. BROOKFIELD (Sussex, Rye): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is the case that "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," does not in any way affect the importation into this country of frozen meat, which may afterwards be passed off as being of home production; and whether Her Majesty's Government is disposed to consent to an inquiry into the question of how far the main principle and operation of "The Merchandise Marks Act, 1887," may be usefully amplified or extended?

Mr. Goschen

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): As I stated on a former occasion, I am not in a position to give an authoritative opinion upon the construction of an Act of Parliament, but it appears to me that if a butcher knowingly sold imported frozen meat as English meat he might make himself liable to a prosecution under the Merchandise Marks Act, and probably would under Section 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1875. I am not prepared to acquiesce in an inquiry of wider scope than is contemplated by the Motion in reference to the Merchandise Marks Act, of which notice has been given by the hon. Member for Central Sheffield.

TREASURY CLERKS.

MR. JOHN KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, with a view to obviating the anomalies likely to be created by the conversion, after the method indicated in the Treasury Minute of February 4th, 1890, of the triennial increments of the clerks of the lower division into annual increments, he would be prepared to adopt one by which such clerk would, on April 1st, 1890, be credited with so much (omitting any fraction of a pound sterling) as might then have accrued due to him, and be allowed on such date to draw his first annual increment of £7 10s., or £10, as the case might be?

MR. GOSCHEN: It is almost impossible to avoid some anomalies in applying new rules to existing establishments. We have admitted the existing lower division clerks without any conditions to the benefits of the new scale. Under the Minute every lower division clerk in the year ending 31st March next will have had his triennial increment converted into an annual increment, with immediate benefit, and I do not think that any further change of the announced arrangements is necessary.

WRITERS' SATURDAY HALF-HOLIDAY.

MR. TUTE (Westmeath, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury whether, in reference to the favourable reply given by him on the 26th of last August, with regard to the Writers' Saturday half-holiday, it was his intention that such alternate Saturday half-holiday should commence from the date of his reply?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No, Sir; the alternate Saturday half-holiday to copyists was not intended to be given until provision should have been made by order in Council for the grant of the same privilege to clerks of the second division.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. JOHN M'ENERY.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the sentence of one month's imprisonment passed yesterday on Mr. John M'Enery, editor of the Limerick Leader, by Messrs. Hoddes and Robertson, in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour for 12 months, for publishing without comment proceedings of a meeting of a branch of the Local National League on the 3rd of February; whether the magistrates are correctly reported to have refused to state a case for superior Courts on this conviction; and if, having regard to sentences in similar cases being under review by superior Courts, he will take steps not to permit said sentence to take effect?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): The magistrates did refuse to state a case for a superior Court of Law in the matter referred to in the Question. They so refused on the ground that the question of law submitted to them had been already decided by the Exchequer Division in the case of another prosecution. I have no power to take the steps suggested in the third paragraph of the Question, but I may point out that, whenever magistrates act erroneously in refusing to state a case, their error can be corrected on an application to the Court of Queen's Bench, under the provisions of 20 and 21 Vic., c. 43.

*MR. FLYNN: Has this prosecution been brought under the Criminal Law Procedure Act, or under the Statute of Edward III.?

*MR. MADDEN: The sentence appears to have been given under the Statute of Edward III. I believe the charge was under the Criminal Law Procedure Act.

MR. O'KEEFFE: The charge was that the defendant had published without comment the report of a meeting of a branch of a Local National League. Does not the decision of the magistrates amount to a breach of the decision of the County Court Judge at Waterford?

*MR. MADDEN: The question of the correctness of the decision of the County Court Judge at Waterford is now sub judice, and pending the ultimate decision of the superior Court I can give no opinion on the subject.

In reply to Mr. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.),

*MR. MADDEN said: The Court of Queen's Bench has jurisdiction in the matter, and beyond that I can say nothing.

MR. CLANCY: Upon a former occasion when the Court of Queen's Bench was appealed to, the appeal was not opposed. Will the Government agree not to oppose an appeal in this case?

[No answer was given.]

THE CORK TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. LANE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the recent appointments to vacancies in the Cork telegraph offices have been made in accordance with Rule No 6, which vests the nomination in the Local Postmaster; and, if not, why were the nominations taken out of the hands of the Cork Postmaster; and will the course prescribed by the above rule be adhered to in connection with the two appointments now vacant in the Cork office?

*MR. RAIKES: It is the practice to let the local Postmaster nominate to junior appointments in his own office, but such practice is, of course, subject to the pleasure of the Postmaster General, who himself nominates when he thinks such a course conducive to the public interest. The five male telegraphists who during the last four years have been transferred to Cork from other offices have been so transferred for the following reasons:—One for the sake of economy, in order that the situation he relinquished at Youghal might be abolished; two for purposes of discipline, that they might be under more efficient control; one on medical grounds, having suffered from illness at Limerick, where he was previously employed, and the fifth was transferred in order that he might be with his parents, who reside at Cork. Whether to the two appointments now vacant at Cork it will be left to the Postmaster to nominate or not I have not yet decided.

EGYPTIAN ANTIQUITIES.

MR. HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is true, as reported in the Academy of the 8th of February, in a letter signed by Lieutenant-Colonel Rose, Inspector-General of Irrigation in Egypt, that some person unknown has this winter been systematically mutilating the tombs of Beni Hassan, in Egypt; that 25 Royal names have been erased, and the heads of the principal figures abstracted; and, if these facts prove to be true, whether Her Majesty's Government will make representations to the Government of His Highness the Khedive, so that immediate steps may be taken to ensure the safety of antiquities whose interest and scientific value is unique?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: No such information has been received by Her Majesty's Government, but inquiry will be made of Sir E. Baring.

ONE POUND NOTES.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government intend to bring in a Bill this Session giving the Bank of England or other banks the privilege of issuing £1 bank notes; and whether he can state the conditions on which they will be issued?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not heard of any Government Bill dealing with the subject-matter of this question being on the stocks. But the hon. Member must be aware that in no case are either Ministers or private Members in the habit of sketching out to the House the features of any Bills which they may contemplate.

THE EIGHT HOURS QUESTION.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he contemplates giving further facilities for the discussion of the Eight Hours Question; and, if so, when?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I freely recognise the importance of the subject, and I am anxious that it should be fully discussed; but I observe that the hon. Member has a Motion relating to this subject down on the Paper for March 18th, and that a Bill is also down for March 26th. Under those circumstances I am unable to give any pledge on a subject so far in advance.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: Can the right hon. Gentleman hold out any hope of a day being given for the discussion of the Eight Hours Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is obviously impossible at this moment to give any undertaking of the kind.

THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. EDWARD HARDCASTLE (Salford, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Suzerainty of the Transvaal was retained by the British Crown when the troops were withdrawn from that country; what is the nature and value of that Suzerainty; and whether under it British subjects, who are said already to outnumber the Boers, are entitled to the franchise?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Convention of London, made in 1884 between Her Majesty and the South African Republic, contains no express reservation of the Queen's right of Suzerainty, and, although Her Majesty retains under the Convention the power of refusing to sanction treaties made by the South African Republic with Foreign States and nations and with certain native tribes, it is a cardinal principle of that settlement that the internal government and legislation of the South African Republic shall not be interfered with. No persons, whether British subjects or otherwise, can at present obtain the franchise within the South African Republic unless they make a declaration of allegiance to it, which involves, to a considerable extent, the renunciation within the Republic of their national rights and obligations as subjects of the Queen.

THE SUPERANNUATION BILL.

*MR. DIXON - HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what are the intentions of the Government regarding the Superannuation Bill which was withdrawn last Session; and whether it is proposed to re-introduce it during the present Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes: it is the intention of the Government to introduce a Superannuation Bill, as the recommendations of the Royal Commission make it our duty to proceed with the subject, difficult and complicated as it is.

IRELAND—BOYCOTTING RETURNS.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland whether he is now able to place on the Table particulars with reference to the boycotting cases mentioned in his speech of last Tuesday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understood that all that was desired was some means of identifying the cases. The Government have always resisted returns giving the names of cases of boycotting, for the obvious reason that it might endanger life. But as the cases to which I referred have already been made public, either in newspaper controversy or before Courts of Law, I have no objection to giving the names, with the dates and places. I presume that that will be adequate.

MR. J. MORLEY: And the circumstances?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think that such a return as I have mentioned is already rather unusual, and I do not think I can undertake to add a narrative of the circumstances, which, however, are already well known.

MR. J. MORLEY: The right hon. Gentleman has made use of the circumstances as arguments, and I wish to test those arguments, which I cannot do unless the circumstances are placed before me.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will undertake to give a sufficient statement of the circumstances to enable the right hon. Gentleman to identify the cases.

MR. CLANCY: With reference to the reason given by the Chief Secretary for Ireland for not giving the names, may I ask how can there possibly be boycotting without its being known?

[No answer was given.]

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That the Report of the Select Committee on Estimates Procedure (Grants of Supply), of Session 1888, be referred to the Committee of Public Accounts.--(Mr. Jackson.)

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY.

(4.10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Committee of Supply have precedence this day of Notices of Motion; that so much of Standing Order 11 as requires that the Question shall be proposed, 'That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair' be suspended next Friday; and that the provisions of Standing Order 56 be extended to this day and Friday next."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

(4.12.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the early zeal he has shown in taking private Members' days, and still more on the astuteness with which he has arranged business in this House in order to suit the exigencies of his position. For my own part I fully admit that the difficulties of the right hon. Gentleman's position are, to some extent, his excuse for the action he has taken. The right hon. Gentleman is at the head of a majority of this House, but of an exceedingly composite majority, with no constructive cohesion, the only desire being to keep out the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone), and to prevent Home Rule from taking place in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite, I see, agree with me in that. Perhaps they will go further, and agree with me that it is wise for the First Lord of the Treasury to limit the action of the House to discussing Government Bills, the details of which have been carefully arranged between the different sections that support the right hon. Gentleman. I can see why the right hon. Gentleman objects to Private Members' days; there are so many rocks ahead for the vessel which the right hon. Gentleman navigates. The hon. Member for the Blackfriars Division of Glasgow (Mr. Provand) has a Motion on the Paper with reference to the obnoxious taxes on tea, coffee, and currants, which would have put the Liberal Unionists in a difficulty as to how they were to vote, and they naturally looked to the right hon. Gentleman as the pilot to get them clear of that difficulty. It cannot be said that the debate on the Address has been long. It has only occupied seven days, for I exclude the two Wednesdays, the first of which was occupied by the Gentlemen in uniform who usually perform on such occasions, and the second only began at two o'clock, owing to right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite desiring to spend their morning in prayer. It is said that the Motions brought forward on the Address justify the Government in proposing to take away private Members' days. That is mistaking the cause for the effect; it is because hon. Members have had experience and know that their days will be taken away, that those Motions are brought forward on the Address. No sooner did the right hon. Gentleman hear that the House was willing to close the debate on the Address on Monday than he put down a wishy-washy Motion on the Report of the Special Commission for the following Monday. Next day the right hon. Gentleman said he must have a little money, and a day afterwards he said he must have Tuesday to get his money, and so the trick was done. Why the right hon. Gentleman should have added Friday it is impossible to say. Friday has always been sacred to private Members, even at the end of the Session, by means of morning sittings. I am sorry to say it appears to me that, to the right hon. Gentleman, there is nothing sacred. I know what the reply will be. The right hon. Gentleman will get up and say that he owes a duty to his God, his Queen and his country, and that notice has been given in the Queen's Speech of very valuable Bills with which it is desirable to proceed. But what are those Bills? There are only two of any importance—one to get hold of a certain amount of money for the Irish landlords, and the other to facilitate the clergy in their marauding efforts to get hold of the tithes. After what happened last year about the Tithes Bill the right hon. Gentleman has no right to expect aid from the Opposition in passing that sort of predatory Bill, or in enabling the Liberal Unionists to avoid the embarrassment of voting against Liberal Motions. I hope I shall get the support of hon. Members below the Gangway opposite in the Division which I intend to take on the Motion.

(421) Mr. PICTON (Leicester): If the right hon. Gentleman is to conduct the business of the House in this manner I imagine that private Members will cease to be of any use, and all he will have to do will be to introduce a system of proxies, such as formerly prevailed in another place, but has now been abandoned, and allow us to go about our business. The right hon. Gentleman, when my hon. Friend below me (Mr. Labouchere) alluded to the brevity of the debate on the Address, smilingly shook his head with as near an approach to satire as was possible. Let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that of late years the debates on the Address have been necessarily very long. In 1887 the debate lasted 16 days—17 if the day occupied in considering the Report is included—and in 1888 11 days, and last year about the same time I can find no precedent for a Minister, immediately after the Address has been voted, proposing to take away private Members' days. The fact is that the old practice of the House of Commons is being destroyed, and it is becoming an assembly of mere ciphers waiting on the dictation of the head of the Government. No serious debate takes place in this House, and the discussion of public affairs is transferred to the newspapers and the constituencies.

(430) Mr. J. LOWTHER (Isle of Thanet). There are many hon. Members on this side of the House who would like to hear some good reason from the Government for the course they now propose to take, and who are inclined to protest against the principle of taking away the time belonging to private Members for the purpose of voting Supply. I would also say that it has been the practice of the House in times past willingly to afford facilities to Her Majesty's Government when the necessities of Supply were pressing, or when any real emergency arose. Is there emergency now? No doubt the debate on the Address has not been unduly curtailed, to say the least of it, and we must also bear in mind that the Government have placed a considerable portion of their time next week at the disposal of the House. I recognise the situation, but I wish to elicit from the First Lord of the Treasury that this practice of taking the days of private Members is not going to be made a precedent. I also want to have an assurance that the application made by the Government to the House is founded upon bond fide public requirements, and that the time to be taken from private Members is to be devoted to the specific object of considering urgent Votes in Supply.

*(4.33.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): I trust that hon. Members will feel it their duty to accept the Motion I have already submitted to the House. The only precedent which I could ask the House to lay down is a precedent declaring that the necessities of the public service must be provided for. It has been the practice in the last two or three years to discuss Supply at great length. In those years every Government day might have been devoted to the consideration of Supply, to the exclusion of other business. The hon. Member for Leicester says that the old practice of the House of Commons is being destroyed. I agree with the hon. Member. Hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House are destroying that practice, which was to vote the Address in one night, or in two nights at the most. This year the debate on the Address has occupied a fortnight, and we have arrived at the 25th of February, a date when it is usual for the Government to proceed with Supply. We can not expect the debate on the Report of the Special Commission to occupy less than the whole Government time next week, and in these circumstances it becomes imperative to devote this evening and Friday next to Supply. Friday, however, might be preserved to private Members if the House will grant previously all the Supply for which it is necessary to ask. The hon. Member for Northampton has given me credit for great astuteness. I do not claim to be astute; all I claim is this, that I pay regard to the business of the House and seek to render its transaction possible. If the consideration of that business excludes the consideration of Motions and Bills in which hon. Members are interested, I regret the fact, but I contend that the Government are not responsible. We are anxious that private Members should enjoy the opportunities which the rules of the House intended them to have, and if hon. Members would only revert to the ancient practices and customs which enabled them to enjoy those opportunities nobody would be more delighted than myself and my Colleagues. I am most anxious to revert to the Parliamentary practices which prevailed before the introduction of that extreme heat which now is manifested in political affairs. If we can but resume those practices the political interests of the country will be greatly advanced and also the interests of the different political parties in this House. I may point out, before sitting down, that the first notice of Motion on the Paper relates to a subject which can be discussed exhaustively on the Budget.

(4.38.) SIR W. HARCOURT, (Derby): I was very glad to hear the right hon. Member for the Isle of Thanet maintain a doctrine which I have held ever since I have sat in this House. The right hon. Gentleman has not taken the best means to avoid heat in this discussion by casting an explosive bomb across the House and accusing the Opposition of being the cause of all the evils of which he complains. It is quite true that the practice of the House has very much changed, and that protracted debates on the Address are of comparatively recent date. The practice, as far as I know, began in the years between 1880 and 1885. There was a debate in one of those years which lasted 11 days, and the questions discussed, such as the affairs of Egypt, were raised by Gentlemen who then sat on the front Opposition Bench. I do not, however, want to indulge in recriminations. In this matter the right hon. Gentleman must take the responsibility of having introduced this topic to-night, but, comparatively speaking, in former years such occasions were very rare, although it has now become

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has been called to this case. Gay had been five weeks in the service of the employers whose goods were under his charge. He had 14 years' good character from former employers. It was his first offence. He was prosecuted by a detective in the employment of the London and North-Western Railway Company. I am informed by the learned magistrate that he was satisfied that Gay had broken open two boxes, from one of which he took oranges and from the other sweets, and that for this reason the learned magistrate thought it necessary to pass a sentence of imprisonment. Having regard to all the circumstances I have determined to recommend the remission of half the sentence.

"ALIENS" BY THE TRANSVAAL GOVERNMENT.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether it is the case, as reported in August last, the Transvaal Government has classed Her Majesty's Indian subjects as "Aliens," and forbidden them to reside within the Transvaal; and, if so, what steps Her Majesty's Government have taken to redress this grievance?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): At the request of my right hon. Friend the Under Secretary for India I will answer the question. It is the case that the Government of the South African Republic decided that traders from British India should be subject to the laws and regulations of the Republic affecting Chinese, Arabs, and other Oriental aliens. These Indians have not been forbidden to reside within the South African Republic; but are at present subject to serious restrictions under a law which was passed in 1886, for the removal or mitigation of which Her Majesty's High Commissioner is now in communication with the Government of the Republic.

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the Bill to improve the working of the Trustee Savings Banks will be introduced?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The introduction of this Bill, which I hope to introduce at an early date, has been deferred, pending the settlement of an important action which may tend to define the liabilities of Trustees.

ADMIRALTY CONTRACTS—THE ASBESTOS COMPANY.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to the recent case of Bell's Asbestos Company v. Davis and Selfe, and to the report which appeared in the Financial News of the 21st instant of the meeting of the Company; and whether, considering that the practice of bribing subordinates in the employment of users of asbestos was defended by the Chairman of the Company, and that an amendment directed against the practice was defeated by a large majority of the shareholders present, the Admiralty will give directions that no person connected with this firm shall be admitted into Her Majesty's Dockyards, and that no more orders shall be given to the Company?

LORD G. HAMILTON: My attention has been directed to the report of the meeting of this company, and to the defence by the chairman of the company of the practice of obtaining the goodwill of the employés of users of asbestos by the payment of moneys, the vouchers for which were excluded from the auditors' scrutiny. A practice so reprehensible and demoralising requires prompt repudiation on the part of those dealing with the company. The Admiralty contracts with this company terminate on the 30th of June. I have directed a letter to be written to the company informing them that after that date they will not be on the list of Admiralty contractors.

LABOURERS' ALLOTMENTS—TWY.
FORD.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether he is aware that, on the 5th January, 1889, the Buckingham Rural Sanitary Authority passed a Resolution to put into force the compulsory clauses of "The Allotments

Act, 1887," in order to provide allotments for labourers of the Parish of Twyford; that, on the 31st of August last, this Resolution was rescinded; and that the labourers of the Parish of Twyford were by published placard, on the 10th of October last, the day before the polling day in North Bucks, answered that the required land was granted for the purpose; and whether the Twyford labourers have now got the allotments demanded under the Act of 1887; and, if not, whether there is any reasonable prospect of their obtaining them under that Act?

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): From the correspondence which has passed between the Rural Sanitary Authority of the Buckingham Union and the Board it appears that on the 5th of January, 1889, the Authority passed a Resolution to the effect that the compulsory clauses of the Allotments Act, 1887, should be put in force in order to provide allotments for labourers in the Parish of Twyford, and that on the 31st of August last, this Resolution was rescinded. I have no information as to the placard which is stated to have been published on the 10th of October last. The Board have been informed that the Sanitary Authority have been in communication with the rector of Lincoln College with a view to acquiring suitable land for the purpose of allotments. The sum asked for the land (£850, free from any tenants' compensation) is said, and certainly appears to be, a prohibitive price, and on the 21st of this month the Authority informed the Board that there is no other suitable land in the parish that would be convenient for the purpose of allotments. The Board regret this result, and that no allotments have as yet been provided. The Bill, however, which has been introduced providing for an appeal to the County Council will, if passed by the House, afford those interested an opportunity of obtaining further consideration of the matter.

TRIVIAL OFFENCES—CASE OF THOS. BARNES.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it has come to his notice that Thomas Barnes was committed by the magistrates of Cirencester, for stealing an almond cake on the 1st January, to take his trial at the Quarter Sessions which will be held some time in April, whilst the Gaol Delivery and Assizes will be held by Mr. Justice Hawkins on Monday next; and whether, as the youth in question has been already in prison for nearly two months for what is a trivial offence, if committed, and as he cannot be indicted at the Assizes, he will consider if he might now be released, and a nolle prosequi be entered?

MR. MATTHEWS: My attention has not been called to the case of Thomas Barnes except by the hon. Member's question. The Assizes Relief Act, 1889, enables Justices to commit to Quarter Sessions, even though Assizes intervene, prisoners whose offences are fit for trial at Quarter Sessions, but the Justices still retain discretionary power to commit prisoners for special reasons for trial at the Assizes, and it has been generally understood that Justices may regard as a special reason the fact that committal to Quarter Sessions would involve long detention in prison. I cannot adopt the course suggested by the hon. Member, but I will communicate with the committing Justices, with a view to the prisoner being let out on bail, should the circumstances prove to be as stated.

THE WHEEL AND VAN TAX.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the County Councils have replied to his circular inquiring their views as to the Wheel and Van Tax; whether the large majority of the Councils that have replied have declared in favour of the tax; and whether he has discovered a substitute for the tax; and, if not, will he re-introduce the measure?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Member's question has revived the memory of a most equitable and much reviled tax. I have issued no circular to the County Councils. I have received a large number of memorials certainly expressing strong views in favour of the tax, but those memorials generally deal only with the Van and Wheel Tax, and do not deal with the larger question, namely, as to the licensing in regard to pleasure how that singular piece of furniture came to the position it occupies. With regard to another matter, after the discussions which took place last year in both Houses of Parliament as to the alterations in Westminster Hall, I wrote a letter to my right hon. Friend asking him whether he would not at the eleventh hour remove the bastion or parapet which so much disfigures the southern end of Westminster Hall. My right hon. Friend was at that time absent from England and was not able to comply, and the answer I got was not of a very definite character. But I really must appeal to the right hon. Gentleman once more to take this matter into his consideration, and see whether he cannot remove this imitation of Spurgeon's pulpit and the other staircase, or, at all events, take some steps to render the southern end of the Hall symmetrical. When I was a boy at school at Westminster the place this bastion now occupies was an open doorway from which we used to pass out from Westminster Hall into Palace Yard, and there is no authority whatever for the door being placed half way up the wall. I am informed that the door is never used, that it neither opens nor shuts, and that nobody ever goes through it. If that be the case, why does not the right hon. Gentleman really take the matter into his own hands, and have this hideous, unsuitable bastion removed, and an iron gate put in its place as companion to that at the entrance which leads to the House of Commons, so that if any one did wish to go up there they could go in by the gate? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not be led in a wrong direction by these so-called architects, but will endeavour to do something to restore one of the most beautiful fabrics in the world to its original condition.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That item B £2,000, for the restoration of Westminster Hall, be omitted from the proposed Vote. (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck).

(5.17.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I rise to support the Motion of my right hon. Friend opposite. I do so because I feel sure that the opportunity should be availed of by everybody in this House who has any respect for the ordinary canons of good taste and utility of protesting against the way in which this restoration of Westminster Hall has been carried out. The interior of the Hall itself has been disfigured by the erection of that monstrous rostrum which is guarded by those still more monstrous heraldic beasts. That disfigurement has been alluded to on former occasions, and I will not allude to it now further than to say that I consider it a very great disfigurement, and that I have not seen anybody, whose taste is worthy of being called taste, who does not think the same. But there is another thing I wish to refer to, and that is the extraordinary pit which has been provided outside the House at the end of Westminster Hall for the reception of Members' carriages. This pit reminds one of what one has been accustomed to see in children's picture books, illustrative of the receptacle for lions in which Daniel was cast. It is a kind of descensus Avernî, a decline down which no carriage could be driven with anything like safety, and inside the shed I would defy any one to turn a carriage round. The shed may be useful for any hon. Members who come to the House on bicycles or tricycles, or in wheelbarrows, but to say that it is of any use for receiving Members' carriages is a false representation of the case. In order to get a carriage in it would be necessary to back it down the declivity. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take steps to have the pillars inside the cloister removed, if the place is to remain a receptacle for carriages, and that he will have something like an accessible means of entrance provided. The old wooden shed was not beautiful but it was useful, whereas the present shed is neither beautiful nor useful.

*(5.20) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I wish to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether this money has not been practically spent, and if so, whether there is any good in our discussing the question how the work has been carried out? I would also ask whether or not these works are put out to public tender?

(5.21.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I suppose we shall have to pay this money, but, at all events, I am glad it is not going to be done without a protest. I am not without hope that the discussion which took place last year has had some little effect on the Chief Commissioner, and that public opinion has induced him to draw back a little from what he at first intended. I am glad to find that no more beasts have been put into Westminster Hall, and that £1,000 has been saved on those in the Hall, which sum it is proposed to spend outside. These beasts have been called "monstrous," but a friend of mine says he would not call them "monstrous," as they will be useful designs for illustrations for "Alice in Wonderland," and books of that kind. As to the whole of the restoration of Westminster Hall, the more we see of it the less we like it. The rooms that have been provided are miserable rooms. In the course of my peregrinations through the new building, the other day, I found the place deserted, except by "the Last Man." The only decent room there is is the one called the Grand Committee room, and as it is over the receptacle for horses, I should think the people using it will have to complain of a very unpleasant smell. Architecturally, the projecting room is the most miserable excrescence, and disfigures these great buildings as much as it is possible to disfigure them beyond the natural state of dirt and dilapidation into which they have lapsed. I have perfect confidence that some day or other, when our eyes are open, and we are in our right minds, we shall discover that a very shocking mistake was committed when the Law Courts were removed from Westminster in not reserving the space so secured for the Parliamentary buildings which will be required when we come to that system of devolution—by means of Grand Committees and otherwise—to which we may ultimately attain. I am confident that if we spend a few thousand pounds in railing in that space, the time will come when we shall be ready to pull down the jimcracks we have just erected, for the purpose of putting up useful buildings in their place. Westminster Hall could never be made a beautiful building externally. I am convinced that in Scotland there are 50 United Presbyterian Churches which are more creditable from an architectural point of view.

versity): I am grateful to the hon. Member for the qualified support I have on this occasion received from him. He has drawn from one of his peregrinations through the new buildings rather a sad picture of the condition of the rooms on the other side of Westminster Hall. He says he found them deserted. I can imagine the scene almost as it might have been described in Campbell's "Last Man." It must, indeed, have been a spectacle of desolation when the hon. Member stood there after the last clerk had departed, "as if the skeletons of nations were around that lonely man." The effect on his spirits was depressing, I am sure. But if the hon. Gentleman had visited the buildings at the time of day when the clerks by whom they are used are there at work, he would, I think, agree with me not only that the rooms are comfortable, but that their occupants think them pleasant rooms to look at and to live in. The large room the hon. Member has referred to is an extremely handsome one, the only drawback to its usefulness as a Committee room being its distance from this House. I do not know whether that disadvantage can be overcome. As to the observations the hon. Member has made in regard to the "unsightly heraldic animals," I would remind him that the Vote we are discussing has nothing whatever to do with them. Then with regard to the shed that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Berwickshire complains of, the shed was not intended to be a receptacle for carriages, but a stand for horses. If carriages were allowed in there it would be inconvenient. No doubt the shed is only to be approached by a precipitous descent, but that is not the fault of the Office of Works. It is the fault of the course of time and the progress of ages, which have raised a considerable hill just outside the entrance to Westminster Hall. If I could put back the finger of the dial so far as to get rid of that small mountain of course the difficulty would disappear, but I am not able to do that, and I cannot see how it is possible to avoid a rather precipitous descent, looking at the nature of the ground. As to the alterations outside Westminster Hall, I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman who moves the reduction of the Vote, that the designs for the building and its whole cost were contemplated by the Committee that adopted the scheme. If the right hon. Gentleman will look at the plan he will see we have carried it out most faithfully. Then it is asked what we are going to do with the remainder of the space. We propose to carry the wall which at present ascends from the entrance to the horse stand to the gates of Palace Yard at a height of between four and five feet all along to the porch of St. Stephen's Hall. There will then be a good view obtained of the Palace of Westminster on that side, and the wall will be sufficiently high to prevent any accident. Inside the wall it is proposed to lay out the ground as a garden with walks through it. I venture to say again that the new buildings have not only added very considerably to the convenience of Members and officers of the House, by finding additional room for them, but has added very considerably to the beauty of the Palace.

(5.40.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury): The original estimate amounted to £7,854, and now we are asked for £2,000. That is an increase of the Vote by more than 25 per cent. I know the weakness in all these Estimates is that we are committed to them at a given sum, though somehow or other they have a great tendency to increase. But the increases seldom amount to more than 25 per cent. Can the right hon. Gentleman give us some reason why this Estimate has been so largely exceeded? What extra work has been undertaken to necessitate the increased expenditure? I find that the cost of fencing, levelling, and laying out the ground on the western side of Westminster is estimated at £6,000. That seems to me a large sum for the purpose. I should also like to know whether we are at the end of the expenditure in Westminster Hall, or whether, after we have voted this money, we shall be asked in the ordinary Estimates for another amount. Architecturally I think the new buildings are most unsightly.

*MR. PLUNKET: The difficulty in which the hon. Gentleman finds himself is easily explained. This is really not an addition to the sum of £7,854. The £2,000 is asked for additional works. In order to complete the works as far as possible by the meeting of Parliament we had to hurry them on, and I pressed the Treasury to allow me to take this course, because I thought it would be for the convenience of Members. We do not expect that it will be necessary to ask for anything else beyond that which appears on the Estimate, and the sum of £3,000 which is referred to in the foot-note.

MR. DE LISLE (Leicestershire, Loughborough): I should like to know whether this Estimate includes the restoration of the timbers on the eastern slope of the roof of Westminster Hall. Last year the timbers on the western slope of the roof were restored, but those on the eastern slope do not appear to have been touched. The dormer windows are still blocked, presenting a most unsightly appearance, both inside and outside the building. Although the restoration is not quite as we all desired, I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the work, and hope he will complete it by the necessary work in the roof.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies I should like to press him for an answer on the point I raised with regard to the bastions at the eastern end of the Hall. After I raised the question on a previous occasion, the right hon. Gentleman wrote me a letter in regard to it, and I should now like to know whether he has come to any positive decision about it, whether he has conferred with the architect or any other architect in regard to it, and whether he thinks it is a desirable thing that an ancient monument should be pulled about in this way without any reason?

*MR. MORTON: Perhaps the First Commissioner of Works will also reply to the question I raised just now.

*MR. PLUNKET: I apologise to the hon. Member for not having answered his question before. The answer to his question is that all the work of this kind done under the Office of Works is done by contract, which is put up for competition.

*MR. MORTON: My question was whether the money had been actually spent.

*(5.45.) MR. PLUNKET: Yes. This money has been, or is being, or will be spent before the end of the financial year. In answer to my hon. Friend the Member for Leicestershire I have to say that the Western slope of the roof of the Hall has been completely restored. The work required on the eastern side has not been lost sight of, but at any rate it is not a very expensive business. The point raised by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) has nothing to do with the Vote we are now discussing. But I may say that I have asked the opinion of many others on the point, and they are not in favour of the change. I shall, of course, do my best to secure the approval of my right hon. Friend in this particular instance. A considerable number of people take the view he does, and if I can find that his is the prevailing opinion I will turn my attention again to the matter. I cannot, at present, however, undertake to alter the building.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): Having myself pressed on the right hon. Gentleman the completion of the work by laying out the ground, and having protested against the long delay which took place in this respect, I view with great satisfaction this Supplementary Estimate. As my right hon. Friend has stated, this is really not connected with the structural work on the Hall, and does not raise the question referred to by the right hon. Member for Whitehaven. Upon that question there is a very great difference of opinion amongst Members of the House and others. There is a large amount of authority in favour of these bastions, but after all the matter is a very small one. If the prevailing opinion should turn out to be adverse to these structures it will not be difficult to remove them. Personally, I believe that when the work is complete the general opinion will be that as regards the interior of the Hall, at all events, the improvement has been great.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I will only say one word upon the question of finance. The right hon. Gentleman tells us that what is being done now was foreseen from the beginning. In that case why did he not give us at first an honest Estimate of the whole cost? I protest against being led into jobs of this kind without being told what they are to cost. We voted a large sum in a former Session for this restoration, and now we are asked for a sum for the surrounding fencing and clearing up. I do not think this is a reasonable or right way of treating the House.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: I am glad I elicited the answer from the right hon. Gentleman that this is not an increase of the Estimate by 25 per cent., but what he has said puts us in another difficulty. We find that the Estimate for £7,854, which was passed last year, was to cover certain work, and now the right hon. Gentleman tells us that this £2,000 is for extra work not included in the Estimate. I agree it is well that all the work possible should be finished before the opening of Parliament; still I do not think there was any great emergency which necessitated such a strong proceeding as the expenditure of £2,000 for work which had not been sanctioned by Parliament.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Personally, I think the alterations both inside and outside Westminster Hall are hideous. The Member for Bradford, who was one of the promoters of the scheme, thinks the contrary, and so does the architect, Mr. Pearson. But this Vote in no sort of way affects the question of the structural alterations. Outside there has been a great hoarding. It is perfectly true there was no Estimate last year for levelling and grassing and making the wall round the space, but the right hon. Gentleman had to face the fact that if he did not commence to do the work it would have been put off for months. Although I generally protest against money being expended before it is voted, this is a case of a halfpenny worth of tar which was absolutely necessary, owing to what had been expended, to finish the job.

*MR. MORTON: I am very glad to know these works were put up for public tender, but as far as I can understand there is not a single item connected with these works which might not have been easily estimated and voted on before the works were undertaken. I must protest against the Estimates being exceeded, as in this case. I understand that the House was told last year, or at some other time, that the total cost of these works would be £25,300. We are now told when the works have been commenced that they will cost £36,180. That is an increase of something like 40 per cent. Such increases are unfair to the taxpayers and are to be severely condemned.

(5.55.) Question put.

(5.55.) The Committee divided
Ayes 106, Noes 215. (Div. List, No 11.)

Original Question put, and agreed to.

2. £7,000, Supplementary, for Public Buildings, Great Britain.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £100,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for the acquisition of certain Land and Buildings at South Kensington."

*(6.10.) SIR BERNHARD SAMUELSON (Oxfordshire, Banbury). I do not think we should allow this Vote to pass without an acknowledgment of the perseverance the Vice-President of the Committee of the Council has displayed, and which at last has been successful in inducing his Colleagues to assent to this purchase, though I believe they were at first not favourable to the proposal. I think also some recognition is due to the Commissioners of the Exhibition of 1851 for the liberal way in which they have met the wishes of the Government. I am told the extent of the land is about 4½ acres, and I need hardly tell the Committee how much greater the value of the land for building purposes is in this part of London. The Commissioners, taking a very wise view, thought their duties as Commissioners were not fulfilled by merely looking to derive revenue from this land. They thought it proper that the land should be devoted to the advancement of Science and Art, and they expressed their willingness to show some consideration for such an object in the price they asked, and, unless I am misinformed, they have very properly attached to the sale the condition that the land shall be devoted to Science and Art purposes and no other. The complaint cannot be urged against this Vote that it is asked for after the money has been spent, for the purchase is, I believe, subject strictly to the sanction of Parliament, in the sense that should the House not vote this money the transaction will be void. But I hope the Committee will not be so short-sighted as to refuse the Vote. With my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Sir H. Roscoe) I served on the Departmental Committee to take into consideration the accommodation necessary for the Museum of Applied Science in connection with South Kensington Museum, and although some of the Members of that Committee were at the outset prejudiced strongly against any further expenditure, after hearing the evidence in favour of this proposal there was not a Member who was not convinced that it was absolutely necessary that a building must be erected if it was to be worthy the name of a Museum of Science and Art at all. I have only further to hope that when the land is acquired too much time will not be lost before it is turned to the purpose for which it is designed, and that with the truest economy the building will be worthy of its purpose. Proper consideration should be given to the plans, and no regard for a small saving should induce those entrusted with the erection of a building to do otherwise than arrange it in the best possible manner for the purpose to which it is to be devoted. At present it is not possible for the museum to serve the purpose for which it exists. The expenditure need not be very large, and a considerable expense now incurred by the Department in the shape of rent will be saved, and this rent capitalised ought to go a long way towards the erection of a suitable building. I am glad this Estimate has been brought forward, and I congratulate both the right hon. Gentleman and the Commissioners on the arrangement which has been arrived at.

*(6.15.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe). I do not rise to follow my hon. Friend's arguments in favour of voting the money, but to call attention to another matter in connection with the Vote. My hon. Friend has informed the Committee that, the money has not been paid, that the purchase is not actually completed, and of course we are glad to hear that, for it is much more regular to come to Parliament before the money is paid than afterwards. But if the money has not been paid, I should like to ask the question why should not the ordinary course be followed and this amount be included in the Estimates for the coming year? It is a proceeding that should be closely watched in Committee of Supply, for there is a tendency on the part of the Government of the day to do that by Supplementary Estimate which would be more regularly done in the ordinary Estimates for the year. Here we are at the end of February, and if this money has not been paid and we are dealing with friendly parties like the Exhibition Commissioners, why not postpone payment to the next financial year instead of dealing with it in this irregular manner by Supplementary Estimate? The Government ask for time from private Members to discuss the Supplementary Estimates, and then we find that they include this item, which ought to take its place in the ordinary Estimates. Speaking as a Member of the Public Accounts Committee, I cannot help thinking there is grave financial objection to this proceeding, and that it is calculated to impair the control the House ought to have over the expenditure. It is also calculated to impair the principle laid down that, after the House has voted the money for the year, unexpended balances should go towards the reduction of the National Debt, for in reality you deprive that reduction of debt of a sum of £100,000.

(6.20.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Perhaps I may be allowed to answer the question at once. There were, I think, very strong reasons why the course taken should have been taken on this occasion. In the first place, the Exhibition Commissioners have been extremely patient with regard to the negotiations which have been going on for years in connection with this particular question. The Government have been pressed, certainly for the last three years, very strongly to say "Aye" or "No," whether they proposed to purchase the land or not. There has been the Committee which has been referred to by the hon. Member for Banbury considering what should be done with a view to providing additional accommodation for a Science Museum. The right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Exhibition Commissioners has communicated with the Treasury on several occasions, and when the Government had the Report of the Committee which has been referred to, they determined and without going into details I may say they are justified in that Report—on accepting the principle that there should be some extension and relief to the overcrowded buildings of South Kensington. It was impossible to decide what should be done until the question of site was settled. We were pressed on the one hand—I think rightly pressed, and make no complaint against it: I think it was only fair to the Commissioners—that they should have an answer "yes" or "no" whether the Government would take the land or not, and, on the other hand, we had the pressing needs of South Kensington. The Chancellor of the Exchequer came to the conclusion that the offer made by the Exhibition Commissioners was one that he ought to accept in the interest of the nation generally, and that the question of additional accommodation for the Department could not be longer postponed. We could take no steps until the question of this land had been decided, and so we decided to put the case before Parliament, leaving to Parliament the responsibility of saying whether or not this land should be purchased. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Clitheroe knows perfectly well the uncertainties in regard to Supply. He knows perfectly well it would not be in our power, or in accordance with custom in this House, to take any part of this money in a Vote on Account, and it would have to be relegated to a time when the Vote could be got through as a whole. I hope the Committee will agree that the Government have been right. We have no desire to evade responsibility, but, on the whole, have come to the conclusion that this was the best course to pursue. We had no certainty that even if we put the Vote on the Estimates for next year the House would accept our proposal, and, therefore, we thought it advisable at once, to take the opinion of the House before we committed ourselves to the expenditure. I hope that expenditure will be sanctioned, and that we shall be enabled to take some practical step towards accomplishing what I believe is a general wish.

(6.25) SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I hope the explanation from the Secretary to the Treasury will be considered satisfactory. It seems to me most desirable that the money should be voted at once. No doubt the plot of land in question is the only one in the neighbourhood and the only one in the neighbourhood, likely to be available for all time for the establishment and extension of this great Science Museum. My hon. Friend below me has alluded to the Committee of which I had the honour to be a Member. Our instructions were to give an opinion as to the general value of the collection, and to see if any articles should be eliminated. We came to the conclusion that the value was extremely great, and that there were few articles which with advantage could be eliminated. The Committee should remember that this is not a Museum for London alone; it is a National Institution to be used by a large number of teachers and scientific students from all parts of the country, and it also provides valuable and interesting objects that are sent on to other parts of the country. We had the assistance of experts of all kinds, and all agreed as to the great value of the collection, and that it was absolutely necessary to have some proper building in which it could be housed, with proper means of keeping it up year by year to the requirements of modern science. It is a satisfaction to know that the Government are prepared to carry out the views of the Committee. It is, of course, no use having the land unless we put a building upon it, and I hope that before long a small portion of the large surplus we hope the Chancellor of the Exchequer will have at disposal will be set apart for this particular purpose. One question I should like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, and that has reference to the dwelling house built on the Queen's Gate side of the ground. What is the arrangement with the Commissioners in regard to this house?

(6.28.) MR. SHAW-LEFEVRE: I do not desire to enter into the question whether the present galleries should be enlarged or not, but to say a word on the point raised by my right hon. Friend the Member for Clitheroe (Sir U. Kay-Shuttleworth). He protested against a Vote of this magnitude being included in the Supplementary Estimates, and I think the answer given by the Secretary to the Treasury is very insufficient. He has shown no sufficient reason why the Vote should not be postponed to next year's ordinary Votes. He says the Commissioners for the Exhibition of 1851 wished to have an answer, but I apprehend the Commissioners would have been perfectly well satisfied with the announcement that the Government intended to buy the land, and it would be a matter of comparative indifference to them whether the money was voted in the one year or the other. The effect of taking the Vote now will be to reduce the expenditure of the coming year by £100,000 and diverting that sum from the possible reduction of the National Debt. I agree that the House should not be called upon to vote at this time a sum of money which could very well be brought forward in next year's Estimates in the ordinary course, and at a time when we should be able to have the whole scheme before us, and know what are the intentions of the Government on the matter. I do not propose at this stage to enter on the question of policy. What I desire to object to is the introduction of these large Votes in Supplementary Estimates, because it is a proceeding altogether without precedent, and one which, whenever attempted during the last few years, has been described as wholly contrary to Parliamentary practice. I take it that the general rule with regard to Supplementary Estimates is that only money should be applied for which must be paid in the current financial year, and that anything which can be legitimately postponed should be put off till the next year. I therefore join my right hon. Friend in protesting against the course which has been taken on this occasion, but I protest only on financial grounds.

*(6.32.) MR. MORTON: I quite agree with the objections raised by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Opposition Bench. I should like to have some more information on this matter. I want to know who valued this land. How are we to know it is worth £100,000? It does seem to me extraordinary to ask for a Vote of this large sum, and then to give us no information whatever as to who valued the land, or as to the extent of it, or where the money is going to, or whether any persons get a commission upon the sale.

(6.34.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I am resident at South Kensington, and am therefore in favour of spending money there. As a British citizen I am also in favour of spending money for the promotion of science ; but, at the same time, I feel that this is a large order, because it is not only an application for a Vote of £100,000, but it will bind us to the expenditure of several more hundreds of thousands of pounds for the buildings which will have to be erected. I think it is not right that in a Supplementary Estimate such a scheme as this should be sprung upon the House. Of course, I should be happy deliberately to consider the scheme which is to be laid before the House, but I do share the opinion of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that it is neither right nor proper that the Government should ask us to pass this Vote, and enter into no explanation either as to the extent or as to the value of the land. I was looking at the land this morning, and was struck by seeing upon it a solitary house. Is it included in the purchase? Now, I should like to know what it is exactly that we are buying, how the land has been valued, whether it is a fair bargain between the Commissioners and the Government, and what authority there is for the opinion which has been expressed that the Commissioners are generously parting with the land at a great deal below its value.

(6.36.) MR. JACKSON: With regard to the questions which have been addressed to me by hon. Members, I am afraid I took it for granted that everybody knew the circumstances connected with this purchase. The land is 4½ acres, and, in addition to the land, there is a building on it which is called the Southern Gallery, for which, at present, we pay a sum of £1,500 a year. That £1,500 yearly will, of course, fall out of the Estimates when we become the proprietors of the land. An hon. Member opposite has asked whether there are any commissions to be paid in connection with this transaction. I may tell him that there are no commissions to be paid, either on one side or on the other, because the transaction is one between the 1851 Exhibition Commissioners—gentlemen who are very well-known to all who take an interest in this question—and the Government. It is not very easy to say what is the sale value of the land unless it were, in some way, offered for public sale. The area to be bought includes the whole of the land on the south side of Exhibition Road, from one end to the other, with the exception of a house which was built on a portion of the land prior to the sale of it. We have had a valuation made by the Office of Works, and the result is that the value of the land was put down at something between £100,000 and £120,000. I believe that the Exhibition Commissioners have also had an estimate made which was considerably higher. In fact, they put the value of the land at £200,000, but they are willing to sell it to the Government for this purpose, and for this purpose only, at what they call a nominal price. I think there can be no doubt as to the advantages which will be derived from the Government being the owner of the whole of the land from the south side of Exhibition Road to Cromwell Road.

*(6.39.) MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): As I have been pressing the Government to make provision for the Science Collections for the last 10 years, I think I ought to say something in defence of the action of the Government in putting this Vote in the Supplementary Estimate. I do not, of course, object to the principle which has been laid down by my right hon. Friends as to what Votes ought properly to be included in the Supplementary Estimates; but there is no doubt that this question has been a pressing one for some years. We have a most valuable science collection which is housed in a most disgraceful manner. We have collections such as no other country in the world possesses. The Treasury have all along resisted every application for the extension of the Museum, and for placing these valuable collections in a building in which they would be useful and accessible to the country. There have been no less than three Departmental Committees appointed to inquire as to the necessity of extending the Museum, and although some of the Members so appointed on the Committee went into the inquiry holding the view that the extension was unnecessary, they have, before the inquiry closed, been bound to confess that it was not only necessary, but highly desirable. I hear it asked for the first time whether we are going to get good value for our money. Now, I have been for many years a Member of the Exhibition Commission, and I know something about the value of the property. I believe our Surveyors—one of the most eminent firms in London—valued it at £160,000, this valuation not including certain portions of the property. The present value is undoubtedly £200,000, and we let the Government have it for the nominal sum of £70,000, the balance being the value of the Southern Gallery. Now we are asked what is to be done with the money. My reply is, that we are looking forward to provide a sum of £5,000 a year in scholarships for technical education, and I do not think that we could better apply the money than in this direction, for we propose that the scholarships shall be open to all schools in every part of the United Kingdom. I never stood up in this House to recommend any expenditure with a more clear conviction that I am doing my duty than I now possess in urging the Commission to pass this Vote and enable the Government to have the Museum completed as rapidly as possible.

(6.44) MR. JAMES ROWLANDS: The right hon. Gentleman has failed entirely to grasp the objection which we are taking to this Vote. I do not wish for one moment to be considered as objecting to the proper housing of the science exhibits which we may have. We are as strongly in favour of proper buildings for Scientific Institutions as any one in this House. But the great thing is, where is the proper place to put these buildings, whether we get full value for the money we pay, and whether the money asked for ought to be included in a Supplementary Vote. I am surprised at the right hon. Gentleman, with his experience of 10 years in respect to this matter, failing to see the importance of the position we have taken up. We are told by the Government that they must have the money within a short time. We are also told by the Secretary to the Treasury that the Exhibition Commissioners have been trying to get an answer from the Government during the past three years, but have failed to get it. What have the Government been about during those three years, and what reason is there that they should not wait another month or two instead of trying to get the Vote in the present financial year? If the Commissioners have been kind enough, as we are told, to offer the land at a sum much below its real value, surely they might add to their kindness by waiting for the Vote to be asked for properly at a time when Members can have full information on the subject before them. Again, I am not sure that the Commissioners have a right to sell the land to the Government at a reduced price. If they are anxious to establish scholarships, they ought to make the Government pay the full value of the land. I do not wish to be too severe on the right hon. Gentleman, but it struck me whether he and his Colleagues were not committing a breach of trust in giving away valuable land which they have under their charge. There is another question which strikes me, and that is, whether it is necessary that all these buildings should be put up at South Kensington. That is not, as a matter of course, the most convenient spot for these institutions, or for the students who come up from the country to attend them. It is, I admit, a most convenient place for a number of wealthy people who like to have these art and science collections at their very doors. I think the time has come when we should consider the propriety of building these institutions on sites which cost something less than £20,000 an acre, and I believe that if we chose other localities it would be more convenient to the students, who would be able probably to get cheaper lodgings, while the localities would greatly benefit. But my strong ground of opposition is that you are using a Supplementary Estimate for a purpose to which it ought not to be applied. There is no reason why you should thus suddenly spring this matter upon the House after it has been in abeyance so many years. Surely if we have the friendship of the Exhibition Commissioners they might be expected to wait until the ordinary Estimates for the year could be laid before the House of Commons, and Members have an opportunity of considering the scheme as a whole. I shall consequently vote against the Estimate.

*(6.49.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): It seems to me that we are making a fresh departure in the way of buildings at South Kensington. On the east side of Exhibition Road there is a considerable quantity of vacant land, and I think it is a great scandal that the South Kensington Museum is left in its present unfinished state. But this is a Vote to enable us to acquire land on the other side of the road, and I agree thoroughly with the hon Member who has just spoken that it is a great mistake to concentrate all these buildings in one place. I want, in the first place, to see the Museum on the east side of the road completed, and I think when that is done the building will serve all practical purposes for some time to come. But the present proposal really amounts to the beginning of a new Museum. I think it is a great misfortune that this Vote has been put forward under these circumstances. I would much rather see a new Museum established in some other part of London. I want to see these places of public instruction distributed, and I do protest strongly against acquiring this new lot of land when we have so much space at South Kensington still unoccupied, and not likely to be occupied for many years to come, and when other parts of London are so inadequately provided with museums.

(6.52.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I sympathise with what fell from my right hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield as to the extreme desirability of properly housing our science and art collections, but I think there is a good deal to be said for the objections which have been made to the course taken by the Government in presenting this as a Supplementary Estimate, and I trust that before the debate is concluded we shall have some further explanation. It is evident that there is a good deal of danger in initiating the practice of thrusting into the Supplementary Estimates demands which properly belong to the succeeding year. We did not know until we came down to the House what these Supplementary Estimates were about, and we, therefore, have had no time to consider this proposal. Supposing a Minister has a piece of work to get through which is not at all popular, he conceives the idea of putting it into the Supplementary Estimates, and bringing it forward at a time when it cannot be properly discussed, because no one knows anything about it. I entirely sympathise with the objections which have been raised, and unless I can be convinced that the sum proposed to be granted now does not properly belong to the burdens of next year, I shall be compelled to vote against the grant.

(6.55.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): When a right hon. Gentleman spoke of South Kensington being crowded with many valuable exhibits, I think he could not have been at that place very recently or else he would have known that in one large room there is nothing but a number of old and dusty chairs which have not been used since 1862, while the electric appliances room is utterly unused. I think if all the space there were properly utilised there would be no necessity to ask for this Vote, and the right hon. Gentleman would have no reason to complain that our valuable exhibits are badly housed. I say that the bad housing is due to want of attention on the part of the heads of Departments. This is a large sum to be voted in a Supplementary Estimate, and I think the Government might fairly have waited for the beginning of a new financial year before asking for it.

*(6.57.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): Having acted as honorary secretary to the Royal Commission for some years, I wish to say a few words in explanation of a mistake which has evidently arisen in the course of this debate. The hon. Member for Finsbury suggested that the Commissioners might be doing a great wrong to the public by selling the land at a price below its actual value. But the fact is, that a Charter was given to the Commissioners for the purpose of acquiring the land, and either giving it, or selling it at a low price for the foundation of institutions such as these. The reason for giving the Charter was that the cost of sites for public buildings in the Metropolis was so enormous that it was desirable to secure a large extent of land, and then dispose of it at moderate figures for various public purposes. If any hon. Members will go to the Library, they will find the Report of the Royal Commission of 1851 which came out towards the end of last year, and in which the whole of this Vote was explained at great length. The Commissioners have based their estimate of the value of the land upon sales of similar land which have actually taken place in the locality, and they have come to the conclusion that the land which they are offering to the Government for £70,000 is actually worth about £200,000. The additional £30,000 which is to be paid by the Government is in respect of a building upon the land, and the sum of £30,000 is the value put upon that building by the Board of Works Surveyor, although the Commissioners are of opinion that the value is higher. With regard to the disposal of the £100,000 by the Commissioners, I may say that they are being continually pressed by people in the provinces to set apart a portion of their revenue for the purpose of promoting technical education. We have been pressed year after year to apply our surplus revenues to educational purposes, and could not do so because originally more land was secured than we had the money to buy, and have had to borrow money on mortgage. Our present debt is £129,000, and when the present amount of the Vote is applied to the extinction of the debt, if the Government choose to accept our offer we shall have only £29,000 of debt, which would be easily met by certain contributions from revenue. We have pressed the Government to come to a decision on the question whether they will acquire the land for the public, or whether it should be let to private individuals at full value to pay off the debt. We are now tired of waiting, the present state of things having been going on for 10 years, during which time the pressure from the provinces has been more and more strongly exerted upon the Commissioners, and after what we heard from the last Committee which reported on the subject, the Commissioners told the Government—

“We now offer you this land for the last time for £70,000, although we believe it to be worth £200,000. Will you take it? We cannot wait any longer, as we must answer the provincial demands for applying the revenue which will exist after we have paid off the debt.”

At last the Government have come to a conclusion, which I think is a wise one; and when it is argued that it is unusual to vote a sum of this kind on the Supplementary Estimates, I believe that when the Correspondence on the question is published, it will be seen that we have been very patient, and that the time has come when the Government must give us an answer. This they have done, and it is now for the Committee to say what course it will take upon the subject.

(7.1.) MR. LABOUCHERE: It strikes me that the right hon. Gentleman has not made a very good defence. He tells us that the Commissioners have entered into a species of general engagement either to give their land for nothing, or to part with it under its value for purposes connected with science and art. But he now says the money ought to be granted immediately, and that if not they will sell the land to private individuals for building upon. But obviously the Commissioners are bound not to do that.

*SIR L. PLAYFAIR: They may apply the proceeds of any money they may obtain for public purposes.

MR. LABOUCHERE: That seem to me to be a round-about method. The sites are for London and not for the provinces, and therefore the Commissioners are bound to sell the land for sites in London far below its value, in order that it may be used for scientific purposes. I think we ought to register a protest against these large sums of money being put into the Supplementary Estimates. To bring them forward in that way usually means that, by some sort of accident, there has been an excessive expenditure which was not at first contemplated; it was never intended that a scheme like this for a building in connection with the South Kensington Museum should be so dealt with. Even had it come up in the ordinary Estimates, I am inclined to think I should have opposed the proposal; because I regard the South Kensington Museum as a perfect vortex against which we should be upon our guard. I am positively shocked at the amount of money obtained for South Kensington. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Mundella) generally looks upon those of us who take this view as Goths and Philistines, because we object to this expenditure on his part and on the part of the friends of art; but I say the time has come when it is necessary that we should keep a wary eye on the proceedings of the friends of art, who, as a rule, mismanage everything with which they are connected, and spend thirteen pence where they ought not to spend more than tenpence. The friends of art ought to think of finance as well as of art. Under all the circumstances I hope the Committee will not only divide against this £100,000 Vote, but will throw it out.

(7.5.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): The policy of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken is pretty clear; it is to oppose any grants in favour of South Kensington; and this is because it is not in his view a good commercial speculation. But I think I may make an appeal to the commercial and financial mind of the hon. Gentleman. I differ entirely from him on this point, because, as he will be told by duly qualified persons, if you take the erections of South Kensington, they are at the present moment worth, in mere commercial value, two or three times as much as they have cost the nation. I think that this fact ought to satisfy the commercial mind of the hon. Gentleman. But there is another point I should like to press on the hon. Member. Some of the most valuable possessions in the South Kensington collection have either been bequeathed to the nation or presented as gifts during the lifetime of the donors; and those gifts and bequests are dependent almost entirely in point of value on the appreciation the public have for them. If after obtaining gifts of this kind the nation does not take steps to house them properly they are not likely to obtain such gifts in future. I think, also, in a matter of this kind we are bound to take cognisance of the experience we have had of what has been the case in connection with the provincial museums and exhibitions. Wherever the community show the great value they attach to these collections, they have at once been met by the public spirit of the inhabitants, and large gifts have been made in consequence. The collection at South Kensington is both splendid and unique, and one of which any nation might be proud; but it is improperly and inadequately housed. I am, therefore, delighted to see this Vote placed before the Committee, and hope it will only be the precursor of other votes of the same kind.

(7.7.) MR. PICTON: I should like to hear why it is that the Government cannot wait till the end of the financial year.

*(7.7.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The answer is short; the end of the financial year falls at such a time that the vote could not be taken until June or July, or perhaps August, and it is unreasonable to ask the Commissioners of 1851 to wait until then. I am one of those who have resisted the expenditure at South Kensington as long as I could, and until I was perfectly satisfied it was necessary in the public interests. A Committee was appointed by the present Government to inquire and report whether any further accommodation could be found to meet the requirements of the case. We have received the Report of that Committee, and have no alternative but to carry out their recommendations to the best of our ability. The step we propose is one of the first steps necessary to be taken. When exception is taken to the Vote appearing in the Supplementary Estimates I wish to point out what is involved in that objection. It is suggested that the Government may at any period enter into a national engagement for the purchase of costly property and not communicate it to the House; of the two alternatives I should say the postponement of the announcement of such a financial engagement must be regarded as a much more serious matter than to ask the House to confirm at once the obligation into which the Government have entered. I may add that full notice has been given of the engagement into which we entered, as the Estimates were circulated last night or early this morning, and consequently hon. Members have come down to the House with ample information on the subject.

(7.10.) MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon Gentleman says we have had full information; whereas the Government merely enter into an engagement of which we have this short notice, and then leave it to the House to pass the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman (Sir L. Playfair) says the Commissioners cannot wait for another six months. Why not? They have already waited for 10 long years, and surely they might wait another six months. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) appeared to me to take a somewhat huxtering view of the matter. He seems to say that "We ought to go on purchasing every species of bric-à-brac, because its price has risen in the market; that what the nation has bought is worth three times what it was. Here is a splendid speculation! Let us buy a quantity more in the hope the price will continue to rise." The right hon. Gentleman also says many persons have given certain things to South Kensington. Well, whenever I have been there, I have generally found, on inquiry, that where there is a very poor thing, it has been given by some gentleman, but that where there is a really good thing, it has been bought by the nation. If you go on building in the manner proposed, you will have persons sending every species of rubbish in the hope that their names may be put down as donors to the nation. I object to that. We ought not to accept a gift horse without looking it in the mouth, and most assuredly we ought not to build a stable of more than three times the value of the horse.

*(7.13.) MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Gentleman has stated that what is given to the Museums are generally rubbish; does he not know that during a period of three years the value of these gifts has equalled half a million sterling? Why, Sir, many of these gifts are perfectly unique. The Jones Collection alone is worth £350,000, and is one of the best collections of its kind in Europe. In fact, I believe the gifts to South Kensington are worth many times over the amount the Government has expended there; while recently more was received in gifts in one year than had been expended during the previous 27 years.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Smith) has stated that if this Vote were not placed in the Supplementary Estimates, it might have to wait till July or August. I ask does he propose to carry out the policy of last year by taking the last Votes first, and making Class 1 come at the end of the list? We want to know from the First Lord whether he intends to begin with Class 1 or Class 6?

*(7.16.) MR. BARTLEY: I think there is a misapprehension about the Vote now. I agree that the collection at the Kensington Museum is not properly housed; and, secondly, that the Museum is not complete. But will this Vote assist the better housing of the collection? The Vote is simply to buy a piece of land now used by the South Kensington Museum; it will not in any way aid in the better housing of the collection. Therefore, I think we ought to give a liberal Vote to complete the South Kensington Museum, and to put the collection in proper order, in which it is not at the present time. But I thoroughly object to extending the Museum to the other side of the road before completing the building on the east side of the road.

*(7.18.) MR. MORTON: I am glad to hear that this land has been valued by somebody. We are told that the purchaser valued the land at £120,000, and the landlord at £200,000; and it appears that we are going to give £70,000 and £30,000 for the building. I want to know how we can get it for a less sum than the purchaser valued it at. I object to this money being spent altogether in the West End. Some of this money ought to be expended in the East End of London, or even in the North End. The aristocracy of this country have already got enough of the good things of this world, and if we are to have these buildings and collections by all means let us have them in the East End of London, to improve the people there. I hope the Committee will allow this matter to be postponed with the object of our having time to consider whether, in common fairness, to the people of this country, and especially to the people of the Metropolis, some of these buildings ought not to be erected in the East End of London.

(7.30.) MR. BLANE: The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Sheffield has said that gifts worth half a million have been received at the South Kensington Museum in the course of one year. When visiting that institution, the first thing that has met my gaze has been the bust of the right hon. Gentleman himself. I take great interest in objects of art, and I know what pleases me, and I quite agree that this bust is not properly housed. There is also a picture of the Committee of the Exhibition of 1851, in which is a portrait of the right hon. Gentleman, Sir Lyon Playfair. I quite agree that it also is not properly housed. It is a good portrait, but it is not in a good position. Perhaps this good portrait of the right hon. Gentleman might be put in a better position than it is at present. I have no objection to the right hon. Gentleman having both his bust and the painting put in a good position, so long as he does so at his own expense, but I object to expending £100,000 for the purpose, and I therefore resist this Vote.

*(7.22.) MR. MUNDELLA: The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. I have no bust at present at the Kensington Museum. The bust was a presentation from the factory workers, but has long since been removed.

Ayes 144; Noes 67.—(Div. List, No. 12.)

4. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(7.32.) MR. LABOUCHERE: This is one of those singular items that occasionally slip into Supplementary Estimates. We are perpetually being asked to spend money on the Legation at Washington. The original Estimate for the alterations there was £700. That Estimate is exceeded this year by £850; that is to say, it has positively been doubled, and yet we have not any species of explanation offered to us. This is an instance of the reckless manner in which Gentlemen connected with the Foreign Office act in these matters. I see that £100 is put down for buying a filter, and £450 for alterations and repairs to the heating apparatus, and £700 for alterations in the drainage arrangements.

*(7.34.) MR. PLUNKET: I think I can explain the necessity of taking this Vote in the form of a Supplementary Estimate. When Sir Julian Pauncefote went to take up his residence at Washington, it was found that the house was in a very bad state, and there were no means of heating the upper part of it. It was necessary if he was to go into the house this winter that the work should be done at once. The drains were in a bad condition, and a number of officials had been suffering from illness caused by the defective arrangements. The water supplied to the Embassy house at Washington is often in a bad state in consequence of floods, and it is therefore necessary to filter it. £100 seems to be a large sum to expend on a filter, but it was a very large filter, as it was necessary to deal with the water supply of the whole of the house and the stables.

(7.36.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I can only tell the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Plunket) that I lived for some years in the house at Washington, that it had no heating apparatus, no special drainage arrangements, and no filter. I drank the water, and I throve. I have no doubt that Sir Julian Pauncefote and his successors would have thriven in the same way without these alterations. An Ambassador or a Minister never goes to any Legation which has been built at great cost to the country without insisting on having some sort of alteration made. It is really a strong thing for the right hon. Gentleman to tell us that it was absolutely necessary to put up a filter at a cost of £100. Probably the President of the United States drinks the Washington water unfiltered, and the Cabinet in Washington no doubt drink it also. I think it will meet the exigencies of the case if I move to reduce the Vote by £1,350, so as to bring it down to the original estimate.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That Item N, of £1,350, for the Washington Legation, be omitted from the proposed Vote.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

*(7.40.) MR. D. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): I know something of the circumstances of this case, and think it would be ungracious of the Committee to divide against the Vote. I was recently in the house in question, and I think if there is anything wrong it is in the system, and not in the demand for repairs. It seems very unsatisfactory that the repairs of our establishments in foreign countries should be dealt with, at a distance, by the Board of Works, and that if an Ambassador requires to have any repairs carried out he should have, as in this case, to come to England, and besiege the doors of the Board of Works. When that is the state of things it is not wonderful that there should be a gradual accumulation of repairs, and that larger sums should be asked for than are altogether agreeable. I believe that in this case several of the people employed in the house, including some of the secretaries and servants, were laid up in consequence of defects in the drainage. That is not a creditable thing, and it is not wonderful that a considerable expense should be necessary under such circumstances. When a man is serving his country at a great distance from home, I think it is only reasonable that we should give him a decent and healthy house to live in.

(7.43.) MR. MOLLOY (King's Co., Birr): The hon. Member's views on this subject are evidently the result of having dined with the Ambassador at Washington. I can personally testify that the water at Washington is quite as good in every sense as the water supplied in London, and I may add that the ordinary price of a family filter in America is four dollars, or 16s. It appears that a filter which costs 16s. is put down, when it is for an Ambassador, at £100. It is too ridiculous. Either this expenditure is not for a filter, or, if it is, there is something more than appears on the face of the Votes. It seems absurd to discuss small items of this kind, but it is generally in regard to these smaller items that fraud creeps in. The supposition that any filter in America ever cost £100 is absolutely ridiculous. We can hardly object to the cost incurred in altering the drains, because we all know that drains go wrong, and we ought not to let our Ambassador run the risk of illness on account of the drains. But the sum of £450 is put down for heating four or five rooms in a house in Washington. Why, £450 would heat a terrace in Washington. The small furnaces which they have in the rooms there, and which, to my mind, are very unhealthy and unpleasant, only cost a few dollars. If we go to a Division I shall certainly vote for the Amendment.

*(7.46.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen S.): I hope my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) will be satisfied with the discussion that has taken place, and that he will not think it necessary to go to a Division. At the same time I think this is one of the frequent occasions on which the Board of Works seems unprepared to give the explanations we might expect from them. There must be something wrong in the working of a system which frequently gives rise to cases of this kind, when the expenditure seems disproportionate to the result. However, we have had evidence that the drainage is bad, and I do not think, therefore, the Committee has any reason to quarrel with the chief item of the Vote.

ask leave, then, to withdraw the Amendment. I think the case has been met by the discussion which has taken place, and I hope it will act as a warning to our Ministers abroad, and to those who represent them here, that they must not incur reckless expenditure whenever they go to a fresh Embassy.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

*(7.49.) MR. MORTON: I wish to object to this Vote on principle. The original estimate for the well and water supply in this case was £790, and we are asked to sanction an expenditure of £700 more than that amount. It appears that the Committee was deceived last year when it was told that the work would cost only £790. I quite agree that the House should be put into good order, and that the drainage should be perfected, but I am not sure that these are fair charges. I speak with some little knowledge of drainage, and £750 seems to me to be an enormous sum for the drainage of one small house. I think that the Yankees have made a fool of John Bull over this matter. I should like to have some further explanation respecting the filter, and also with regard to the "contingencies." Contingencies may mean anything. I remember reading some years ago that Joseph Hume discovered that "etc." in the House of Commons meant sherry and biscuits. I wish to know whether "contingencies" means sherry and biscuits, or whether it means some other extraordinary expenditure?

(7.52.) MR. BLANE: As to this water supply—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member cannot go back to that item, as it has been disposed of.

MR. BLANE: I wish to speak on the total Vote. I think the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket) does not know much about Washington or its water supply. He alleges that the water supply is sometimes unhealthy by reason of the floods. The reverse is the case, and there is a better water supply at Washington than in any town I know of in the United Kingdom. It is manifest that if our Minister is not satisfied with the Embassy at Washington he must be very hard to please. It has done for his predecessors for many years, and if Sir Julian Pauncefote is not satisfied let him make the alterations he desires at his own expense. He has an allowance of some £700 a month or more.

(7.54.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I do not want to go into the details of the Vote; but I would point out that it refers to works carried on a long way from this country. In past years a very large number of cases of this kind have come, not only before this House, but before the Public Accounts Committee, and observations have been made upon them. I remember the sum of £40 being once charged for a washing-stand in the Embassy at Berlin. How far the items now before us are admissible we shall not learn this evening. We must, perforce, pass the Vote. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that something like an understanding was arrived at on a previous occasion, whereby not only were Clerks of the Works to be sent out from head-quarters to visit distant places and report on repairs and buildings, but it should be taken into consideration whether there should not be some transfer of the services. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether that matter has been decided upon or considered; or whether we are to go on, year after year, having bills sent in which are transparently ridiculous and exorbitant in respect of services which cannot be checked?

*MR. PLUNKET: I am not aware of an understanding of the kind referred to by the hon. Member.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS II.

5. £700, Supplementary, for the Foreign Office.

(7.56.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): A study of the Estimates and Appropriation Accounts for the last 10 years has convinced me that the growth of the telegraph expenses in all the Departments has been rapid and uncontrolled. The increase of gross expenditure has been very great—in fact, it has in eight years doubled; and it is remarkable that year by year the Estimates have been largely exceeded, almost without exception, in every Department. The importance of the subject justifies me in asking that an inquiry into the whole subject of telegraph expense in all Government Departments should be granted without delay. The total expenditure on telegrams by the Foreign and Colonial Offices, by the Diplomatic and Consular Services, and by the Navy during the 10 years 1876-77 to 1886-7 was £409,459, but the original Estimates for those Services only amounted to £239,400. We are now asked to vote £7,600 for extra expenses incurred in telegrams for these Departments, in addition to the sum of £13,400 originally voted. These sums are paid to a Telegraph Company for sending messages over lines to South Africa which we now subsidise to the extent of £35,000 a year. I allude to the company controlled by that monopolist, Sir John Pender, which in addition gets a subsidy of £19,000 a year for a cable down the West Coast of Africa. This is not the time for raising the graver question whether the Government ought not, as a matter of State policy, and with a view to afford the public a cheap telegraph service throughout the Empire, to become possessed, by purchase or construction, of a complete Imperial telegraphic net. But, in any case, I think I am justified in asking that a Committee be appointed to inquire into this large expenditure and the continual abnormal growth in Government telegraph expenses.

Vote agreed to.

6. Motion made, and Question proposed,

(8.0.) SIR W. BARTELOT: I should like to say a word on this Vote. In the first place, I should like to congratulate my right hon. Friend (Mr. Chaplin) on the high place he now occupies; and I think that we who speak on behalf of the agricultural interest will be sure on all occasions to receive the greatest courtesy and consideration at his hands. I should like to ask my right hon. Friend what are the additional salaries, amounting to £500, for collecting agricultural statistics? We are anxious to have every information that can be given to us on that subject. I presume there is to be a large extension of the Returns we have previously had. We have always felt that the Agricultural Returns should be as accurate as possible, and I am sure that such is the intention of my right hon. Friend. I presume that the expenditure with regard to the Land Commission will now be merged in that of the Department of Agriculture; but I hope that the money already voted for the Land Commission will be spent under that head, and that at the end of the financial year the operation of the Commission will be carried out by the Agricultural Department.

*(8.2.) MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I desire to move the reduction of the salary of the President of the Board of Agriculture by the sum of £100. In doing so, I must say I very heartily join with the hon. Baronet opposite in congratulating the right hon. Gentleman on the position to which he has attained; and I am sure that whenever we want any question attended to we shall be met by the right hon. Gentleman with the greatest courtesy. He knows I should be the last person to deprive him of his salary, which I am quite sure will be well earned. My only object in moving the reduction is to give him an opportunity of affording us some further information than he can do in answer to questions addressed to him across the Table of the House. There are a great many important matters on which we should like to have a statement. The right hon. Gentleman has been looked upon in this country as the champion of the tenant farmers. He has urged upon them the desirability of a great number of remedies for alleviating the great distress which agriculture has undoubtedly been afflicted with in the last few years. It is not so long ago that the right hon. Gentleman thought a return to Protection would be desirable for the purpose of alleviating the distress. It was, I think, called Fair Trade. After that he dropped Protection like a red-hot coal and took up another subject, which is called bi-metallism. It would be satisfactory to us on this side of the House if the right hon. Gentleman would tell us plainly that he has altogether abandoned those two visionary remedies. Earlier in the Session I asked the right hon. Gentleman whether Her Majesty's Government intended to carry out the recommendations contained in the Report of the Departmental Committee on Agriculture and Dairy Schools, and especially as to the Central Normal School at Rugby. The right hon. Gentleman replied that, undoubtedly, the Government did propose to promote technical education in agriculture and dairy farming, and he pointed out that at present only £5,000 was given to the new Department of Agriculture to assist him in the matter. I hardly think that £5,000 is sufficient for what is wanted, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will use the great influence which we know he possesses as a Member of the Cabinet to obtain a large increase of that sum. The results of helping agricultural schools which have shown a disposition to help themselves have been very satisfactory, and we on this side of the House are decidedly in accord with him when he says he prefers rather to help those schools which are helping themselves than to provide new schools to be maintained by the State; but in saying this, I wish still to urge the importance of establishing the Central Normal School at or near Rugby. I also, by means of a question, called the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the subjects that have been discussed by farmers and fox-hunters as to the mode in which fox-hunting can be carried on in this country, so as not only to keep up the great reputation of that sport, but also to be more beneficial to farmers than it is at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman treated the question as somewhat of a joke, and said he presumed it was put to him as an ex-master of fox-hounds, and not as the Minister of Agriculture. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that it was not so; and if he reflects for a moment he will see that in the position in which he is now placed it would be desirable for him, as far as possible, to cast aside all recollections of the distinguished position he occupied as a master of fox-hounds, and to remember that he is now the head of an important Department of the State. When sport is mentioned in this House hon. Members opposite seem to think they have a monopoly of it. But I can assure them that there are Gentlemen on the Opposition side who can ride as straight, shoot as straight, and present as straight a bat to the bowler as hon. Gentlemen on the other side. There are some points on which the right hon. Gentleman might do something for the tenant farmers. In the first place, it might be desirable that there should be an enforced subscription to the hunt.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is going beyond the scope of the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman has duties imposed upon him by Parliament, and the hon. Member should address himself to them.

*MR. COBB: I was coming to that. The second section of the Act distinctly states that the Board of Agriculture may do anything which may be useful for promoting agriculture. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he sees his way to promoting agriculture by enabling farmers to have a better opportunity for selling the horses they breed, and the forage which their fields produce, so that it should not be necessary for purchasers always to go to middlemen. The stock and crops of the farmers are now, owing to want of arrangement rather than to bad arrangement, not properly protected. I am not a hunting-man; but everyone knows that the farmers' crops, stock and fences are liable to reckless and wanton damage, which, it is thought, might be prevented if proper arrangements were made by the appointment of field-stewards. The right hon. Gentleman has said that the damage to crops might be more effectually dealt with by the masters of hounds themselves. If so, why have they not dealt with it in past years so successfully as to put an end to complaints which are now continually made? Then, he said, he thought all these questions might be left to the good sense and good feeling of all concerned. Of course, there is nothing better to leave them to than good sense and good feeling; but, again, I would say it has been left to their good sense and good feeling for a great number of years; but that has not prevented the farmers demanding that their voices should be heard through the medium of Agricultural Committees appointed to meet the Hunt Committees. There are many other subjects to which I could allude, affecting the agriculturalists, whom we all desire to help—such, for instance, as the muzzling orders in Kent and Essex, and still more the numerous amendments which are so urgently required in the Agricultural Holdings Act; but I leave these to be dealt with by my hon. Friends sitting near me.

Motion made, and Question proposed
“That Item A, £1,266, Salaries, be reduced by £100, part of the Salary of the President.”—(Mr. Cobb.)

(8.21.) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): There is one thing with which the Committee will agree in the hon. Member who has just sat down, and that is that he is not a hunting man, because his arguments with regard to fox-hunting were impracticable. Whilst I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his promotion, I wish also to express my own intense grief, astonishment, and amazement when I find that his beneficent sway is not to extend to our side of the Channel. I think it a most disastrous thing that this should be the case; because the agricultural interests of the country are very intimately connected, and it is desirable that they should be placed under the superintendence of one head. I wish to call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the Irish cross-Channel traffic. The animals from Ireland are treated in such a barbarous way whilst coming across the Channel that their value is much deteriorated. Cattle are brought from America in a much better and more humane manner, although the voyage is much longer and more stormy, and I do not see why a similar system should not be adopted with regard to Irish cattle. Some of the Railway and Steam-Packet Companies agree to take cattle at a lower rate at what is called “owners' risk,” and these cattle are treated in an especially brutal manner. To my mind, the “owners' risk” system ought to be abolished. Another point which ought to occupy the attention of the Board of Agriculture, and in dealing with which I am sure my right hon. Friend will assist the Irish Government, is the extermination, by very firm and determined means, of the disease of pleuro-pneumonia. We are perpetually being accused, I think for the most part very unjustly, of sending over pleuro-pneumonia. At any rate, a great loss is occasioned to the Irish farmers by these continual alarms; and I am certain that nothing is wanted but a firm application of the Slaughter Order wherever pleuropneumonia is proved to exist; and I think it would much improve the chance of success if the cost of communication were paid out of Imperial rather than out of local funds. I am bound to say that the composition of the Irish Privy Council, which is supposed to deal with this subject in Ireland, is not such as to give confidence to Irish agriculturalists. It is composed largely of lawyers, some of whom might have some difficulty in deciding at which end of a cow to look for its head and at which to look for its tail. I hope the right hon. Gentleman's beneficent sway will soon be extended to agriculture in Ireland. (8.25.)

*(9.0.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): My hon. Friend the Member for Rugby, at the opening of his remarks, expressed a feeling, which I am sure is general on this side of the House as well as on the other, that the Motion which stands in his name was not framed in an unfriendly spirit, but was simply intended to enable us to draw the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to one or two points of importance. I should like, in the first place, to express my own satisfaction on the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman. I happen to know that some of my Radical supporters, who are farmers, think that he is the right man in the right place, and I am sure there is a general feeling of approval of the appointment made by Her Majesty. The fact that his appointment is approved by farmers of both sides in politics I hope may induce the right hon. Gentleman to signalise his tenure of office by an advanced and a generous treatment of agricultural matters. As this Vote refers to the question of agricultural statistics and the Veterinary Department, in addition to the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, I do not think that I shall be out of order in referring briefly to those two questions. I have taken a great deal of interest, as other Members have, in what has been made known of the practice of other Boards of Agriculture in other countries; and I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman will not hesitate to pull on the purse-strings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in order to make the Statistical Department of the Board of Agriculture an honour to the country, a help to the farmers, small as well as large, and a real means of furthering the great interests of agriculture. Then, as to the Veterinary Department. I wish to take this opportunity of recording my satisfaction—a satisfaction which I think is generally felt—with the firm administration of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts by the right hon. Gentleman. The information which is now in the hands of private Members is not so exhaustive as we could wish with regard to the prevalence of disease in France and Germany; but I venture to say that hon. Members, irrespective of Party, will gladly support any policy which will protect the farmers of the country from the ravages of these dreadful diseases. Now, I will turn to the questions which particularly prompted me to take part in this debate. It seems to me, Mr. Courtney, that we are rapidly arriving at a new stage with regard to the whole policy of the Legislature respecting compensation for agricultural improvements. I know I might be out of order if I entered into the question of the state of the existing laws, which is a question rather of legislative reforms than of the administration of the Department of Agriculture; and so, as I do not wish to put myself out of order, I will not go beyond the scope of what I wish to bring before the attention of the Committee. Now, in carrying into practice the principles laid down in the Agricultural Holdings Act, there is a very important power placed in the hands of the right hon. Gentleman by the Act of last Session, and I hope it will be used for the benefit of agriculture. The Committee will know that the Act of last year transferred to the new Ministry of Agriculture the powers of the Land Commission. One of these powers was the drawing up of lists of competent valuers in counties. Sir James Caird, who occupies so distinguished a position on the Board of Agriculture, and who is, perhaps, the very best man who could have been placed in the position, expressed his opinions five or six years ago on the question of the appointment of valuers. All of us interested in agriculture, and especially in the great principle which we thought had been successfully asserted by the Agricultural Holdings

Act, namely, the principle that the tenants should have a real right of compensation for the value added to the land by their improvements, have had our attention drawn to a very remarkable speech delivered before the Chamber of Agriculture of Norfolk by a former well-known Member of this House, Mr. Clare Sewell Read. Any one who read that speech must feel that if the facts are verified by inquiry a very serious state of affairs prevails. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will grant an inquiry, by a Select Committee of the House of Commons, into the working of the Valuation Clauses of the Act, and especially with regard to possible future action by the Board of Agriculture in reference to the appointment of valuers, as well as with a view to instituting a more satisfactory mode of carrying out agricultural valuation? I think I am justified in drawing attention to the important references to this mode made by Mr. C. S. Read. I am not dealing with legislative changes; I am merely going to attack the administration of the Act; and the point I wish to dwell upon is this—that in the county of Norfolk the lawyers and valuers and land agents have successfully boycotted the Agricultural Holdings Act; they have paralysed its administration, and have made it null and void, and of no use to the tenants. Mr. Read does not find fault with the Act itself; he does not challenge the wisdom of many of its provisions; but he does find fault with the spirit in which it is carried out, and the way in which the valuers do, in practice, defeat and paralyse the objects of the Act. He gives many striking illustrations of this. For instance, in cases in which the tenant has a right under his lease to sell the hay off his land, when the lease expires and he is going out and he puts in his claim for unexhausted improvements, he is at once met with a counter claim—on a most extravagant basis—for the manorial value of the hay so sold. Mr. Read gives his own experience in this particular. He had the right on one of his farms to sell off the hay, the manorial value of which, according to the ordinary custom of valuation, was £18. But he had a counter claim sent in for £45; and when he drew the attention of the valuers to the fact that he had spent no less than £300 in artificial and other manures during the preceding two or three years they would allow him nothing for that, but insisted on enforcing the counter claim of £45. Mr. Read also described in his speech how he had spent as much as £1,000 on one farm, and when he put in a claim for £57 it was at once met by a counter-claim for £30, afterwards raised to £90. He pointed out that he had converted a wilderness into fruitful fields, and did not expect gratitude, although he did expect even-handed justice; but he could not get a penny of compensation, and was actually a considerable loser on the whole of these transactions through the present system of valuation. An Act which was intended to benefit tenant farmers has been turned into an engine of oppression. Under these circumstances, I think a strong case is made out for an inquiry into the present system of valuation—an inquiry which I trust may lead to the establishment by the Board of Agriculture of something like the system which has been carried out by the Local Government Board with regard to the valuation of property under the Artisans Dwellings Act, namely, the appointment of an official arbitrator or valuer to act for a moderate scale and office fees, and to examine into the whole matter, and decide, in an impartial spirit, the questions in dispute between tenant and landlord. By adopting this course we should get rid of those professional middlemen who have really lived on the vitals of agriculture too long, and have wrung such immense bills of costs out of landlords and tenants, while instituting a system which generally defrauds the tenants, and often defrauds the landlords of part of their just claims. Before I pass from this subject I wish to emphasise the question I put to the right hon. Gentleman; i.e., whether he can see his way to consent to the appointment of a Select Committee, or to some other form of inquiry, into the working of the Agricultural Holdings Act in the matter of valuation, and with a view to instituting a better system from which will be absent the evils complained of by Mr. C. S. Read. Now I come to another matter. Those acquainted with the Agricultural Question must have had their attention drawn by several recent cases in the North of England to the state of the law with regard to mortgaged farms ; and I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman, as the guardian of agricultural interests, whether he will not take these cases into his careful consideration and hold an inquiry, with a view to legislating this Session upon the subject? I have no doubt that the right hon. Gentleman and the House are familiar with the case which recently occurred in Yorkshire (near Doncaster), in which an unfortunate tenant took over a farm and paid £1,500 for the tenant right. He was deceived, whether by the landlord or the agent I do not know, and was told that the farm was not mortgaged, whereas it was. When he decided to leave the farm he gave the proper notice, and obtained an award of £1,000 for his out-going tenant right. But the mortgagees subsequently foreclosed, and actually sold the stock and standing crops off the farm which they cleared, as they had power to do, under the existing law, and the tenant had not a claim for even a farthing against the mortgagees, who had become, in fact, the owners of the farm. That constitutes an obvious state of injustice in the law which I believe——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. CHANNING: This is, perhaps, a matter for legislation, and I am not, therefore, justified in further alluding to it; but having drawn to it the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, I hope he will not let it escape his notice. I will only say, in conclusion, and with regard to the main object with which I spoke, that it is of the utmost importance to the effective carrying out of the principle of the Agricultural Holdings Act—the principle of recognising that tenants who have added to the value of the soil should reap the benefit of what they have done to improve the land—that he should endeavour to secure an improved system of valuation under the Act.

(9.20.) MR. C. W. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I am somewhat surprised to find we have become engaged in an agricultural debate on this Vote. I am sorry we should thus be taking up the time of the House, for I think it is not fair to force our grievances on the House on this occasion, although the temptation to do so is very great. We have had almost every subject connected with agriculture touched upon; but as I think a more convenient opportunity will be found during the Session for discussing these topics, I prefer to-night to confine my remarks to doing what other speakers have done, and that is to congratulate the Government on having formed this Board of Agriculture, and particularly on having put at the head of it a gentleman whose appointment meets with universal approval. The appointment also of Major Craigie to the Statistical Department is, I am sure, equally popular. It is of the utmost importance that agricultural statistics should be thoroughly looked after, and that they should be in the hands of a competent Director. The importance of this has been exemplified recently in connection with the collection of the market prices of corn, and I hope that the supervision of that collection will be one of the duties entrusted to Major Craigie. A year or two ago a Committee sat upstairs for the purpose of finding out whether the Returns were efficiently made; and we found, after examining gentlemen whose duty it had been to make the Returns, that the work was not effectively carried out. The Returns made since last harvest have been very misleading, especially in the matter of the comparisons of quantities of corn sold on the market this year and last. According to the Returns, for instance, the sales of barley since last harvest have been largely in increase of the quantity in the preceding 12 months, although, as practical farmers, we know that the last crop of barley was very deficient. Therefore the statistics are very misleading. The hon. Member for Rugby has suggested that the Ministry of Agriculture should take fox-hunting under its charge; but I think we had better by far get it to deal with questions of much greater importance. Surely hunters and farmers can arrange between themselves any little disputes that may arise. With regard to the question of tenants' compensation, no doubt the Minister will pay attention to the matter; while as to the case of mortgaged farms, if it can be shown that tenants' property has been sacrificed through defects in the existing law, it may be hoped that legislation dealing with it will soon be introduced. The hon. and gallant Member for North Down has asked the right hon. Gentleman to take steps in the direction of securing that cattle brought over to this country from Ireland shall be protected as far as possible from injury. This is a question of the greatest importance. As we in England find corn production no longer profitable—and the growing of wheat at £5 per acre is impossible—we are obliged to change our business, and the only change we can make is to convert arable into pasture land—and in many cases it will be very poor grass we shall get from these pastures. Consequently, we have to depend more and more on stock raising; and it is therefore very important that the British farmers should be able to get store stock from Ireland and other districts in which it is bred placed on his farm in the best possible condition. I do not think this is the time to trot out all our various ideas; so, in conclusion, I will only say I hope that the work of the new Ministry will continue in the same favourable way as it has commenced.

*(9.29.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I also wish to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on what I think is a well-deserved honour, and I assure him that I wish him success in carrying out the duties that will devolve on him in his new office. But I have something else to say. Doubtless the right hon. Gentleman the Minister of Agriculture remembers that in the Daily News of February 4th there appeared a precis of a letter addressed to the editor by an Essex gentleman, in which that gentleman described the hunting that went on in his district, and spoke of there being some 220 or 300 skilled riders.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is travelling quite beyond the question raised by the Amendment.

*MR. PICTON: I bow, Sir, to your ruling, and would merely express a hope that the right hon. Gentleman will do something for the amelioration of the farmers. I might refer him to a letter from Mr. George Baylis in regard to the difficulties with which certain farmers on the borders of Berks have to contend in reference to the payment of tithes. It appears that many of them are unable to pay the 10s. and 11s. per acre, which includes both rent and tithes. That, I think, is a point deserving consideration. There must be some reason why farmers holding very fair land should not be able to pay so small a sum. Of course, he has been told that the burdens imposed on the farmers by the present fiscal system were more than they can bear.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is again entering upon matter which is irrelevant to the subject before the Committee.

*MR. PICTON: I again bow, Sir, to your ruling; but I presume I am in order in asking the Minister of Agriculture to consider in what way he may best improve the position of the cultivators of the land; and in regard to that question I would point out that there is a matter of great importance deserving his careful attention. I allude to the growth of fruit. In the United States of America there is a Department of the Government which distributes statistics relative, amongst other things, to the cultivation of fruit. Last May several cargoes of apples were brought here from the Colony of Tasmania, and they were sold at as much as from 12s. to 20s. a bushel, which is a very good price. It is also stated that a few years ago as large a quantity as one million and a half of barrels of apples were imported from America, while in a more recent year the importation of that fruit from America reached 800,000 barrels. That is an enormous quantity to import into this Kingdom from one country, and I think inquiry should be made into the matter; because if, as is said, we can grow as good or better fruit as can be brought from abroad, our growers must be placed at a considerable disadvantage by the competition thus going on. I am told that near the Land's End there is a small fruit farm which pays a good percentage to the owner; but that is due to the fact that he is the owner of the land on which the fruit is grown. Again, I think the Minister of Agriculture would do well to pay some attention to the ominous words of the hon. Member for Maldon (Mr. C. Gray), when he said that the only alternative for the decreased production of corn was the increased production of meat. Surely other alternatives ought to be possible, and would be so, if our farmers took a more intelligent view of their position. That is an important matter, and well worthy of serious attention. In conclusion, I would merely express my sympathetic hope that the appointment of the right hon. Gentleman, who, from his previous association with agriculture, is exceedingly well qualified for the position he holds, will lead to a more intelligent appreciation of the difficulties which beset the British farmer, and to the consideration of measures whereby his present position may be materially improved.

*(9.38.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): As this is the first occasion on which it has ever been my fortune to defend the Estimates of a Government Department, I hope I may be allowed to refer to the kind expressions which have, without one single exception, been used by hon. Members, no matter in what part of the House they sit, with regard to the appointment which I have the honour to hold. I beg to express my thanks and gratitude to those hon. Members who have spoken so kindly in reference to myself. If the ruling of the Chairman will permit, I should desire to say something in reply to the hon. Member who has just sat down. It is true that the conditions of agriculture have very considerably changed during the last few years. I am as sensible of that change as any Member of this Committee; and although I do not, perhaps, attach quite so much importance to the cultivation of fruit as the hon. Gentleman appears to do. It has engaged my attention, and undoubtedly all those matters are entitled to, and are, in fact, at the present time engaging, the careful consideration of the Board of Agriculture. Fruit cultivation is a matter which we are now considering in connection with the question of agricultural education; but let me give one word of caution on this subject. It must be remembered that the cultivation of fruit depends perhaps more upon climate than upon anything else, and there we stand unquestionably, with the exception of some favoured districts, at a disadvantage as compared with many other countries of the world. The hon. Member said he could not understand why certain land in Berkshire could not afford to pay 10s. an acre for tithe and rent combined, and asked what was the reason. The answer is perfectly simple. The value of land depends upon two things—the quality of the soil and the prices of produce. The answer to the hon. Gentleman's question is that land, unfortunately, is in some cases too bad at the present prices of produce to pay any rent at all. That that is not at all an unknown state of things in this country I know from my experience in connection with a farm, which I consider a fairly good farm, and which used in former times to bring me in a good revenue. It was my misfortune to have to let that farm for no rent at all, rather than have it on my own hands. My hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Sussex asks me to explain that item in the Supplementary Estimate which consists of £500 for collection of additional produce Returns beyond those provided under another sub-head of the same Vote. There is a Return given of the estimated total produce of barley and oats in bushels. It was thought desirable to supplement this Return during the present year by further information of the average weight of the bushel, which varies considerably in different seasons. The collection and tabulation of this Return added to the cost—and it is to cover this that the Supplementary Vote is required. The subject of statistics is under consideration, and, indeed, revision, by the Department, and we hope to make some improvement. My hon. and gallant Friend behind me asked whether the Land Commission was in future to be under the control of the Board of Agriculture. As a matter of fact, the Land Commission at the present moment, by an Act that was passed last Session, is merged altogether in the Board of Agriculture, and as my hon. and gallant Friend perhaps has noticed, at the foot of the Returns is a note to this effect, which I hope will be satisfactory to him—that the additional charges under the Supplementary Estimates will be more than covered by the savings upon the Vote of the Land Commission, which savings amount, notwithstanding the present Supplementary Estimate, to £2,290. I come to the question put to me by the hon. Member for Rugby as to agricultural education. The hon. Gentleman repeated his inquiries, to which I gave him an answer some days ago, with regard to the establishment of a central normal school at Rugby, or in that neighbourhood. That is a matter which the Board of Agriculture have under consideration. I do not know that I can do more on this occasion than repeat practically the answer which I gave to him the other day. The whole subject of agricultural education at the present moment is engaging our careful consideration, for it will be some satisfaction to the hon. Member to learn that the subject is included in that branch of the Department which is at present presided over by Major Craigie. I was only fortunate enough to obtain the services of Major Craigie for the Department a few weeks ago, and it has been impossible, because of the great quantity of other work which has fallen to the Department, to frame a complete scheme of agricultural education at present. I hope, however, that it will be possible to do so before any very considerable period has elapsed. And I can assure the hon. Member for Northamptonshire, who urged upon me to pull hard at the purse strings of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that I shall never be backward in that respect when the interests of agriculture appear to justly demand it; but which of us can pull the harder at the strings only the future can determine. But I am bound to say for my right hon. Friend that I have no cause of complaint of any kind of the way in which he has met me up till now. The hon. Member for the County Down drew my attention to the question of the traffic in animals across the Channel between this country and Ireland. He was kind enough to express his regret that the duties of the Board of Agriculture do not also include the agricultural interests of Ireland. I cannot say that I altogether share in the regret of my hon. Friend, although I thank him for the complimentary and kindly allusions he made to myself. But I may be able to give him some satisfaction by stating that up to the present time the Board of Agriculture and the Irish Government have always been able to work in perfect harmony—a harmony which I trust will continue as long as my right hon. Friend and myself continue to occupy the offices which we do at present. Undoubtedly it is of great importance that there should be complete and harmonious working between the two Governments, because the question to which he called my attention, that of pleuro pneumonia and the effective control of that disease, is undoubtedly of the very first importance, and is a matter which even at the present moment is more than under consideration, for it is one with regard to which I have already prepared a Bill, which I hope to introduce into this House at no distant time, but with regard to which also it is impossible for me on this occasion to give any further information. The hon. Member for Northamptonshire, while expressing satisfaction, which I was exceedingly glad to note, with the policy which I thought fit at the Board of Agriculture to pursue with regard to the importation of foreign animals into this country, and the duty and necessity which fell upon this Board to take reasonable measures to prevent that importation being accompanied by the introduction of foreign disease—the hon. Member, in addition to that question, laid great stress upon the alleged deficiencies of the Agricultural Holdings Act. He called my attention in particular to statements that have been made in relation to that subject.

*MR. CHANNING: The right hon. Gentleman will pardon my interrupting him for a moment. I did not draw attention to the defects of the Agricultural Holdings Act, but to the way in which the present system of valuation is carried out by the valuers, so as to defeat the purposes of the Act.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Quite so; but these valuers are appointed under the Act, and I concluded that the hon. Member's observations reflected upon the Agricultural Holdings Act itself. With regard to the appointment of valuers, that is a question to which, undoubtedly, after the observations of the hon. Member, it will be necessary for the Board of Agriculture to devote the most careful attention. He asked me whether I was willing to agree to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire, I understood him, into this question. I am of opinion, and I always have been, that, probably, in all these matters there is a good deal too much of red tape already, and as far as I am concerned, I entertain the view to-day which I have always entertained, that arrangements of this kind are much better managed by private agreements between the landlord on the one hand and the tenant on the other than they could be by any legislation in the world. This is the first occasion, I confess, that my attention has been called to the necessity of appointing a Select Committee to inquire into this question. I have not had an opportunity of seeing and of considering, with the necessary care, any sufficiently full and accurate report of the statements that were made by Mr. Clare Read some little time ago, and I am somewhat sorry that I have been disappointed of having an interview which I partly expected with Mr. Read, who is an old and valued friend of mine, upon this subject. But I am perfectly willing to admit that it is a matter which deserves careful and thorough consideration, as I attach very considerable importance to anything which falls from Mr. Clare Read on agricultural questions. I am bound to say this also: that, so far as I am acquainted with what did fall from him on the occasion referred to, it seems to me that the difficulties of which Mr. Clare Read complained and the injustice which I understand he alleged is suffered, were owing rather to some old agreements entered into many years ago than to any defects in the law at the present time. My own view of this question, generally speaking, I confess is that in these days, and more especially during the last few years, the tenant farmers, as a rule, have been placed in so advantageous a position, for this purpose at least, that they have been able on all occasions to make almost any agreement that they pleased. Certainly it has been my own experience during the last few years, and I expect that it will have been the general experience of the landlords throughout the country, that where a farm has been in the market for which a tenant has been required the rent has practically been fixed by the tenant and not by the landlord. And if a tenant can fix the amount of his rent, which is by far and away the most important part of his agreement, there is no reason in the world why he cannot fix the other terms in that agreement as well. At the same time, I can promise the hon. Member this: that with regard to the question of valuers which he has raised, it shall receive my most careful consideration; and although I cannot pledge myself to the appointment of a Select Committee, this being the first occasion on which the proposal has been brought to my notice, I can promise him that the whole question which he has raised shall receive the careful attention of the Board of Agriculture. The hon. Member raised another question which is perhaps of even greater importance. He called my attention to the case which occurred in Yorkshire, in the neighbourhood of Doncaster, some two years ago, in which, I believe, it was the fact that the tenant of a farm which had been mortgaged left it for some reason or another, when the mortgagee stepped in and seized the estate. The estate was not sufficient to pay the debts of the landlord, and the general result was that the tenant was turned out of the farm without receiving any compensation whatever, either under the Agricultural Holdings Act or under his agreement with his landlord. The result to him was this: that he had no one from whom to recover compensation except his landlord, who was a bankrupt. I acknowledge that this is also a question of importance and is deserving of great consideration. I remember that I examined into this question when it was first brought under my notice; but I came to no conclusion sufficiently definite to induce me to take action upon it. I have not considered it since I was appointed to this office, and therefore I do not wish to pledge myself to anything definite upon the subject at the present moment. I admit the importance of the matter, and it is a question upon which, before I commit myself to any particular policy with regard to it, I naturally desire to consult the Legal Authorities. It is, however, a question which the hon. Member has not only a right, but is fully justified, in my opinion, in bringing to the notice of the Government, and it is one which I shall be careful to consider. Then I come to the question raised by the hon. Member for Essex, who sits behind me. He referred to the present condition of the Corn Returns. He is not satisfied with them, and he thinks that a very great improvement might be effected in connection with the corn trade. He thinks that the present system in connection with the corn trade is susceptible of great improvement. That system which is in operation is at present carried on by the Board of Trade, and not by the Board of Agriculture, and naturally, although I am glad to be able to agree with him, I do not wish to pass criticism of a hostile character upon the work of a Department other than my own. There is one more question which I approach with some trepidation after your ruling to-night, Mr. Chairman—I mean that which was brought under our notice by the hon. Member for Rugby, who spoke at some length upon it. He put to me a whole list of questions with regard to the future of fox-hunting in this country. I was impressed with one suggestion which bears on the interest of agriculture. The hon. Member suggested that it would be most desirable if, in future, horses and forage could be bought directly of tenant farmers instead of from middlemen and dealers, who prevent the profits from going into the pockets of those whom we desire to have them. I warmly endorse the suggestion. I think it would be the most desirable thing in the world; but it is not a question in which the Board of Agriculture ought to interfere. The hon. Member next dwelt on the damage to fences and crops, and insinuated——

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

*MR. CHAPLIN: To tell the truth I am very glad, Sir, to be relieved from the duty of replying at greater length to the observations of the hon. Gentleman, which are scarcely, I think, within the province of the Department. I hope now that the Supplementary Estimates of the Board of Agriculture will be allowed to pass. I assure hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House that the various suggestions which have been made to me will receive the most careful attention of the new Department of which I am President.

Question put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

(10.3.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I wish, Sir, now to bring back the discussion to its financial aspect, and I have no doubt I shall have the attention of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Board of Agriculture to the matter on which I am about to speak. I intend to move the reduction of the Vote by the whole of the salary of the right hon. Gentleman, and I think I shall be able to show him that my proposal is reasonable and legitimate. I assure the right hon. Gentleman that there is nothing personal in this Amendment, nor do I take this action because the right hon. Gentleman happens to be at this time President of the Board. I have no doubt that he will make just as good a Minister of Agriculture as any other gentleman on that side of the House. But there was a distinct pledge given by the Government, after a good many discussions, as to the appointment of a Minister of Agriculture. Formerly, the duties of this Minister were performed by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, whose office was a purely honorary one. I remember once meeting the late Mr. John Bright during the vacation. I asked him something about his office, and he replied, "Oh, I have not even seen my private secretary for the last four months; there is really nothing to do." It was admitted that there was nothing to do in the office, and the duties now fulfilled by the right hon. Gentleman were added to those of the Chancellor of the Duchy. It was fully understood that when a Minister of Agriculture was appointed, the salary of the Chancellor of the Duchy would be transferred to the office now held by the right hon. Gentleman. But we have still a Chancellor of the Duchy—a very estimable nobleman—and we cannot attack his salary, as it is not in the Estimates. It comes out of the revenues of the Duchy. We are therefore obliged to attack the salary of the right hon. Gentleman himself. I do not expect that right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite are so patriotic as to say they do not want salaries, and I would therefore say to the President of the Board of Agriculture, "Go to the Duke of Rutland. Get your salary from him—get his salary." There was a pledge given to the House that the salary of the Chancellor of the Duchy should be given to the new Minister for Agriculture, and it has not been carried out. I need not refer to the day when that pledge was given, as it must be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman. "Coming events cast their shadows before," and the right hon. Gentleman took a much greater interest in the discussion in the course of which the pledge was given than some of us on this side did. I would urge that the pledge which was given ought to be carried out; and, as a protest against its non-fulfilment, I move the reduction of the Vote by £1,120.

(10.10.) Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Item A, £1,266, Salaries, be reduced by £1,120, part of the Salary of the President.—(Mr. Labouchere.)

The Committee divided:—Ayes 58; Noes 118.—(Div. List, No. 13.)

CLASS III.

7. £9,068, Supplementary for County Courts.

8. £326, Supplementary, for Revising Barristers, England.

9. £3,400, Supplementary, for Reformatory and Industrial Schools, Great Britain.

(10.20.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I desire to call attention to the question of the Reformatory and Industrial School Ships. There are 18 of these vessels, and I wish to draw attention to the absurd and mischievous system of inspection which exists.

THE CHAIRMAN: That subject is outside the scope of this Vote.

*(10.21.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): I desire to point out that the number of children in industrial schools goes on increasing, and I am anxious to know what steps are being taken to press forward the Bill on this matter. I hope some assurance will be given to Members on both sides of the House who served on the Royal Commission that the Government intend on an early day to proceed with the Bill. I would suggest to the Home Secretary whether it would not be better to introduce the Bill in this House rather than in the House of Lords? A Bill on the subject was introduced in the other House last year and went before the Standing Committee on Law, but it was cruelly murdered by its own parents after having been amended, to some extent, by the Committee. I think, as one of the Commissioners, I have a right to urge the Government to pass a Bill. The subject is pressing, as this Vote is increasing from year to year, and there are many reforms needed, such as the substitution, in suitable cases, of the system of boarding out for that of confining children in industrial schools.

(10.23.) THE HOME SECRETARY (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I have this matter very much at heart. I certainly have turned over in my own mind the alternative of bringing in the Bill in this House, but I am convinced that the best plan would be to follow the course of last year and introduce the Bill in the House of Lords. The Bill is quite ready, and will be introduced without delay.

Vote agreed to.

10. £630, Supplementary, for the Register House, Edinburgh.

11. £1,205, Supplementary, for the Crofters' Commission.

(10.25.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I do not think we can fairly object to the items of this Vote; but, before it is agreed to, I should like to take the opportunity of asking that we should have the latest information possible in regard to the condition of the crofters. For my own part, I never shall be satisfied with the way in which the crofter plan has been carried out.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman cannot enter into the general question on this Vote. He can only discuss the supplementary additions.

Vote agreed to.

CLASS IV.

12. £565, Supplementary, for Universities, &c., in Scotland.

CLASS V.

13. £4,000, Supplementary, for Diplomatic Services.

(10.27.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I understand this Vote refers to the abortive mission of the Member for West Birmingham to America.

*(10.28.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): No; the Vote refers to the Maritime Conference held within the last few months at Washington.

*(10.29.) SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I should like to express the appreciation of my constituency, and also that of the other great mercantile centres, of the action of the Government, not only in joining this Conference, but in so ably representing the interests of this country. I may add that I have found from various sources that the great success of that Conference has been in a great measure due to the skill, eloquence, and ability of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, our chief delegate. It was stated before the Conference met that the delegates had no power to bind Her Majesty's Government, and that any proposals could only be dealt with ad referendum. I should like to know whether the Government, before they come to any definite decision on the subject, will give those interested in the great mercantile interests of this country any opportunity of expressing their opinions upon those decisions.

(10.31.) MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I should like to know whether, as the outcome of this Commission, any change is to be made in regard to the rule of the road at sea. I should like also to ask whether the Commission has under its consideration the existing load-line; whether there is any probability of the Conference bringing about an International load-line between this country and America, and other countries; and, also, whether it is the intention of the Government to place in the hands of Members a full Report of the Conference proceedings.

(10.32.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The last thing I would wish to do would be to object to this expenditure. I believe it is expenditure incurred for an excellent purpose. But I hope that before the Vote is passed the President of the Board of Trade will be able to state what is the exact state of the negotiations.

(10.33.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I should like, in the first place, to corroborate all that has been said by my hon. Friend behind me in commendation of the admirable way in which this country has been served by its delegates at this Conference. Too much cannot be said in praise of the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire, who has acted as First Commissioner, and who has been most efficiently assisted by the other delegates. It is especially agreeable to the Government and to the country to observe the attention which has been paid to this Conference by the representatives of all nations, and the recognition of the special knowledge and experience of England in these matters. In reply to the questions addressed to me, I have to say that the Protocols of the Conference have not yet arrived, and it is, therefore, premature to discuss the proceedings. It is certainly desirable that the proceedings should be made public as soon as possible in order that they may be carefully considered by the country before anything is done to carry out the recommendations of the Conference. As to the two questions of the hon. Member for Sunderland, I may say that very few alterations have been proposed in the rule of the road, and I believe it will be possible to adopt them. As to the International load-line, I myself suggested the insertion of that subject among the matters to be considered. It was considered, but I am sorry to say it was found impossible to arrive at any decision on the subject.

14. £10, Supplementary, for Consular Services.

15. £5,030, Supplementary, for Colonies, Grants in Aid.

16. Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a Supplementary sum, not exceeding £23,250, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for certain Charges connected with Bechuanaland, the High Commissioner for South Africa, and other services in South Africa."

(10.37.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I have given notice of a Motion to reduce this Vote by £20,000 in respect of the additional grant in aid to Bechuanaland. The Bechuanaland territory has been an extremely expensive territory to this country. We have already voted this year £70,000 as a grant in aid of it, and now we are asked to vote an additional £20,000. May I ask what is our position with regard to the new Chartered Company? We are told that the revenue of the territory does not come up to the expenditure, and that additional expenditure has been found necessary in consequence of the rise in price of wages, and the heavy cost of the police in the Protectorate. But I understand that the rights and privileges which the Government acquired in that part of Africa have by Charter devolved upon a company. In that case might not the company be called upon to bear the expenses? Why should we be called upon to pay an additional £20,000 for the maintenance of order in the Protectorate? I look with great suspicion and doubt upon the policy of devolving great territory upon Mercantile Companies got up in the City; for I am afraid that through the action of these companies we are led into annexation which is not desired by Parliament or the country. Perhaps the Under Secretary for the Colonies will tell us whether the new Chartered Company has assumed the function which has hitherto been assumed by Her Majesty's Treasury; and, if so, why we are called upon to bear this additional expense? In order that my question may be answered, I beg to move that the Vote be reduced by £20,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That Item D, £20,000, Bechuanaland, be omitted from the proposed Vote."—(Sir George Campbell.)

*(10.40.) THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The hon. Member is in error in supposing that the increased expenditure for the police has any connection, however remote, with the Chartered Company.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: What I suggested was that the Chartered Company was intended to relieve us of the expense.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I do not think it was ever intended that the Chartered Company should relieve us of the expense of the police which has nothing whatever to do with the company. There has been no increase in the number of the police, but the force has proved a great deal more expensive than we expected owing to the great distances to be travelled and to the increase of prices. The reason why it is necessary to have a police force there, I think, I explained to the hon. Member last Session. It is to prevent filibustering on the frontier of our Protectorate. The hon. Member seems to be under the impression that the Chartered Company are doing nothing to relieve us of the burden and expense consequent on the territory in which we have allowed them certain rights. That is not strictly correct. The company are spending out of their own pockets about £60,000 on a telegraph line north of Bechuanaland, and they are constructing at their own expense a railway from Kimberley. It is anticipated that an immediate advantage will accrue not only to British Bechuanaland, but to the advancement of industry in the Protectorate by this action on the part of the company.

Sir G. Campbell

(10.44.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I understand that all the profits which may be derived from the territory have been made over to the Chartered Company. The Under Secretary tells us that the expense which is now proposed to be met by this £20,000 is increased expenditure on the police. What I want explained is, why should not the company bear the expense of the police in the territory, exactly as the East India Company bore the cost of the Army maintained in India.

(10.45.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I think there is involved in this Vote a far more important question than my hon. Friend has raised. I know that Colonel Carrington, who is in charge of the police, has been in Cape Colony, and that recruiting is going on in the Transvaal and the gold fields for 1,000 men to go into this Protectorate. I naturally supposed that this £20,000 was for these new soldiers that Colonel Carrington has been sending there. However, we are told this grant in aid has nothing to do with that, but is necessitated by the extra cost of the police in the Protectorate. Let us understand the position of affairs. Last year we voted £48,000, and the last Report is that there is no filibustering and no crime, that every one at the gold fields is rich, and there is no trouble. During the present year we have increased the grant from £48,000 to £70,000, and now we are asked for £20,000 in addition. The whole of this sum is to be spent on the police. You have got a declining revenue—your revenue is going down every year because your land sales are going down. Why is that, and why is this colony one of the biggest disgraces we have ever had? In this grand colony of Bechuanaland there is no church and no clergyman. Your officers have been appealing to you to get them a church and a clergyman; and in this huge territory, twice as big as this country, there are only two medical men. The people appeal to you for more medical officers. They appeal to you for education. There is not one school for white children in the whole country. Last year I brought the matter before the House and pressed the Government to do something, and a month or six weeks ago the High Commissioner, Sir Hercules Robinson, in a letter to the Times, entreated of the Treasury to do something. The condition of the colony is a disgrace to the Treasury. Under your fostering care the population is lessening and the revenue is declining. I wish hon. Members who are fond of annexation would read the Report sent home by our officials out there, for it will put them to shame if anything can. You are there told that in one village with 6,000 inhabitants, people are dying at the rate of 10 per day. If we had handed the colony to the Cape they might have done something with it. The last Report showed that £105,000 had been spent. Of that £80,000 was spent on the police and £25,000 spent for all other purposes! Now, I wish to know why Colonel Carrington wants 1,000 more men. Why has he been down in Cape Colony picking up recruits and promising them large salaries? Do you want with these men to attack Lobengula, the King of the Matabeles? It seems to me that the present policy is to force the Matabeles into war. The Bechuanaland Protectorate embraces a portion of the Matabeleland territory. We claim that territory because some time ago King Lobengula made a Treaty of friendship with John Moffatt. What is there in that Treaty to give you any right to determine any question with reference to Matabeleland? No rights or privileges in that country have been conferred on the Chartered Company, and if they want possession of Lobengula's territory they will have to fight for it. There is no doubt that the 1,000 men Colonel Carrington is recruiting are the men intended to fight the Matabeles and get mineral rights for the company which Mr. Rhodes is running.

THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see how this arises out of this Vote.

DR. CLARK: Certainly, because this money is for police, and these police are like the Irish Police—a military force.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member is in error. The police who are being recruited are the police of the company. There is no charge whatever on the Estimate for them.

DR. CLARK: Then why is Colonel Carrington, who is the Chief of the Police, recruiting these filibusters? We want definite information. If these men are not for the Bechuanaland Police, I want to know why the gentleman whom we pay very highly and who is at the head of the Bechuanaland Police should be the recruiting officer for the new company?

*(10.55.) BARON H. DE WORMS: I am not prepared to admit that Colonel Carrington is the recruiting officer for the police; the only statement to that effect that I have heard is that of the hon. Member himself. What I stated was that the police, to whom the hon. Member refers as being recruited, are not for Her Majesty's Government, and have nothing to do with them. The hon. Member was in the House the other day when I entered fully into the merits of the Charter. I then explained that the British South Africa Company are raising 500 police for the purpose of maintaining law and order within the districts over which they have certain rights. [Dr. CLARK: What rights?] I do not think that the rights of the Chartered Company can possibly arise in the discussion of a Vote for the Bechuanaland Police, and I should be out of order if I discussed now the policy with respect to Matabeleland and the position of the Chartered Company. With respect to the raid which has been referred to, we have an assurance from the President of the Transvaal that there is no truth in the report that any is contemplated, and the hon. Member, from his official position in relation to the Transvaal Government, ought to be in possession of information to that effect. In reply to the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy, I have to repeat that we have not increased the number of police, but the increased expenditure is owing to the fact that provisions are much dearer owing to the drought. We have moved the police further north, and thus, being further from their base, the cost of maintenance has increased.

(11.0.) DR. CLARK: Is it not the case that these police are engaged in the territory over which the company exercise their rights and privileges? Is it not the case that they are stationed north of the Molopo river and outside the colony of Bechuanaland?

(11.1.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: The statement of the Under Secretary for the Colonies makes explanation more necessary than ever. We are constituting a police force, for which we are asked to pay, and at the same time this Chartered Company is also raising a police force for the same country, for which they are to pay. Where is the line drawn between the functions of these two bodies of police? It is the police of the Chartered Company which is responsible for keeping the peace, and, I suppose, for making war in that territory; but how can you draw a line between the functions of the Government police and the police of the Chartered Company?

*(11.2.) BARON H. DE WORMS: These police will not be in that district. The police of the company will be far beyond the frontier where our police are. The police of the company are for the purpose of maintaining law and order in the territory over which the company exercise certain control and have certain rights. Our police are stationed on the frontier of our Protectorate to prevent the operations of filibustering expeditions there.

*(11.3.) SIR R. FOWLER (London): I think the Under Secretary has made it very clear that these police are to be stationed within our own territory, and that what goes on beyond is matter for the Chartered Company, and not relevant to the present discussion. The hon. Gentleman opposite began by complaining that we did not do enough for this settlement. There were, he said, no surgeons and no clergymen there. I do not, from what I know of the views of hon. Gentlemen opposite, suppose that the hon. Member means to suggest that the Government should send out clergymen, but I hope, at all events, he will support an increase of surgeons. I think we have just cause to look with satisfaction upon what has been done in Bechuanaland. I remember in former years how the late Mr. W. E. Forster earnestly advocated something of this kind. The policy the Government have pursued is in accordance with that of the statesmen I have mentioned, and has been productive, I think, of great good. I think the House should look in no niggardly spirit on any demands Her Majesty's Government may make towards carrying out their policy there, and in maintenance of our interests in South Africa.

(11.5.) DR. CLARK: What are really the facts of the case? They seem very difficult to get at. These police are to be found far beyond the Bechuanaland frontier. You can meet them in the country of Bamangwato, in Mashonaland, in the country of the Moslikatzes, in native territories far north of the Molopo River, between that river and the Zambesi, all coming within the control of this company. This amount of £20,000 is, in my opinion, for the services of these police who are in this territory now, without the colony—without the protected territory. I am glad the Under Secretary is content with the proper proclamations, but if he had occupied his present position some six years ago, when Bechuanaland was in pretty much the same position it is in now, he would know that exactly similar proclamations were issued then as now, notwithstanding which people did cross the frontier, and there was fighting in consequence. Every one who reads the South African Papers knows that Colonel Carrington is getting together his new recruits, and that when he has completed his force he will go into Matabeleland. There he will probably meet with a hostile reception, and we shall be asked to send a military force to support him. We shall probably have a war before the year is out. Now, Mr. Bowler is an Englishman having a large interest in Mashonaland, and he claims to have received some concession from the Mashonas for giving assistance to them. These are the most industrious and peaceful among these South African peoples, while the Matabeles are the most warlike. Now that Lobengula cannot send his young men across the Molopo he will send them to make raids on the Mashonas. Mr. Bowler has organised a force for the protection of the Mashonas, and we shall have trouble, all President Kruger's proclamations notwithstanding. If I were in the Transvaal I would do as I thought proper so far as President Kruger is concerned. Paper proclamations have never stopped these inter-tribal wars in South Africa, which always end in the acquisition of territory by the white men who take part in the wars. By a treaty, which is merely a treaty of friendship, and more a personal treaty than anything else, between the father of the present King and the late Dr. Moffatt, the father of John Moffatt, who was on terms of intimate friendship with the King, giving his name to the King's son—by this treaty and on this shadowy foundation you put forward claims to territory in Matabeleland and Mashonaland. Lobengula is sure to resist. War will arise in which freebooters will take part on one side legalised by us, or the other side not legalised by the Transvaal. Who is to step in and take command? In Mashonaland and Matabeleland we shall have a repetition of those terrible scenes of bloodshed that disgraced South African Administration six or seven years ago. Instead of this Chartered Company solving the problem in South Africa, it makes the problem more difficult, and you are legalising filibustering some 500 miles from where it went on six or seven years ago.

*(11.10.) BARON H. DE WORMS: Perhaps I might shorten the discussion by dispelling some errors into which the hon. Gentleman seems to have fallen. He seems to think that the police force is intended to protect the new territory of the company, but, as a matter of fact, the police force was augmented last year or the year before, before the Chartered Company was thought of. The force is not intended to protect the interests of the company. The hon. Gentleman has advocated the claims of Mr. Bowler, but it is alleged that this raid into Mashonaland has been instigated by Mr. Bowler, who thinks he has a concession from the Mashonas and wishes to enforce it. It has nothing whatever to do with the Chartered Company nor with Her Majesty's Government. We have received a telegram from President Kruger disclaiming any participation in Mr. Bowler's proceedings. I do not think, Sir, this Committee should be made the medium of pushing the interest of individuals or companies. I say, again, this raid into Mashonaland has nothing to do with the action of the Transvaal Republic.

(11.12.) COMMANDER BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): I should like to remind the Committee that we, having established a Protectorate, are bound to take measures to protect our interests and prevent filibustering expeditions being pushed forward. I think the hon. Member for Caithness always takes a pessimistic view of affairs, and that he has exaggerated the evils that do exist.

The fact of Her Majesty's Government not having taken sufficient steps to provide schools and other advantages for the settlers is no argument for making matters worse by not having a sufficient number of police. But in regard to the increase in expenditure, I may, perhaps, remind the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy that it would be hardly fair to this company—the policy of which I personally do not approve, I dislike these big companies—it would not be fair to place the original expenditure for police on the shoulders of the company in the very genesis of its existence. These are old troubles existing on our borders. It is true the company has been started to take up a position outside our protectorate, but it would be unfair to put upon the company straight away the burden of these troubles. What may be the case in the future when the company has more power is another matter. A distinction must be drawn between the original police to protect our own borders, and the police the company have a right to raise for the territory within which they have some sort of rule. As I understand, that is what the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy wished to get from the Under Secretary when he asked why the company did not take over the police duties. The answer is it would be unfair to require the company to do so now, though the company may do so in the future.

*(11.15.) SIR G. CAMPBELL: I acknowledge the hon. and gallant Member has put the case much more clearly than the Under Secretary did. It is acknowledged that the police are employed in the territory this company now occupies. I cannot help thinking the hon. Baronet the Member for the City confused the House by his reference to British territory, not drawing a distinction between British Bechuanaland and the protected territory beyond. As the hon. and gallant Gentleman has explained, that is the scene of the operations of the new company, which I do not like, and as to which it is argued that it would be hard to put the burden of the police on the company in the earliest days of their occupation, though, in time, the company might be required to undertake it. I shall be glad if the Government accept this explanation, and say this is only a temporary charge. We say

£90,000 a year for Bechuanaland; that is not the mere bagatelle the hon. Baronet (Sir R. Fowler) seems to think it is. Why, a great deal is thought of an expenditure of £10,000 for the relief of crofters, in Scotland, and we are told the country cannot afford this or that, and yet here is £90,000 a year spent for the administration of this miserable territory in South Africa, and to maintain order among a number of wretched African tribes. I admit the hon. and gallant Gentleman's explanation has put a better face on the matter, but I must ask the Committee to disallow this £20,000.

*(11.18.) SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): There is one misconception hon. Members are under. It is a question of time, not of place, that is under discussion. The protectorate had to be arranged, and this £20,000 is required for preserving order in this territory, which is now under the control of the Imperial Government, but which is to pass under the control of the Chartered Company.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: Has it not passed?

*SIR G. BADEN-POWELL: I do not know the present position. It is to pass. The great expenditure from year to year on Bechuanaland is for the extension of the Protectorate, not for the Colony, and when this Protectorate passes under the control of the Chartered Company these extra charges, especially that for police, will cease to appear on the Estimates, and will fall upon the Chartered Company. I am convinced that this company will respect all the rights and interests of the natives quite as much as the Imperial Government. When the hon. Member for Caithness speaks of Colonel Carrington recruiting soldiers for filibustering expeditions into the country of the Matabeles, I may point out that any recruiting that is carried on is not for filibustering expeditions nor is it by Colonel Carrington, but by agents of the great Chartered Company, with a view of having a supply of reserve men should any emergency occur. We know that filibusters do exist in Mashonaland, Matabeleland, and all the territory along the Zambesi, and that in protecting its own interests, and that of the natives, the Company may have to control these filibusters by force.

(11.20.) MR. LABOUCHERE: We are gradually getting information, but every hon. Member on the other side gives another reason, and, as he thinks, a better reason, for the Vote than that offered by the Under Secretary. I can only say that if these reasons are correct, then the right hon. Gentleman at the commencement of this debate must have been signally ignorant of matters connected with Bechuanaland and this great Chartered Company. We are asked to vote an extra £20,000 for police for what is called Bechuanaland, and at the head of the police is a certain Colonel Carrington. It is admitted—it is openly stated in all the Cape papers—that Colonel Carrington is recruiting police for this Chartered Company. The hon. Gentleman just now told us the recruiting is not carried on directly by Colonel Carrington, but is in some sort of way aided by Colonel Carrington, which is nearly the same thing. Now, the Under Secretary has protested against my hon. Friend advocating, as he said, the claims of an individual, and yet the hon. Member (Sir G. Baden-Powell) finished his speech by a puff, which I might almost call indecent, of this Chartered Company. Now, what is this Chartered Company? You will be surprised to hear, Mr. Courtney, that it consists of seven individuals, two of them the noble Dukes of Fife and Abercorn——

THE CHAIRMAN: This is travelling outside the limits of the discussion.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then, Mr. Courtney, I will say that the hon. Member for Holderness Division said we ought to incur a certain burden for this Chartered Company because this company would do so much good afterwards. Why, Sir, this Chartered Company subscribed a million sterling, and could at this moment raise four millions per annum.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will not go into that. At any rate, we may clearly understand, not from the Under Secretary, whom I do not blame personally, because Under Secretaries in his position usually know less about the Colonies than anybody else, but from those hon. Members whose knowledge of what they talk about we admit, that this sum of £20,000 is an expenditure being incurred for this Chartered Company, that it is expenditure which but for this company would not have been incurred, and that this very company could raise four millions sterling. I hope my hon. Friend will persevere with his Motion and divide against the Vote.

(11.23.) DR. CLARK: We are getting nearer the facts. At first we were told there were no police in this territory, but now we are informed that for a certain time the police are there, and that the expense will, after a time, fall upon the company. Then we have been told—and that I knew long ago—that reserves are being massed to meet certain eventualities. Now, I want to know, will the Government protect the Mashonas from the incursions of the Matabeles, and if war arises between the Matabeles and filibusters which will you support? Although the names of the Duke of Fife and the Duke of Abercorn are prominently put forward, the real meaning is that Mr. Rhodes wishes to enforce the concession he claims from the Matabeles. I remember that the hon. Member for Lichfield showed that he holds that concession, and 20 years ago worked for gold under it. Lobengula has since repudiated the concession claimed by Mr. Rhodes.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I would ask you, Sir, if this is really relevant to the Vote?

THE CHAIRMAN: The Under Secretary stated several times that the police were required to go outside the territory.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Not into Lobengula's territory.

DR. CLARK: Lobengula claims it as his country, and sends his warriors to make raids there. The condition of things is that the whole country is in a state of fermentation, and I say that if the company's filibusters try to force their way, bloodshed will result, and I ask are you going to protect the Matabele King in the war that may arise? The right hon. Gentleman accuses me of advocating the claims of Mr. Bowler, but I do nothing of the kind. I neither want to grind Mr. Bowler's axe or Mr. Rhodes' axe. Of the two, perhaps, I should prefer to grind Mr. Rhodes' axe.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have no information dealing with the matter the hon. Member raises, and I cannot say what the action of Her Majesty's Government would be under hypothetical circumstances, and which have no foundation except in the fertile imagination of the hon. Member.

(11.25.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The circumstances now remind me strongly of the condition of things some 14 or 15 years ago, when the Government refused to listen to us on South African affairs, and the House was impatient of discussion. But following this, and in a great measure because of the impatience of the House and the refusal of the Government, came the Boer War and the Zulu War, in the one of which we suffered considerable loss of prestige, and in the other heavy loss of life: I ask the Government not to attempt to cut short this debate, but to allow it to be adjourned, as the subject is one of great consequence. The Duke of Wellington once told us to beware of little wars, and I venture to think that we are laying the foundation for a very expensive little war in South Africa. We ought, therefore, to have more time to discuss the matter.

(11.32.) DR. CLARK: I will now ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whom I see in his place, if we are going to make a treaty of friendship with the Matabelele King? The Chartered Company are now enlisting recruits; are we going to protect Matabelele against these filibusters? I remember that when it was once suggested to Lobengula that if he loved his country he would kill all the white men, he made the diplomatic reply—

“If you will kill all the white men at the Diamond Fields and Cape Town, and then come to me, I will hand all the white men in my territory over to you to be killed.”

I can assure you recent occurrences have excited strong feeling in Swaziland. Now, I want to know, will the Government support the Matabelele King or will they legalise the acts of the filibusters who intend to attack him?

(11.35.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 79; Noes 143.—(Div. List, No. 14.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(11.45.) SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: There is another item on which I should like some information, and that is, as to the sum of £2,700 for defraying certain expenses in connection with Swaziland? I hope the Government will tell us something about the matter.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Gentleman must be aware I stated the other evening that it is utterly impossible to give the House any information upon this subject. Sir Francis De Winton's Report has not yet been considered by the Government, and therefore I cannot go into details.

DR. CLARK: Will the House be given an opportunity of discussing the Report, supposing this estimate is passed?

SIR R. FOWLER: I believe that the hon. Member for Liverpool has secured an early Tuesday in March for the discussion of the subject of Swaziland. That occasion will supply the opportunity which the hon. Member desires.

MR. BAUMANN: Will the Government undertake to lay Sir F. De Winton's Report on the Table before the date fixed for the discussion of the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool? The House, I hold, is entitled to see the Report before that debate, and I also think the Colonial Office should not come to a decision on the question until we have had an opportunity of discussing it.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: As I have said before, it is obviously impossible for the Government to submit the decision of this question to the House. The Papers will be presented by the Government as soon as possible after the decision has been arrived at.

MR. BRYCE: When may we expect to have the Report in our hands?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The Government regard the subject as one of considerable importance. As soon as it becomes possible for the Government to take the House into their confidence they will certainly do so. The Report has not yet reached the Government. I myself have not seen it. Therefore it is impossible to give any precise promise as to the date on which information will be given, but it will undoubtedly be given as soon as possible.

SIR W. BARTHELOT (SUSSEX, N.W.): The country feels exceedingly strong on this question of Swaziland, and upon the way in which it may be decided. I hope the Government will take no steps in the direction of giving up Swaziland, but if they contemplate such steps they ought certainly to give the country some opportunity of expressing its views.

*SIR G. CAMPBELL: I should be very glad to know that we may with honour and safety be relieved of the great difficulties attending the retention of Swaziland. Have I rightly understood the Under Secretary for the Colonies to say that the House will not be given an opportunity of discussing the matter before it is settled? My information differs somewhat from that of the hon. and gallant Member opposite, and as we have given up the territory surrounding Swaziland, I think we might give up the country also.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: This is pre-eminently one of those questions with regard to which the Government must act on their own responsibility. If they act wrongly it is for the House to censure them. It is obviously impossible for us to submit our policy on a matter of this kind to the House of Commons. The Government are alone responsible for the conduct of such affairs, and the House cannot take matters of this kind into its own hands.

(11.49.) MR. BRYCE: I think the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House has not quite appreciated the point of my hon. Friend's question. The hon. Member for Liverpool has given a notice of Motion on the subject, and at present the Under Secretary for the Colonies refuses to express any opinion, on the ground that the Report of Sir Francis de Winton has not been considered. The right hon. Gentleman tells us the Government alone must bear the responsibility. That we admit. But the fact remains that many Members opposite, like those on my own side of the House, wish to have the opportunity of discussing this subject. We do not ask the Government to follow the opinion which the House may express. I hope the Government will not endeavour to prevent the House from having all the information before it, so as to enable it to make up its mind. Surely an expression of the views of the House ought to be welcomed by the Government.

*(11.51.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The hon. Gentleman has taken an erroneous view of what I said. As soon as the Government have considered the Papers, they will, at the earliest possible moment give full information to the House, which will have an opportunity to express an opinion on the course taken by the Government. But the Government must come to their decision first.

(11.52.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, E.): Will the Government agree not to come to a final decision about Swaziland until the hon. Member for Liverpool has brought forward his Motion? I can give a precedent for this. In the year 1884, when negotiations were going on between this country and Portugal with regard to the Congo, a Motion was brought forward in the House; it was discussed before the negotiations were completed, and the result of the discussion was a promise by the then First Lord of the Treasury that the Treaty should not be ratified without the consent of the House of Commons.

*(11.53.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I wish to treat the House with all possible respect. Hon. Members will see that we are obliged to come to a decision before Papers are presented. If afterwards the House takes a different view from that at which the Government arrive, it will be in the power of the House to express an opinion adverse to the decision of the Government.

(11.54.) Question put, and agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

CLASS VI.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a supplementary sum, not exceeding £8,101, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1890, for superannuation and retired allowances."

(11.55.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I see that, in connection with the Supreme Court of Judicature, five gentlemen have retired, and provision is to be made for them. Is it not extraordinary that such cases as these should appear in the Supplementary Estimates? The Government must have been perfectly well aware at the beginning of the year of the ages of these gentlemen. What is the explanation of these being dealt with in this Estimate? Is it because some arrangements for the re-organisation of the Service are being carried out?

*(11.56.) MR. W. L. JACKSON: The hon. Member has exactly stated the facts of the case. There has been a re-organisation and a re-arrangement under which certain taxing masters have retired, and considerable economies have been effected. Under the system which now obtains, it is not possible for us to make provision for any superannuations which occur after the accounts have been made up, and, as hon. Gentlemen are aware, the 30th September in each year is the date for making up the accounts, on which the Estimates for the following year are framed. Sometimes it happens that the pensions which fall out equal in amount the new ones, but, unless the House of Commons will entrust the Treasury with a round sum with which to meet contingencies, these items in the Supplementary Estimates cannot be avoided.

(11.59.) MR. A. O'CONNOR: How is it that the names of some gentlemen who have retired do not appear in any of the Estimates?

MR. JACKSON: I know of no such cases; but if the hon. Gentleman will give me names I will make inquiry.

(12.0.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The working classes of this country are often lectured for their want of forethought in providing for old age; and I think they are entitled to ask how it is that these gentlemen who have received high salaries for many years are granted these large annuities on retiring? Surely if a man is well paid he ought himself to make provision for his old age.

It being Midnight, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolutions to be reported to-morrow; Committee also report Progress to sit again to-morrow.

TOWN HOLDINGS.

COLONEL NOLAN : I have to move the Motion which stands in my name on the Paper, namely—

“That the Committee on Town Holdings be re-appointed to inquire into that portion of the original reference to the Committee which the Committee was precluded by want of time from reporting on last Session—namely, ‘into the question of imposing a direct assessment on the owners of ground rents and on the owners of increased values imparted to land by building operations or other improvements.’”

I hope the right hon. Gentleman will grant this inquiry, as it is really a matter of great importance to the parties interested?

*MR. W. H. SMITH : I think it only fair that the Committee asked for should be appointed, and therefore I make no objection to the Motion.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered—

“That the Committee on Town Holdings be re-appointed to inquire into that portion of the original reference to the Committee which the Committee was precluded by want of time from reporting on last Session, namely, ‘into the question of imposing a direct assessment on the owners of ground rents and on the owners of increased values imparted to land by building operations or other improvements.’”—(Colonel Nolan.)

LAND PURCHASE (IRELAND) BILL.

On the Motion for adjournment—

MR. SEXTON : I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland if there is any particular reason why he has further postponed the introduction of the Land Purchase (Ireland) Bill, which has been on the Paper for some time, until Monday next; and whether he intends to introduce the Bill on that day?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The Bill referred to by the hon. Member is an important Bill, and certainly will not be introduced on any night on which it cannot be made the chief business. It cannot be introduced on Monday next. The Government have been given to understand that it would not be convenient to Irish Members that any important Irish measures should be taken this week.

MR. SEXTON : Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to ask him whether he intends to name an early day for the introduction of the measure?

*MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The Land Purchase Bill is the first important Bill which the Government have set down for this Session, and it will be introduced as soon as the exigencies of public business will permit.

House adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 26th February, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

IRELAND—THE CLONGOREY
ARRESTS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Monday last 12 policemen at Clongorey turned four workmen out of Mrs. Kelly's premises; whether, when clearing the premises, the constable in charge used the following words:—"We have dangerous weapons, and must use them even to shoot;" and whether instructions have been given to the police to shoot; whether he is also aware that on the following day (Tuesday) armed emergency men entered Mr. Kelly's yard, and refused to leave, though requested by the owner to do so; whether the police in charge, instead of protecting the women, arrested eight workmen who were engaged on the premises; and whether he can state by what authority emergency men, armed or unarmed, can enter upon premises in the legal possession of the owner?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Constabulary Authorities report that on Monday 10 policemen turned three persons out of Mrs. Kelly's premises. The allegation in the second paragraph has no foundation. Paragraphs 3, 4, and 5 being down without previous notice, time has not admitted of my obtaining a local Report.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman contended that the police were entitled to use violence because they anticipated that the precept would be disobeyed? I also desire to know whether the right hon. Gentleman has ascertained that the precept was not duly served upon either the occupier or the workmen, and that the whole of the arrests were illegal; and whether he has discovered since the debate that the police in breaking into the dwelling-house acted without a warrant, and that, consequently, their action was in the nature of a burglarious entry?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no ground for believing that the action of the police in making the arrests was illegal. As the hon. Member's last question relates to a point of law, perhaps he will place it on the Paper, and address it to my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I wish to ask the Financial Secretary to the Treasury to state whether a Vote on Account will be taken this week?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): My right hon. Friend the Leader of the House has been given to understand that it would be for the convenience of Members generally if the Vote on Account were taken on Friday. It will, therefore, be taken on that day.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg to give notice that when it is taken I will move a reduction, with a view to calling attention to a grave public scandal in the administration of justice in England.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I give notice that on the same occasion I will raise a discussion as to the conduct of the police at the Clongorey evictions.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

POOR LAW GUARDIANS (IRELAND)
BILL.—(No. 22.)

(12.37.) Order for Second Reading read.

MR. FOLEY (Connemara): In moving the Second Reading of this Bill I should state that it is substantially the same as a measure of a similar character which has been before the House Session after Session for the last 15 years, and therefore ought not to require very much from me in the way of explanation. On several previous occasions the Bill has passed its Second Reading stage in this House with, I believe, a considerable majority; and on one of those occasions, which, if my memory serves me rightly, was in the year 1885, it not only passed a Third Reading in this Assembly, but also went through its different stages in the House of Lords, and was passed with only slight alterations. I am sorry to say, however, that on that occasion it came back to this House at too late a period of the Session to be re-considered, and consequently failed to receive that assent which was necessary to render it effective. I trust, therefore, that under these circumstances, and taking into consideration the fact that on one or two occasions when the Bill was before this House some of the supporters of the present Government actually assisted in promoting the Second Reading of the measure, the House will think there ought to be no difficulty whatever in accepting it in the form in which it stands to-day. The alterations or amendments which the Bill proposes to make in the Poor Law of Ireland as it at present exists are restricted to two or three matters which we, who are its promoters, consider would be improvements on the present system. With the permission of the House I will state what the proposed alterations are. In the first place, instead of the open voting which prevails under the existing arrangement, the Bill proposes to substitute voting by ballot. Taking into consideration the success which has attended the adoption of the ballot in Parliamentary elections, there is hardly a Member of this House who would be disposed to return to the system of open voting, as formerly practised: and I trust, therefore, that no one will be found to object to the amendment of the present law as proposed by this measure in regard to that particular question. The next important feature of the Bill is the proposal to abolish the system which now appertains in Irish Poor Law elections of voting by proxy. Sir, this method of voting by proxy has been the cause of great trouble in Ireland. It has been the means of enabling individuals who have neglected their duties as landlords on their own estates to send batches of proxies to such persons as they might have felt disposed to select, and thereby to swamp the votes of the resident electors, in which endeavour, but for these proxies, it would have been impossible for them to have succeeded. At the same time, I am bound to say that I have heard and read with considerable astonishment that whenever a job was to be perpetrated in any of the Irish unions, those gentlemen who are so anxious at other times to be relieved of the duty of personal voting have been known to travel hundreds of miles, and in some cases even thousands, in order to assist in the accomplishment of the jobbery, whether it has been the bestowal of a contract or the appointment of some one who has been nominated for a particular situation. I trust, therefore, that by passing this Bill the House will compel those who, under such circumstances, take so much trouble to attain the object they have in view, to present themselves at the poll like ordinary electors and to vote in the ordinary way. The next important improvement proposed by this Bill is that the proportion of ex officio Guardians shall be reduced to one-third of the number of elected candidates. I think, Sir, there are very few Members of this House, who are disposed to deal fairly with the mode of ensuring the proper execution of the work which has to be performed by Boards of Guardians in Ireland, who will feel inclined to oppose this Amendment. At the present moment the law enables those gentlemen who exercise their right of sending in proxies to give in some cases as many as 36 votes. I, for one, am of opinion that they ought to be satisfied with the power they now have as voters without insisting on their claim to such a multiplicity of votes. Their position under the present law enables them to hold half the seats on each Board of Guardians. This Bill, however, proposes that instead of their monopolising one-half of each Board the proportion shall be reduced to one-third. I trust hon. Gentlemen opposite will see that in promoting this measure hon. Members on this side of the House have not deemed it necessary to go to extremes: and this being so, I sincerely hope they will not oppose the Second Reading of this measure. I beg, Sir, to move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.47.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of seconding the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Connemara, and in doing so I desire to draw attention to the fact that this Bill, as well as others that have been introduced by hon. Members on this side of the House, may be described, in the language of an hon. and gallant Member on the opposite Benches, as a "hardy annual," although it may sometimes have been nipped in the bud, as was the case last year and the year before. It fared somewhat better, however, on several previous occasions, when it received a kindly hearing from the right hon. Gentleman who now sits on the Front Opposition Bench during his term of office in connection with Ireland. Not only did it receive his support on that occasion, but it passed its Second Reading in this House and was put through Committee. In the following year the same Government, but with a different officer as far as Ireland is concerned, gave the measure a generous consideration, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell Bannerman) said the Government regarded this Bill with a sort of benevolent feeling. On that occasion the Bill had the good luck of passing through its several stages in this House and of being sent to another place. It came back, however, as usual, so mutilated that it could not be accepted by hon. Members from Ireland, and so late in the Session as to preclude any attempt to alter or amend the provisions made in the other House. Now, Sir, we are curious to know what is the attitude of the present Government in regard to this Bill. Noble Lords and hon. and gallant Gentlemen on the other side of the House have discussed this question on previous occasions, and have marked the Bill with the impression of their energy and zeal. They have altered it in accordance with their views, and in the form in which it has been so amended it is now presented to this House. We are, therefore, very curious to know what reception the Government will give it on this occasion; and whether they will receive it, as it was received by the Liberal Government in the past, in a kindly spirit; or whether they mean to oppose it, as they seem to be disposed to oppose all measures that have for their object the curtailment of undue powers placed in the hands of their friends the landlords of Ireland. I should here state that one of the first provisions of the Bill proposes to retain in the hands of the Local Government Board of Ireland its present powers. We have no desire to destroy those powers, and have never done ought in respect of that body except in so far as we have endeavoured to reform its character and its personnel. We know that at some future time, which we hope is not far distant, Members for Ireland will have a greater voice in the selection of the personnel of that Board, and we have confidence in it, knowing that the time will soon come when we may have much more confidence. We are willing to leave to it that power which may be necessary to restrict and curtail, if necessary, the undue use of the powers of the Boards of Guardians. We are not at all afraid of extending the power of the Guardians in Ireland, and why? Because the history of those bodies is such as to inspire the greatest confidence in the minds of the Irish people. There are 127 Boards of Guardians in Ireland, and, except on one recent occasion, the Local Government Board have not felt it necessary to suppress one of those bodies. Many years ago the Mill Street Board of Guardians was suppressed, but at that time its affairs were conducted, and its meetings attended, mainly by the ex officio Guardians, who so mismanaged their business that the Local Government Board were obliged to suppress them for a time. Recently, also, in the town of Dungarvan it was found necessary to suppress the Board of Guardians because of the mismanagement of its affairs. True it is that other Boards have been suppressed, but not for mismanagement. They have been suppressed for political reasons. The Boards of Guardians in Wexford, Wicklow, and New Ross were suppressed because they provided, according to the powers they possessed, the necessary accommodation for evicted tenants because they set apart wards in their establishments for the purpose of providing for the comfortable housing of evicted tenants. Very recently the Cork Board of Guardians was suppressed, and no one here will deny that it was suppressed on purely political grounds.

Therefore I say that the history of the Poor Law Boards in Ireland, since their establishment and down to the present moment, has been such as to encourage us in the hope that it will be useful and safe to extend their powers and make them, if possible, more popular than they are at present. The next important provision of this Bill is the extension of the ballot to the system under which Poor Law Guardians are now elected. I am quite certain that even hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House, if they will vote in accordance with their convictions, will make no objection to this Bill on account of the Ballot Clause. The Ballot Act since its passing has been a great success both in England and Ireland. I am sure it will not be denied, even by hon. Members on the other side of the House, that in no part of these Kingdoms has that Act been so great a success as it has been in Ireland. Certainly in no part of the Kingdom was there so much necessity for the adoption of that Act as existed in Ireland, where the landlord and his agents, together with the bailiffs and understrappers, all combined for the purpose of intimidating the electors into voting for the landlords' nominees.

An hon. MEMBER: What of the priests?

MR. J. O'CONNOR: An hon. Member opposite makes use of the word priests, and I hope he will allow me to point out to him that, whatever may have been the power of the priests, the Ballot Act has from the commencement been successful in its operation. Therefore, if any tyranny could have come from that quarter, the Ballot Act has proved a sufficient remedy. I have also to point out that as in the old Parliamentary elections it was necessary for the people if they desired to vote according to their political convictions, to fly in the face of their landlords, to brook the danger of such a proceeding, and thus place themselves at the mercy of the understrappers, so also it is necessary at the present day to protect the voters at the elections of Poor Law Guardians against the influence of landlords and their agents. It often happens that those elections at the present time are conducted on local party lines, and very often a little on national principles, and the landlords and their agents, because they wish to sustain the present régime as long as possible, put forth all their powers to intimidate electors against voting according to their convictions. Therefore, I hold that if it were necessary in the past to protect the Parliamentary voter against the undue influence of the landlord and his employes, it is equally necessary at the present day to protect the voter under the Poor Law system. The next important provision of this Bill is that which proposes to abolish voting by proxy: this is, and has been, a very vexed question in Ireland. I remember some years ago having been engaged in a Poor Law Guardians' election. On that occasion, I walked from house to house with a friend of mine, who afterwards became Chairman of the Cork Board of Guardians. He was a man of powerful intellect, who had been mixed up with local government in his part of the country since he was a boy—a man of great experience and great intelligence; and he pointed out to me, and thus brought very forcibly to my mind, how it was the vote by proxy swamped the election of some of the best candidates. Among the many things he then told me of was the necessity he was under of going to his constituents once a year, and on this point I wish to say just a word or two. There can be no doubt in the world that it is a great hardship for Poor Law Guardians, who know their business and possess the confidence of their constituents, to be obliged to go for election once a year. We feel the necessity of altering the Septennial Act. While I believe there are many persons in the country who would gladly see the Septennial Act altered, no one, with any experience of Parliamentary life, would care to see a Parliament elected for less than three years. There is no one who would like to see Parliament elected for less than three years who knows the great advantages to be derived from men attending closely to the business of the House, from men becoming thoroughly acquainted with all the details of Parliamentary business, and being able to transmit their knowledge to others who may follow them. Well, just in the same way, I maintain it is necessary that Poor Law Guardians should be elected, in Ireland and elsewhere, for a series of years. It should not be necessary for a Guardian to have to seek the confidence of his constituents year after year. But my friend who pointed out this great hardship also impressed on my mind the grievance experienced by men who walk from house to house soliciting votes, and are only returned by a small majority, if returned at all, owing to these proxy votes being sent to their agents by persons who do not live in the district, and who very often spend their time in gallivanting about the Continent of Europe. As a rule, these people who send proxies do not reside in the district, and even when they do, they exercise their power, not for the purpose of returning good and useful Guardians, but for the purpose of returning their own agents and understrappers—men who watch the interests of the landlords rather than the condition of the poor. If these proxy voters do not live in the district what earthly interest can they take in the district? As a matter of fact, all they do is to thwart and obstruct everything that is attempted by the elected Guardians for the alleviation of the condition of the poor. No doubt the landlord who does not reside in the district has to pay a large amount of taxes; but he is not concerned for the poor or the sanitation of that district, or interested in carrying out that latest useful and beneficent measure of Parliament for the erection of labourers dwellings in Ireland. We have in operation in Ireland an Act for the comfortable housing of labourers who formerly dwelt in mud cabins and hovels; but it is our experience that whenever the landlord can obstruct the carrying out of the Act he does so. He never willingly grants land for the erection of these dwellings, and the Poor Law Guardians are obliged to invoke the powers of the Act to compel him. The only desire of non-residents is to save their pockets, and therefore I say it is absolutely necessary to destroy this power of proxy voting. It was proposed on a former occasion by a noble Lord, who would be sitting with the Government were he in this House, that proxy voters should vote personally at one election, and if they found it impossible to be present at two or three, or four other elections, as the case might be, they should be allowed to send their proxies by registered letter. That principle we oppose, because we believe that the same principle which applies to Parliamentary elections should also apply to elections for Boards of Guardians, namely, one man one vote. Until that principle is firmly established in Ireland in connection with elections of this kind I believe that justice will not be done to the poor. Coming to the 5th clause of the third part of the Bill, which provides that the ex officio Guardians should not exceed one-third of the number elected by the ratepayers, I would urge in its favour that the poor belong to the poor—that the elected Guardians, being closer to the poor people than the landlords or their agents, are better disposed towards them. They know their wants, and are more likely to know their wants than people who do not dwell amongst them. We do not object to property being represented, but we desire that it should not have an undue representation; and we maintain that while the ex officios are equal in number to the elected Guardians we cannot have on the Boards a sufficient proportion of men who know the wants of the poor and are interested in protecting them against the evils of human nature and the chances of time. I would, therefore, urge the House to accept this measure, for the reasons stated by my hon. Friend, which I have endeavoured to support by what I know of the Poor Law Guardians. I appeal to the House and to the Government to accept, as former Houses and Governments have accepted, the principles of the Bill for the benefit of the Irish poor and the settlement of a vexed question.

(1.10) COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): I rise to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months. I would say, at the outset, that I was rather startled by one observation which fell from the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. He seems to assume that the acceptance of the proposal of the Bill as to ex officio Guardians would leave vacancies on the Boards to be filled by elected Guardians. But the Bill does not propose anything of the kind, and it would, therefore, seem as though the hon. Member has not read the Bill, the Second Reading of which he seconded.

MR. J. O'CONNOR. I said the proportion should be increased.

COLONEL WARING. I understood him to say that the proportion would be increased because others would be elected, his argument being that a reduction in the number of ex officio Guardians would leave room for the election of others.

MR. J. O'CONNOR. No, no.

COLONEL WARING. Then I do not wish to pin the hon. Member to the exact phraseology he used. The history of this Bill seems to be a little mixed in the minds of hon. Members opposite, for whilst the Mover said it had on one occasion passed through this House, and had come back from the House of Lords with very little alteration, the Seconder, on the other hand, declared that, on the only occasion on which it reached the House of Lords, it came back so mutilated that it was impossible for hon. Members opposite to recognise it as their own child at all. If hon. Members opposite have such imperfect recollections, or have such different ideas, as to the effect of the alterations made in the Lords, they must not wonder if we are somewhat puzzled as to what the effect of the measure would be if passed in its present shape. I do not suppose, however, that hon. Members would be satisfied with the Bill if it came back in the form in which it was returned before, therefore, I think it advisable to save the other august House the trouble of making amendments, which would only lead to discuss one here at a time of year when everyone is anxious to get home and turn his attention to his own private pursuits. I must confess that I have no objection to the first and larger portion of the Bill—namely, that which applies the Ballot Act to Poor Law elections—and I hope that I shall have the support of the hon. Member for South Tipperary for a Bill which I myself have on the Books of the House for the improvement and extension of the Ballot Act, which will also come in extremely handy. The introduction of the ballot will neutralise the influence not only of the landlords and their agents, but also of the money lender and the publican at the elections; though I should insist that the principle of the ballot should be so adapted as not to exclude proxy and plural voting. "One man one vote" is a very well when the burden of the rates is equally borne; and I should not object to surrender my plurality of votes if I could be relieved thereby of the three-quarters of the poor rate for every tenant on my property. No doubt on those parts of an estate divided into large farms the proportion paid by the landlord is only half; but where there are a large number of cottages and allotments the rates are entirely paid by the landlord. But I am not alone in my view that the landlords should have a plurality of votes, for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow (Sir G. Trevelyan), in June 1883, took that line, pointing out that the proportion of votes in the hands of owners was infinitesimal as compared with those in the hands of occupiers. And not only was that so, but the influence of owners on the Boards of Guardians has been steadily decreasing for some years. At one time the magistrates who sat as ex officio Guardians were to a large extent landlords, but now, owing to the policy of successive Governments, a very small minority of local Magistrates are landlords. I do not exonerate the present Government from having followed very much in the footsteps of Governments from the opposite side of the House in selecting for the Magistracy gentlemen having no connection with the land, whose only desire is to have a couple of letters added to their names. Proxy voting ought to be retained; and I hope that, even supposing the Members of this House should be so much misled as to agree to its abolition, that portion of the Bill, at any rate, will be "mutilated" when it gets to "another place." It is urged against proxy voting that it only benefits absentee landlords, who as the hon. Member opposite says, "go gallivanting about the Continent of Europe." As a matter of fact, only a very few Irish landlords are absentees, and it is only a very small minority who go gallivanting about the Continent of Europe. I deplore their conduct, and nobody feels the consequences of it more than the resident landlord, who tries to do his duty. But the sins of the few ought not to be visited on the many, who, in spite of every persecution on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite, have remained at their posts. At present half the Boards are constituted of ex officio Guardians, but they are never all present. Many of them have property in several Unions, and some never come to the Board at all, so that they do not swamp the elected Guardians.

MR. J. O'CONNOR : They come specially to carry a job.

COLONEL WARING : My experience is that the jobs are on the other side. I have had considerable experience on Boards of Guardians, and I say that if the ex officio Guardians are reduced to one-third, as is proposed, they will be deprived of all power to uphold their interests, and I cannot see how the interests of the poor or of the Union would in any way be benefited. The hon. Member who seconded the Motion for the Second Reading told us that the elected Guardians were kinder to the poor than the ex officio Guardians. I would say to the hon. Member : "Ask the poor themselves whether that is so, and I think you will receive a very different answer." My experience, at any rate, is to the contrary ; and so far as the instance which he gave to prove his contention is concerned, namely, that the power given by Parliament for the improvement of labourers' dwellings is opposed by the landlords, my experience is that the opposition comes almost entirely from the tenant farmers, who object to giving the smallest corner of their newly acquired possessions to those who have tilled them for centuries. And I can assure hon. Members opposite that if this question is allowed to be agitated much longer, there will be a much stronger demand made by the labourers for some of the spoils the tenants have been so anxious to secure from the unfortunate landlords of Ireland, and the landlords and their friends will not be backward in acknowledging the justice of the demand. The hon. Gentleman opposite said he had great respect for the Local Government Board in Ireland, and that the Bill did not propose to interfere with the functions of that Board. But I see a provision in the Bill which alters the entire mode of appeal in regard to Poor Law elections. The law which allows the Local Government Board to decide questions as to the legality or illegality of elections is to be abolished, and the decision of such matters is to be handed over to the already overlaid and overworked County Court Judge. Everybody knows that recent legislation has increased the work of the County Courts. Those Courts sit four times a year, and unless it is proposed to summon a special Court to sit for the purpose of hearing election appeals there would be grave inconvenience in adopting the principle of the measure ; and I need hardly point out that this would mean additional remuneration to the County Court Judges and officials. For these reasons I think that, in all probability, the proposed alteration in the law will not meet with the approval of the House. I move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S) formally seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Colonel Waring.)

*(1.28.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) : I hardly think it appropriate, Sir, that the hon. Member (Mr. Johnston) should second the measure by a nod, but I think at the same time that the hon. Member was quite as argumentative as the hon. Member who moved the rejection of the measure. We are asked now to go back 10 years—to take a retrograde step utterly inconsistent with the development of local government, which forms one of the leading features of modern history. If this is not retrograde policy I fail altogether to understand what benighted Toryism means. I will deal with the statement the hon. Member opposite has made in regard to the subject of the preponderance of the landlord element on the Board of Guardians —that the opposition to the Labourers' Dwellings Act comes from the farmers as represented by the elected Guardians and not from the landlords. How can he reconcile that with the fact that in that portion of Ulster where the landlords have a preponderating influence on the Boards of Guardians, an attempt has been made in the case of only one cottage, to take advantage of that legislation on behalf of the labourers. In the Limerick, Tipperary, and Kanturk Unions, many cottages have been built under the Labourers Act, which are creditable to the Boards and most beneficial to the labourers. The hon. and gallant Gentleman failed to make any reference to the fact that all the clauses of this Bill received a Second Reading in 1884, and that a number of those to which he now takes exception were in Committee passed unanimously, and without any comment. Included in the list was the clause relating to the appeal being made to the County Court Judge. Let us examine the provisions of the Bill. The hon. and gallant Gentleman is in favour of the principle of vote by Ballot being applied to Poor Law elections, and yet he moves the rejection of the Second Reading. I do not suppose there will be much opposition to that portion of the Bill, if there is, it can only take the shape of a nod of the head, by which the hon. Member for South Belfast (Mr. Johnston), seconded the rejection of the Bill. The Bill does away with proxy voting, and, in my opinion, very properly so, because such voting does not conduce to the good working of the Poor Law Relief Acts and the Medical Charities Acts in Ireland. But then the Bill provides that no ratepayers shall have more than 18 votes in any electoral division. Does it not seem that that is a very fair proportion of votes to give any ratepayer? These are property votes, and surely 18 votes will give property-holders a very fair share of the representation. When we object to proxy voting we object to a system which is a disgrace to the Poor Law system of Ireland. We object to that which is opposed by the popular sense all over Ireland, and opposed by those who have any experience of the Poor Laws in Ireland. Proxy votes are only used on behalf of landlords' agents, on behalf of those who, as the hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill said, are there to guard their own interests. Not a word about the interests of the poor, or the proper administration of relief; they are there to guard their own interests, and as to the practical operation of proxy voting, we find that proxies are cast for one set of people only: not for the set of men who have given proof of their efficiency in the work of the Board, or who have shown a sympathetic interest in the condition of the poor, but for the men who are there to represent the landlord's interest and whose chief aim is at all costs to keep down the rates to the lowest possible minimum. In addition to this, recollect what an overwhelming vote the landlords of Ireland have at the present moment on Boards of Guardians. At present the ex officio Guardians number half of the entire Board, and the landlord party generally manage to secure the election of a certain number of their nominees. Thus you have popular representation entirely swamped. The hon. Member for South Tipperary in supporting the Second Reading of the Bill referred to the principle of one man one vote. But in this Bill we do not resort to that principle. This Bill provides that a ratepayer may have 18 votes, his exact number being determined by his rating. That in itself will admit of a large representation of property, but nevertheless the measure allows that there may be ex officio Guardians to the number of one third of the elected Guardians. I think the Bill is moderation itself, and I am fully persuaded it will receive the support of hon. Members who have had any experience of the working of the Poor Law in England. Now, we are very anxious to know what action Her Majesty's Government intend to take in regard to the Bill. The measure is one which has been demanded for years back by the popular voice of Ireland, and it is only resisted by a small clique of the community. Perhaps the Government may tell us they are going to introduce a Local Government Bill, but we prefer a bird in the hand to a Local Government Bill in the bush. Even if they have the intention of dealing with the subject of local government in Ireland there is no reason why a Bill of this kind should not pass, because it deals only with one feature of the system of local government in Ireland. The Boards of Guardians in Ireland have to deal with very important features of the social life of our people. It is essential that our people should have representation on these Boards. In many districts, owing to the smallness of the towns, we have no Bodies such as Corporations or Town Commissioners, nor have we any local Bodies of any importance or standing whatever. It is, therefore, of the greatest importance that the Rural Sanitary Authorities, who have to deal with questions concerning the health and well being of hundreds of thousands of the rural population of Ireland, should represent the people, and be in touch and sympathy with the people. My hon. Friend who seconded the Motion referred to the fact that it is on only a few occasions that the Local Government Board have come into collision with Boards of Guardians, and that on those few occasions the collisions have been due entirely to political considerations. There cannot be a doubt on this point. On the occasion when one Poor Law Board was suppressed by the Local Government Board for having acted ultra vires in passing a political Resolution, the entire business of the Board was got through, and when the Guardians rose that evening there was a clean sheet, so that they could not have been suppressed because of any neglect of business. I noticed that when my hon. Friend referred to the efficient administration, as a whole, of the Poor Law Guardians in Ireland somewhat of a sneer came from one of the hon. Members opposite. In this connection I have to say that the ex officio Guardians in Ireland attend the meetings only when jobbery is about to be perpetrated. The entire business of the Boards is done by the elected Guardians, but whenever an officer is to be appointed, or a chairman or vice-chairman elected, or anything large in the way of spending money is to be done, the ex officios come in from all parts of the Union—some of them sometimes even cross from England to Ireland—in order to swamp the elected Guardians and to perpetrate jobs. I hope this Bill will pass, and that the unreasonable opposition of hon. Gentlemen opposite will not receive the approval of Her Majesty's Government.

*(1.45.) CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I am glad to recognise in this Bill a revival of provisions which I supported as long ago as 1866. It is my intention to vote for the Second Reading with the view afterwards of moving that it be an instruction to the Committee to extend the Bill to England. I cannot say I am altogether satisfied with the Bill, but it is very well as far as it goes. Like many other Members, I have only during the last few years had my attention called earnestly to the state of local government in Ireland. I confess I am amazed at the extraordinary moderation of this Bill, and cannot understand why any opposition should be offered to it by the Government which has brought in local government measures for England and Scotland.

(1.46.) MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): A previous speaker told us that he would be in favour of abolishing proxy votes. But he did not tell us that a gentleman with a sufficient property qualification can have 36 votes for each candidate in every electoral division in a Union. In the Union in which I have the honour to be a Guardian I have known gentlemen residing in England and America send home their votes to their friends. Thus gentlemen who take no interest whatever in the Union have the power to swamp the number of votes given by the representatives of the ratepayers. It has also been the custom and practice recently of gentlemen who hold property in Ireland to give deeds of assignment to their friends and relations so as to secure proxy votes for them. I know a man owning land rated at £20. By dividing it among 10 of his friends he can increase the number of votes from two to 20. It has been said that an appeal lies from the Returning Officer to the Local Government Board. As a matter of fact when an election has been declared by the Returning Officer, the Local Government Board has no power to interfere. As regards the principle of the Ballot, I wish to give some experience as to how a few elections are conducted in Ireland.

It is the practice of the friends of both candidates to go out accompanied by their friends and by mobs, and it is a question of physical force as to which party will get the votes which have been handed to policemen. I have known men get their workmen to close the doors on the policeman and so prevent him from laying down a voting paper with which he had been entrusted by the Returning Officer. I can assure the House that the friends of the hon. and gallant Member for County Down (Colonel Waring) use more intimidation at elections than the Party we represent. I have known a man who was in gaol on a charge of assault, being visited by the agent of Lord Bantry and asked by him how he was going to vote at the Poor Law Guardian Election. Thinking he might obtain his release, the man said he would vote for the agent's nominee. The agent did not, however, believe him, and got his case adjourned for a fortnight to see how he would vote. When he found that the man did not vote for his nominee he had him committed for trial. I know of another instance in which it was said openly: "If you vote for Mr. Barrett's nominee you will have a friend at Court." The gentleman had a seat on the Petty Sessions Bench, and without doubt, the position is used to advance political interest and crush political opponents. There is every reason why we should put an end to this intimidation by landlords and magistrates. The right hon. Gentleman says the majority of ex-officio Guardians are not landlords, but my experience in the south of Ireland is, that as a rule, they are both landlords and magistrates. When the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the proportion of payment of rates, he must have forgotten that these gentlemen pay no part of the county cess except where they allow it to tenants who have taken holdings since 1870. The system under which Poor Law Elections are conducted in Ireland is a scandal and a disgrace to the Government of the country. [An hon. Member: And so it is in England.] The sooner this House recognises this fact the better for the peace of the country, and the cause of law and order in Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman tells us of his intention to bring in a Local Government Bill, but we are so accustomed in Ireland to Government promises never fulfilled by legislation, that we prefer to rely only on practical proof of good intentions. If he is anxious to convince us of his willingness to concede legislation in a fair spirit, let him accept this as a small instalment in that direction.

(2.20) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present.

(2.24) MR TUTE (Westmeath, N.): I think the vicissitudes through which this Bill has passed fully demonstrate the unfitness of this House to deal with Irish matters. It has passed this Legislative Assembly several times, once without Division and on another occasion by a very large majority. On the last occasion I believe the majority was 98, and in that majority I have noticed the names of some prominent Unionists who supported the Bill. It will be interesting to see how those Unionist gentlemen will vote to-day. However, the history of the Bill gives ample proof of the unfitness of any but an Irish Legislature to deal with such matters. In reference to the question of open voting I see that a Select Committee appointed by this House to inquire into the system of elections of Poor Law Guardians in Ireland in 1878, expressed disapprobation in the most unmeasured terms of the existing system. If the Committee did not go so far as to admit that the Ballot system was necessary, it condemned voting papers very strongly. This is what the Committee said:

"On the other hand it was shown that the abuses and inconvenience of the voting paper system were very grave, that under it intimidation and obstruction, tampering with and forging of papers is practised, that frequently voters do not receive their papers at all, and in other cases they are invalidated for the most trivial technical reasons."

The Committee also went on to show that under the triennial system the Ballot system would be cheaper, though attended with inconvenience to voters. The statements in the Report of that Committee have been conclusively proved by the hon. Member for West Cork to-day. The facts, indeed, are well known. The agents and hangers-on of the landlords in the different Unions follow the policeman engaged in the distribution of people are heartily tired of coming to this House for measures of reform. This Bill for the reform of the constitution of the Irish Boards of Guardians has experienced the ups and downs of fortune before this House for the space of nearly 20 years, and it is still a Bill and not an Act. It has several times passed this House, and on one occasion it passed the House of Lords after an exhaustive inquiry by a select Committee and the examination of witnesses who represented, without exception, the landlord class in Ireland. I must, therefore, express surprise that any Member of the Tory Party—even an Ulster landlord—should desire to be more Conservative in 1890 on the question of Poor Law reform, considering the rapid development of the theory of popular rights, than the House of Lords in 1884. I would also call to the recollection of the House, that when the Bill was last under discussion in 1886, a very distinguished Member of the Irish Conservative Party (Mr. Holmes) Member for the University of Dublin, afterwards Attorney General for Ireland, and now one of Her Majesty's Judges, intervened in the debate and used his influence, although unavailingly, to induce his friends to forego their opposition to the measure. It is, therefore, with surprise and regret that, four years later, I find the Tory Members for Ireland opposing this Bill. There are important provisions in the measure to which no objection is taken. It contains provisions for the better inspection and for the due and orderly revision of the list of voters. No Member of the House will contend that the present system in regard to the revision of the list of voters is one which ought to prevail, and I should be much surprised to hear the Chief Secretary say one word against our proposals in that respect. Then, again, no objection worth listening to has been made against the proposal for an appeal before the County Court Judge without a jury. The Local Government Board, with whom the appeal now lies, feel that they are an agency entirely unfitted for such a purpose. It must be manifest that a Department of the State created for the performance of executive duties is not fitted for the performance of judicial functions, and I believe that the Local Government Board would be very glad to be relieved of this duty. The County Court Judges of Ireland, considering the amount of the salaries they receive, are very moderately and lightly worked compared with other public officers. The petitions in regard to the administration of the Poor Law are not numerous, and I venture to anticipate that in the event of a change in the system taking place they will become even more rare, and that the amount of additional labour thrown upon the County Court Judges will be very considerable. Another provision of the Bill is to provide for the presentation of appeals in disputes as to law. At present the decision really rests with the Clerk of the Union, who is the Returning Officer, and there is no adequate appeal on any question of law. It is not only improper, but even grotesque, that the decision should rest with a person who is the nominee of the dominant section of the Board. Then, again, as to the qualification, we propose that a magistrate shall not be qualified to be an ex officio Guardian unless he is a ratepayer. Surely it will not be contended that a gentleman, merely because he is made a magistrate, is entitled to control the administration of the poor rates in a Union to which he does not contribute. We further provide that a £12 rating shall qualify for election. At present there is no general rule on the subject. The Local Government Board by a general order define the amount of the qualification, and it varies in different parts of Ireland, being in some parts as high as £30 and in others as low as £6. The result is to shut out from the service of the people in every Union many men of the highest qualification, who are among the most competent men who can be found. I now come to the three main provisions of the Bill. The first is that vote by Ballot shall be applied to Poor Law elections. Vote by Ballot is applied to every election except that for the Poor Law Board, and several of my hon. Friends who have addressed the House to-day have given conclusive reasons why it should be also applied to the election of Poor Law Guardians. The present system is for the police to leave voting papers, an interval elapses before they are collected, and in the case of a

that the people were at any rate to have the management of their local affairs. If that is so, there can be no difficulty in giving to the Irish people this small crumb of justice which the Irish Members claim. We know that the day is not far distant when the return of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) will sweep away these relics of the past in Ireland and give real Home Rule to the Irish people. But I await with some anxiety the verdict of the House upon the present measure, in order that we may know whether their intentions in regard to Ireland are founded on honesty and justice.

*(2.35.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I rise for the purpose of saying that I cannot support the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for South Down (Colonel Waring). I cannot support it for two reasons. In the first place I do not approve of it, and there is another reason, namely, that as he has moved that the Bill be read a second time on this day six months, it is very likely that the House may be sitting on that day. I trust that the Government are not about to commit the mistake of supporting the Amendment of the hon. and gallant Member for South Down. I am far from saying that I approve of everything that is contained in the Bill. It is hard to discover what the real principle of it is. If it is to establish vote by Ballot in Poor Law elections I see no reason why the proposition should be objected to. But I do not think that is the real principle of the Bill. On the contrary, I think the real principle is the abolition of the proxy vote and the cutting down of the representation of ex officio Guardians. As to these two propositions, I cannot get over the fact that Ireland does not stand in the same position as England in regard to this question. In a great part of Ireland the landlord pays the entire poor rate where the valuation is under £4, and in Donegal, Mayo, and other parts of the country the valuation, as a rule, is under £4. Therefore, if we are to go on the old Liberal principle that representation and taxation are to go together we must make some reasonable allowance for the rights of property.

Mr. Tuite

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): It is paid in the rent.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is not a mere question of the landlords alone. The hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. Tuite) has referred to the City of Dublin. How does the principle operate in Dublin? All I can say is that if you abolish the proxy vote the owners of property will very often not be represented at all. The result will be that you may put the vote in the hands of men who do not pay the rate, and take it out of the hands of those who do pay it. I intend to vote for the Second Reading of the Bill. I think that there is a great deal of good in it, and that the Government may well consent to accept it. But while I vote for the Second Reading I think there are many things contained in the measure which are objectionable, and which, I think, will require amendment in Committee.

(2.45.) MR. SEXTON: I think that the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House had no option but to support the Second Reading, because I can recollect that when the measure was last before the House, some four years ago since which time the Government have been too busy in adopting a policy of coercion, and considering its results, to devote any time to minor subjects every Member of the Party now known as the Liberal Unionist Party supported the Second Reading of the Bill. At the same time I dare say that the speech which has been delivered by the hon. Gentleman will command and draw more attention from the Chief Secretary than any speech which could be delivered by any Member representing the vast majority of the British people. But the speech deserves more attention on another ground. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has just been admitted to the dignity of a Justice of the Peace, and from that circumstance he is entitled to become an ex officio Guardian of the Poor. His testimony, therefore, as to the untenable character of the administration of the Irish Poor Law must be regarded as of particular value. I think that any impartial person who has observed the course of this debate must admit that there can be no wonder that the Irish people are heartily tired of coming to this House for measures of reform. This Bill for the reform of the constitution of the Irish Boards of Guardians has experienced the ups and downs of fortune before this House for the space of nearly 20 years, and it is still a Bill and not an Act. The Local Government Board by a general order define the amount of the qualification, and it varies in different parts of Ireland, being in some parts as high as £30 and in others as low as £6. The result is to shut out from the service of the people in every Union many men of the highest qualification, who are among the most competent men who can be found. I now come to the three main provisions of the Bill. The first is that vote by Ballot shall be applied to Poor Law elections. Vote by Ballot is applied to every election except that for the Poor Law Board, and several of my hon. Friends who have addressed the House to-day have given conclusive reasons why it should be also applied to the election of Poor Law Guardians. The present system is for the police to leave voting papers, an interval elapses before they are collected, and in the case of a contested election the humble voter in Ireland is exposed for several days to intimidation and undue solicitation by the agents of one or other of the parties, and in the end he is induced to fill up the voting paper against his will. I think that a system of voting should be adopted which would enable the voter to give a free vote according to his conscience. I trust that the spokesmen of the Government, who are so ready to charge us with intimidation, will be ready to accept from us a suggestion in this sphere of local government that will definitely put an end to intimidation in the future. We propose also the abolition of the proxy vote. If persons do not choose to live in the country or the district they cannot have an accurate knowledge of the affairs of the Union or take an active interest in them. It is high time to put an end to the scandals which have marked the Poor Law elections in Ireland, and by which the opinions of those who live on the spot, and are acquainted with the condition of the Union and the state of the poor, are continually over-ruled by proxies imported from Boulogne or Spain on behalf of impecunious landlords, and even from China and Peru, and the ends of the earth. It is a gross scandal to find the opinion of those acquainted with the district regularly overborne by the lodgment of proxies retained from year to year by one individual, who, by the systematic use of them, becomes, in fact, a dictator. I might call attention to a case in which an enterprising gentleman of the dominant political Party possessed himself of the proxies of all the landlords of the Union who were absent from the country, and, by the use of those proxies from year to year, succeeded not only in nominating the Board but in appointing himself Clerk of the Union, thus becoming the practical controller of it. As to the argument of the hon. Member for South Tyrone that men may be absent on professional business, my reply is that such casualties must be borne for the sake of the general principle. Now, upon this question of the representation of property let me show you how they blow hot and cold, how they make principles to suit the facts. What about the county cess in Ireland? The landlords pay none of it, yet they control it, through the Grand Jury, which administers every penny of it. The tenant farmer has no chance of being admitted to the Grand Jury in Ireland.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Gentleman is forgetting the associated cess-payers.

MR. SEXTON: I am not forgetting the associated cess-payers. Their power is illusory. These cess-payers are nominated by the Grand Jury; they have no seat upon the Grand Jury itself. Therefore, the Body which has effectual control is a Body to which no tenant farmer ever finds his way, and I submit and insist that the whole of the valuation of the county cess in Ireland lies in the hands of those who do not contribute one penny to the funds. In the presence of that fact, I say it is absurd for the hon. Member to raise in the case of Ireland the principle of taxation and representation, as if that principle had not been duly observed. Upon that question of taxation and representation I would go very much further than this Bill, which is inadequate. Property is extremely over represented in respect of these Poor Law votes. In the first place the landlord may have 36, and rarely has less than 18 votes; the occupier has rarely more than two. The landlords possess one half of the Board without the trouble of electing any candidate, and where there is a property rate, of course they determine the elections. The element of property has the controlling influence upon the Poor Law Boards of Ireland. It is no longer pretended that property ought to have that influence in the Imperial Legislature. In regard to the Imperial revenue, many a man contributes as much to it as 10,000 others, yet each one of that 10,000 has as much power as he has in nominating a candidate for membership in the Imperial Parliament. I fail to see why that principle should not be applied in the local administration of the Poor Law Boards of Ireland. Formerly those Poor Law Boards simply raised funds for the relief of the poor. But, within the last 20 years, by different Acts of Parliament, various other functions have been cast upon those Boards. They have to deal with the important questions of burial, public health, and education—questions in which every man, with or without property, has an equal interest, and which demand, it is clear, an elective franchise. We have in this House the direct representation of labour, and working men have been admitted to the Magisterial Bench; and I certainly think that the time has come when, in the administration of the Poor Law, we should have a direct representation of the labouring classes, who are certainly concerned in that work. I am quite in favour of abolishing the property qualification altogether in the election of Poor Law Guardians. I think neither poverty nor humble condition should prevent a man from administering relief to the poor. I believe the labouring classes are more interested than any other in the due administration of relief to the poor. Whilst it is important that there should be economy in the administration of the rates, and whilst, therefore, there should be a substantial representation of the property element, it is equally important in a Christian and civilised condition of society, that the administration should be characterised by a liberal and generous care for the necessities of the poor. While the landlords have to contribute to the poor rates in every case, and to pay the whole where the valuation is under £4, the tenants who earn the rents and pay the landlords are the persons who contribute the rates, and I decline to consider that the fact of the landlord being the medium or agent entitles him to special representation. Then, as to the proportion of ex officio members. An Act was passed by Parliament, when the whole subject had been freshly considered and examined by a powerful Committee, and Parliament decided that the proportion of one-fourth for ex officio members was sufficient. That was the law for 10 years; but the Act was repealed in that respect, and repealed in the darkest and gloomiest time of the Irish history of our century, the famine period, when the Irish people had no diligent guardians of their interests in this House, when their representatives were elected under a system of the most rigid and terrible boycotting, and when a tenant who ventured to vote against the nominee of his landlord, whether that landlord was Liberal or Tory, did so under the pain of eviction.

There is nothing more painful or terrible than that, during the last half century, not thousands but millions of poor Irish people should have suffered eviction from their homes by expulsion from their country, because they voted in obedience to their conscience and in the interest of their class, and against the dictation of their landlords. At the time of the repeal of the Act of 1837 the Irish people had no guardians of their interests in this House. What I ask is, that we should return to the proportion of one-fourth ex officio members. I cannot anticipate what reply the right hon. Gentleman is going to make, but, from the fact that his late Attorney General supported the Second Reading, and from the fact that the House of Lords have already passed the Bill, I should hope that the reply of the right hon. Gentleman will be favourable to the Second Reading, and the main proposals of the Bill. At the same time, I frankly tell him that I do not greatly care. The country takes note of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman and his Party obtained power four years ago upon formal and solemn promises to the country of not only a large but a generous extension of the powers of local government in Ireland. The Party opposite is the Party of broken pledges, of violated faith. Four years have passed since the General Election. The cold shadow of another General Election is already falling upon that Party. And I must say that I do not feel greatly concerned, knowing the chilling influence of that shade, whether the right hon. Gentlemen accepts the Bill or no. If he accepts it we shall be prepared to go forward and to pass it into law. If he refuses, I for my part shall deem the rejection useful, because I am certain that, either by a Local Government Bill in this House or an Irish Chamber, the Poor Law and other Departments of the Public Service of Ireland will be placed upon a basis far more democratic, and, therefore, far more just and satisfactory and more permanent than the basis proposed by this Bill.

*(3.15.) SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, &c.): I wish to draw the attention of the House to the fact, that this Bill was only circulated this morning. ["Last night."] I can only say that I received it this morning along with my Parliamentary papers, and I have really not had time to study the Bill. But I may say at once, that this is a matter well deserving of the attention of the Government, and well deserving of the consideration of the House; it is a pure matter of business, and I deprecate and protest against dragging other matters before the House into discussions of purely business matters. I would point out, in the first place, that this Bill proposes to do in Ireland, in regard to Poor Law administration, what is not done on this side of the water. It would establish certain new principles in the Poor Law system in Ireland, which have not been accepted and which have not been tried in England; and, therefore, if we who sit on this side of the House examine the arguments for the Bill very closely, I consider we are only doing what is our plain and business-like duty. From some speeches I have heard on the other side, I question very much if any of those who made the speeches have ever sat, for any length of time, on Boards of Guardians at all. ["Many of them"]. I question that very much indeed, and I question very much indeed if the proposer of this Bill has ever been on a Board of Guardians at all, or knows anything of the practical working of Boards of Guardians. I gather that from the nature and tenour of his speech; his information appeared to be entirely second-hand. I regret very much that a great deal of almost every speech has been based on an assumption that the landlords have been guilty of intimidation. I happen to be a tenant in Ireland as well as a landlord, and my interests as a tenant are perhaps greater than my interests as a landlord. Therefore, I have an opportunity of speaking from personal knowledge on this question, and I say that when hon. Gentlemen opposite ask us to pass this Bill because of intimidation practised by landlords, they are talking of a condition of things which long ago passed away. Why, the tenant cannot be intimidated, and no landlord under the Acts of 1870, 1881, and 1887 could prejudice his interest as a tenant. Let the tenant absolutely defy any intimidation by landlord or agent in a Poor Law election. How can a tenant be evicted because he does not vote the way the landlord wants? He cannot be evicted so long as he pays his rent, and if he does that he may defy any amount of pressure from the landlord, whether in a Parliamentary or any other election. I may point out to you this, that the Irish people are somehow or other certainly the easy victims of intimidation, but that intimidation is not all on one side; and when the Irishman gets a little more moral courage to resist intimidation of all sorts we shall hear less of Irish questions and more of the prosperity of Ireland. Let me give an instance very à propos to my argument of intimidation in regard to Poor Law elections, showing that it is more likely to be on the side of political agitators than upon the side of the landlords, because the landlord is powerless under the law to punish, or in any way prejudice the position of the tenant on account of the manner in which he votes so long as he pays his rent. The tenant is open to the influence of popular pressure, and that he is intimidated for political purposes we know is really possible and exists, and here is a statement made in this House, and officially confirmed, which illustrates what I say

"The townland of Doora, near Ennis, was on Tuesday night the scene of a serious moonlighting raid. The houses of a number of farmers in the district, to whom Poor Law voting papers had been distributed the previous day, were visited by a party of men, partly disguised, carrying sticks, who demanded the papers. The houses of two farmers named McInernay were first visited, next that of John Heffernan, from all of whom the papers were taken. Pat Lawlor's was next visited, but here Lawlor and his son were prepared for the moonlight visitors, who promptly decamped. At the house of Michael Lawlor the rufers met with a stubborn resistance, and in the melee Lawlor got a deep cut on the head; the rufers were here baffled in their object. In all, the papers were taken from six houses. A very bitter contest, is being conducted in the electoral division of the Poor Law Union of Ennis. The candidates are Mr. Paul Skehan, secretary to the branch of the National League formerly existing at Doora, and Mr. John Lynch, and the houses which were raided belonged to the supporters of the latter."

I am merely pointing out the fact that, on the one hand, the assertion as to landlord intimidation is a mistake, and under the law impossible, but that unfortunately, where in some places the law is defied by political agitators, intimidation is practised in Poor Law elections by the side opposed to the landlords. For my part, I would say, the only objection to applying the Ballot to Poor Law elections is the increased cost which it would entail upon the ratepayers. How is it proposed to deal with those expenses in the case of Poor Law elections? We must look at the matter from a business point of view; and from personal knowledge and experience I maintain that a Poor Law election under the ballot, if the Ballot be conducted with due precaution, and is real and not a sham, it will be a very expensive matter. Are you going to deduct the money from the poor rates—a considerable sum of money which ought to go for the relief of the poor? I have endeavoured to give to this subject a fair and impartial consideration, and I say the Bill ought not to have been introduced unless the supporters of it are prepared to give us information upon the real financial aspect of the case. I am rather struck by the fact that all those who are in favour of this Bill represent the South and West of Ireland chiefly, and all the Members who are opposed generally to this Bill, although they accept many of its provisions, are from the North of Ireland. That certainly has some weight with me, because, by looking at the statistics, I find that, if you compare Ulster with Munster, the statistics give you some very broad facts which show, I think, that the Poor Law business in Ulster is better done than the Poor Law business in Munster. I see in the Ulster Returns there were over 83,000 paupers, six-sevenths of whom were indoor, out of a total population of 1,743,000 persons; and in the Munster Returns I find, where the population is only 1,300,000, that there are 190,000 paupers and upwards in receipt of relief, two-thirds of whom are indoor paupers. You see how much greater the proportion of pauperism is in the South than in the North, and I think that fact shows that probably, at all events, it is justifiable to draw a conclusion that the Guardians in the North of Ireland understand and do their business better than the Guardians in the South of Ireland. I say that is a reasonable argument to bring forward as accounting for the broad state of the facts. But, if I take the typical towns of Cork and Belfast, I find the same result. In Belfast there were under 23,000 paupers, $\frac{1}{3}$ of whom were indoor, out of a total population of 240,000. Now, if we turn to Cork, I find there were over 23,000 paupers out of a population of 145,000. That, I think, sufficiently indicates that where people attend more to business and less to politics, the interests of the poor and the interests of the population are better looked after. It is because I think that we have to look soberly at all these questions of Irish administration that I, for one, am perfectly prepared to look at them fairly and squarely, but I am not prepared to vote offhand in support of the Bill when I have not had sufficient explanation of the business aspects of that measure, or what is likely to be the financial result of its proposals. I do not disagree with all the arguments put forward in favour of the Bill, but I do say that we are entitled to deal with the subject as a matter of business, and I must also say that, if the Bill ever passes a Second Reading, it will require considerable excision.

(3.26.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): The hon. and gallant Gentleman has said that some Gentlemen who have spoken have very little or no practical acquaintance with Boards of Guardians. I do not think I am open to that reproach, for during the last six or seven years I have attended the Poor Law Board of my constituency, of which I am a member, and which I always attend during the recess. I believe the hon. and gallant Member has been once charged with standing on "no coercion." If that is so, he certainly ought to support the Bill, the main feature of which is to introduce the Ballot into Poor Law matters.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to assure the hon. Gentleman that I never took my stand on "no coercion."

COLONEL NOLAN: I accept the statement of the hon. and gallant Member, but I can assure him that, while in many districts there is not this intimidation, at all events in some it does exist. I would point out that the cost of the Ballot would really be less than is the outlay incurred at the present moment, by the fact of constabulary having to go round to distribute the voting papers, and again, to go round to collect them. In the case of Galway, for instance, intimidation is practised in some parts, and the only way to get rid of it is to adopt the ballot. It is a great evil to give a man a vote, and then not to enable him to vote as he wishes. As to the objection to the number of ex officio Guardians fixed upon in the Bill, the Government have a majority, and backed up by the 70 Unionists can fix upon any number they like. Proxies are terribly abused in their use in Ireland, not in the case of the landlords who may be in London performing their duties in this House, but in the case of men who totally neglect all their duties both in England and in Ireland. These men ought either to be made to reside in Ireland or to be deprived of the power of voting by proxy. I hope the Government will assent to the Second Reading of the Bill, and introduce any desired modification in Committee. We must all admit that the present system of electing Poor Law Guardians is a most imperfect one, and that it ought to be amended.

(3.34.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E). Those who have listened to this debate must, I think, have experienced some difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to the real object aimed at by the framers of the Bill. The Member for West Donegal told us it was useless for the Government to accept the provision relating to the substitution of the ballot for open voting unless the rest of the Bill was also adopted. The hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down has told us the real essence of the Bill is the provision as to the ballot, and that the other provisions might be modified without destroying the measure. Thus the supporters of the Bill seem to differ as to what are to be considered its vital proposals; and I am not sufficiently in their counsels to decide which of the speakers represents the balance of opinion in the Party. No one will, I think, deny that it would be an important change to adopt the ballot, and it is a change I should be very glad to see made. It is said that the ballot is necessary on account of landlord intimidation; but I think that that contention has been successfully disposed of by the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets, who pointed out that, under the existing law, intimidation on the part of the landlord is impossible, but that it might be practised by an organised political party which thought it could gain an advantage by having a majority at a Board. However, I will not press the point, because the debate has been of a very moderate character, and I am unwilling to divert it into controversial channels. I also understand that hon. Members opposite desire to suppress intimidation of all kinds, whether by landlords or by Land League; and, therefore, as far as the ballot is concerned, I offer no opposition. I should also be glad to see an alteration in the procedure by which doubtful votes are decided. The Local Government Board is not the best tribunal for deciding questions of that sort, and as there is adequate legal machinery there would be no objection to substituting it for the Board. I have no objection to exclude from the office of ex officio Guardian Justices who do not happen to be rate-payers. I conceive that the number of them is small, and therefore the operation of the clause would be limited: but whether limited or not, the clause is sound in theory, and would be salutary in practice. As to the limitation of the number of votes that can be given by one individual, I understand that up to 1884 the Local Government Board held that 18 was the maximum. The matter, however, came before the Court of Appeal, which decided that the Board had not rightly interpreted the Statute, and that the maximum was not 18 but 36. I am of opinion that there could be no injustice done by returning to the practice which prevailed before 1884. That, I think, exhausts the last of the minor provisions to which the Government do not object. We now, therefore, come to some of the larger proposals. There is one point which I have missed, however. I take the view adopted by a Committee of the House of Lords, that though a minor should not have votes, it is only fair that those who administer his property should represent him in voting. Now I come to the provisions, the object of which is to limit the representation of property and diminish the number of ex officio Guardians, and I say at once I am in entire divergence from these proposals of the Bill. We have been asked how it is possible to justify the presence on a body whose duty it is to administer rates levied on the community so large a proportion of non-elected members. The first observation I have to make upon that is that a similar system exists in England, and the House when it has had the question before it has deliberately declined to interfere. It is for hon. Members opposite to show why Ireland is to be treated in a different manner from England.

MR. SEXTON : Do ex officio members constitute one-half of the Boards in England?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I cannot answer that definitely, but there is a large ex officio representation in England ; and in Ireland, undoubtedly, there is a justification for ex officio representation which does not exist in England. The rates in England are levied on occupiers, but in Ireland one-half the rates are levied on owners, except where they are levied wholly on owners, and these cases are not fragmentary and exceptional, and are found chiefly in the poorest parts of Ireland, where the administration of the Poor Law is difficult, arduous, and critical. The hon. Member for West Belfast has put forward another argument. He says, what is the use of telling us that taxation and representation should go together, when in Ireland you administer through the medium of Grand Juries (which may be truly described as a Landlord Board) the county cess, which is wholly paid by the tenants. That is an anomaly which has always been admitted on both sides of the House, and this is one of the things that has moved the Government to deal with the question of local government in Ireland. I therefore ask the hon. Gentleman to refrain from using that argument, at all events until he has seen the proposals with regard to local government for Ireland which it will be my duty to lay before the House. The next argument of the hon. Gentleman contains an even more serious fallacy. The hon. Member denies that the landlord pays the rates, even in the case of tenants below £4, because, says the hon. Member, the rates are paid out of the rent. What is really meant by the principle that representation and taxation should go together is that some responsibility in cases where the rate is increased should fall upon those who vote the increase. The question is, who suffers by an increase of rate in those cases where the rent is below £4? I think the hon. Member will, on reflection, agree that the increase does and must fall on the landlord, and does not and cannot fall on the tenant ; therefore it is a misuse of language to say it is the tenant who pays the rates and should be represented on the Boards of Guardians. In passing from these theoretical arguments I am afraid the agreement, or partial agreement, I have hitherto been able to maintain with hon. Gentlemen opposite with regard to the Bill breaks down. I say plainly and openly to the House that the experience I have had of Poor Law administration in Ireland during the last three or four years has made me absolutely opposed to anything which would diminish the influence of the ex officio Guardians. That administration has in many respects been far from a creditable administration in Ireland ; and I think that if hon. Gentlemen will impartially investigate those cases in which it has broken down most flagrantly and scandalously they will find that it has been in those instances where ex officio Guardians have been not over but under-represented. I acknowledge with regret that ex officio Guardians do not attend so often as they ought ; but we cannot forget that those Guardians have in many cases been submitted to treatment which it would require the most robust sense of public duty to withstand ; and I fear that in too many cases that diminished representation of the ex officio Guardians has been obtained by other than legal or statutory means. The hon. Gentleman opposite attaches, I believe, importance to this part of the Bill ; and if I assent, as I am prepared to do, to the Second Reading, I desire to make a statement which will make my attitude perfectly clear. I desire it shall be understood that I shall do my utmost in Committee to resist those provisions of the Bill which propose to diminish the proportion of ex officio Guardians who now have a right to attend the meetings. What hon. Members opposite may think of the Bill, altered as I desire to see it altered, I cannot say. In 1885, when the Bill came down from the House of Lords, modified very much in the direction in which I desire to see it modified, the hon. Member for West Belfast gave notice that if the Government retained the Amendments he should move that the Bill be discharged. I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman still holds that view.

MR. SEXTON: Yes.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should have gathered from his speech it was not so, as the hon. Member went over point after point and said he presumed the Government would not resist them, and he then went on to tell the House what a large proportion of the Bill they constituted.

MR. SEXTON: I said they covered a large area.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I presume the hon. Gentleman did not mean that, although they covered a large area, they were of little importance. As I am unable to gather from the utterances of hon. Members what is the vital principle of the Bill, I shall not take upon myself the responsibility of resisting the Second Reading; but will do my best in Committee to remove from the Bill all those provisions which I think would interfere with the due administration of the Poor Law in Ireland for the benefit of all classes of the community, and especially for that portion of the community whom the Bill is most intended to benefit—the poor of Ireland.

(3.53.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech of extremely temperate character, has come to a conclusion which I extremely regret, following, as it does, upon many admissions which I, in common with other Members of this House, gladly welcomed. Still, I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman does not propose to offer any opposition to the Second Reading; and I earnestly trust that hon. Members below the Gangway will persevere in their efforts to bring this Bill in its further stages before the House, so that we may be able to show that the provisions to which exception has been taken are defensible in justice, in reason, and in national expediency. It will then be time enough, when these vital principles, as I regard them, have been rejected, to consider whether the Bill should be dropped or not. I am inclined to agree with the position taken up by the hon. Member for West Belfast in 1885, when he said that if the Government insisted on accepting their Lordships' Amendment, and keeping the number of ex officio Guardians at the old proportion, we would not be responsible for further proceeding with the Bill. But we have not reached that point yet. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets complained that the Bill had only been before the House a few hours; while the hon. and gallant Member who moved that it be read a second time this day six months called the Bill a "hardy annual." It is little to the credit of the House that it should be so. When I think how often measures, dictated by the purest sentiments of justice, are brought forward in this House on behalf of Ireland, defended by able arguments and opposed with arguments which will not hold water, but put forward simply on the ground of expediency; when I remember that it is only after many years that grievances thus pointed out are remedied, and then only as part of a great measure of justice to England, Scotland, and Wales; and when I think that this Bill has been twice passed by this House and sent back once from that Chamber in which the Irish tenant is not represented, in a condition in which its authors did not care to recognise it, I come to the conclusion that in these matters are to be found very strong argument on the side of those who hold that great changes are wanted in connection with the administration of Irish affairs. With regard to this Bill, it contains much with which I am glad to say we are all agreed. The right hon. Gentleman opposite said he had found some difficulty in discovering the principle of the Bill; but, as he will remember, the hon. Member for West Belfast said it was not easy to name the principle of a Bill which was a proposal to recast a great system of popular representation. This Bill is a complete re-casting of the system of electing Poor Law Guardians, and hon. Members must all admire the skill with which so many excellent provisions have been compressed into so small a compass. What does it do? First, it simplifies the system of registration, and then it provides simple machinery by which the right man shall get the vote, and know that he has it. In the next place, it gives an appeal in cases of disputed elections of a cheap and ready sort, which lies at almost every man's door, because the County Court Judge is to be substituted for the authority of the Local Government Board, or for the cumbrous and expensive machinery of the Court of Queen's Bench. Above all, it gives us vote by ballot. Can anyone who has been Irish Secretary forget how as soon as possible after the 25th of March he is bombarded with questions about cases of intimidation? The hon. Member for Bow and Bromley (Sir J. Colomb) stated that a moonlight expedition had taken place for the purpose of seizing voting papers. There was a cheer from below the Gangway, in which I joined. Strange to say, the hon. Member mistook the meaning of that cheer. I do not suppose anyone but himself supposed it meant pleasure at the voting papers being stolen. It was merely an expression of surprise and amusement at hearing the hon. Member bring forward a very strong argument in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member, however, gave as an interpretation of its meaning sympathy with moonlighting; and I have very little doubt if this is left to pass without protest we shall be told by the newspapers and in speeches for the next three or four years that Members from Ireland had cheered the fact that moonlighting was carried on at Poor Law elections. If intimidation does not exist on both sides, it is believed to exist. We believe that the only effective method of putting a stop to it is the ballot, and the ballot we will have. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary did not notice the question of proxies. In 1883, as the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor, I was obliged to speak at some length on the representation of property in Ireland. I said the landlords ought to have influence, and that that is given in two ways—indirectly by means of ex officio Guardians, and directly by means of votes representing the position of the property which the voter holds. Then I said there was a danger in insisting too much on this point with reference to ex officio

Guardians; because if they are to be the only protectors of the landlord interest the Government would have been justified in appointing none but landlords in the past. I think it very dangerous to lay down the principle that Justices of the Peace ought to be almost exclusively connected with the land. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill said that in recent days men not connected with the land had been appointed Justices of the Peace, and he thinks that is a thing deserving of reprobation.

COLONEL WARING: I did not hold it up to reprobation at all. I merely mentioned it in the sense in which he is using it himself.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I was going to quote the expression the hon. and gallant Gentleman used. He said he did not exonerate his own Government from having done it.

COLONEL WARING: I must say I do not consider all the recent magisterial appointments praiseworthy at all.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I shall have to deal with that later. With regard to the question of proxies, I think there is some slight difficulty in having the vote by ballot undiluted. I entirely agree with hon. Members who maintain that people who want to manage local affairs ought to live in the district. But there is this difficulty. There may be a man resident in Ireland who really does his best as a resident citizen, and who at the same time may hold property in more districts than one. It is no doubt a small matter, because there are comparatively few men in this position. At one time I thought that the voting might be so arranged as to take place on different days in different districts, but that would be a matter of peculiar difficulty. An idea was, however, thrown out by the hon. and gallant Member for Galway (Colonel Nolan), who suggested that a man who voted in a Poor Law election as an owner should be allowed, under certain safe methods, to exercise his privilege in another district by means of a registered letter to the Postmaster, or in some other way. In order to get the benefit of vote by ballot for all the occupiers and owners who vote on the spot, I for one would be willing, as in 1883, to purchase that very great advantage by making an exception in favour of the small number of owners resident in Ireland who desire to vote as owners in other districts. The right hon. Gentleman says that the case for the retention of the magistrates is much stronger in Ireland than in England. The first reason he gives us is that the rates in Ireland fall on the owner. They fall more directly on the owner, undoubtedly, in the case of all the smaller tenancies in Ireland; but I appeal to anyone who knows country life in England to say whether the economical theory of rating, that it falls on the rent, is not borne out by this experience. In our yearly tenures an increase in the rate tells very rapidly on the rent. The grievance about the rate in England is not only in the country districts but in the town districts, where you have long leases, and where the tenant makes a bargain to pay what are called the rates, but what are in truth taxes for education, for sanitation, for the beautifying of the town, and which have been imposed since the 99 years' lease was granted. In the case of the farmer it is a yearly tenure, and the increase, and sometimes the diminution, of the rates shows itself at no long distance in the rent. The right hon. Gentleman pounced upon what was by far the most interesting observation in the very interesting speech of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton)—the passage in which the hon. Member stated the theory that the rates came out of the rent, and ought to come out of the rent. I will put it in another way. If you take agricultural rents in England, I believe in the great majority of cases that before a man gets a half-penny out of that rent everyone who has a part in making it has to be well and decently housed. In the next place, the poverty of the district has all to be paid for out of the rents of that district. So far, I fancy, I have the House with me, and I believe I shall have all English landlords with me, when I say there is a third burden on rent, and that is the education of the district. Directly or indirectly, through the money which he himself dispenses in building school-houses, or, in the last resort, through the educational grant, in the shape of Income Tax, the education of the rural districts in England is provided for, generally cheerfully and willingly by the landlord. In Ireland, however, I fancy the landlord in the enormous majority of cases pays almost nothing for education. In the North, for reasons which I will not give—though many of them are quite honourable—the system adopted is the same as is adopted on good estates on this side of the Channel; but does anyone pretend that over four-fifths of the area and the population of the country the education of the great mass of the people who live on the estates is to any great extent paid by the landlords? English education is paid for out of the rent; but does anyone pretend that, therefore, the landlords should have a preponderating influence on the School Board which does not include ex officio members? All elections—Parliamentary, educational, local, administrative, sanitary—should be on the same principle as those for the School Board—the principle of getting the votes of the greatest number of intelligent and independent men. If the principle of the representation of property is given at all on public bodies, it should be given very sparingly; and yet this Bill introduces it, or recognises it, very lavishly in dealing with Justices of the Peace on the Boards, and in giving large franchises to property. And what are the Justices of the Peace in Ireland? The latest Returns issued—those of 1884—show that many of them are capitalists, and also that out of the 5,065 Justices of the Peace in the country only 437 belong to all other sects and different denominations of the Protestant religion other than the Church of Ireland. I take a county where both the Members of Parliament presumably are largely elected by Catholics; and unfortunately, in this case, I am obliged to take sects, not for any sectarian reason, but because it is to a sect that injustice has been done. In that county there were 74 Justices of the Peace in 1884, and only one of them was a Catholic. In another county with, I think, five Members who sit below the gangway, out of 138 Justices only nine are Catholics. In two counties in the South and centre of Ireland, counties as Catholic as counties can be, namely, Wexford and Wicklow, out of 114 and 104 magistrates respectively, in the one case there are 25, and in the other five Catholic Justices. Well, but we are now not only dealing with a question of sects, but with a question of class. We want to have all classes properly represented. We are able to judge of the matter by these Returns, through the medium of religion. I remember hearing Baron Dowse say that the landlords of Ireland belonged to the Church of Ireland because it was the most respectable. He gave another reason which does not hold now so much, namely, that undoubtedly it was the Church of the landlords. It may be said that all this has been corrected since 1884; and I know that Lord Chancellor Sullivan did place men of many classes, creeds, and callings on the Bench; but, after all, that is a matter of only 250. The Justices are still a landlord class, and it is idle to tell us that Boards of Guardians, composed to the extent of one-half of those men, can possibly be really representative bodies. Now, I earnestly hope that when the House goes into Committee on the Bill the Government, who have approached the question in a practical spirit and in a spirit of great moderation, will remember that this Bill actually passed the House of Commons four or five years ago. It is not a question which can be put aside on account of local government being a matter of the immediate future in Ireland, because obviously local government in England has been divorced from the District Councils, and consequently we can look on this as an isolated and separate measure. There is a growing feeling in England that Parish Councils ought to be established in order to enlist the interest of the labourers, and of the great mass of the rural population, in the administration of their villages; and I believe that if there is a personal supervision of Poor Law relief by the people, who have a strong personal interest in the objects of that relief, it will not only lead in many cases to a much more humane and kindly way of dealing with it, but to an increase of economy. I believe a like result, under similar circumstances, will follow in the normal and ordinary districts of Ireland. It is impossible to deny that in the last few years some things have been done by Boards of Guardians in Ireland which are exceptional and altogether outside the meaning of the law; but these are exceptional times, and we are legislating for times that some day or other will cease to be exceptional. In Ireland, as in England and Scotland, the more we popularise the administration of poor relief, the more we make the people understand it, and take a minute and personal local interest in it, the more we shall make it a system tolerably contributing to the real happiness of mankind.

(4.25.) COLONEL WARING: If I rightly understand what the Chief Secretary has stated that he does not accept the proposal to abolish proxy voting, or to diminish the number of ex officio guardians—I will ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

(4.26.) MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): The short speech of the hon. and gallant Member gives us an indication of the concessions made by the Chief Secretary. It seems that the concessions are of no importance whatever. The right hon. Gentleman's speech was such as we might have expected. This is a landlord government, and it is standing by the landlords through thick and thin; and, in refusing to abolish proxy voting, it is once more displaying landlord proclivities in a way that the House and the country ought thoroughly to understand. As to what fell from the hon. Member for Bow and Bromley (Sir J. Colomb), who asked whether there were any members of Irish Boards of Guardians amongst the Members who support the Bill, I would point out that Colonel Nolan, Mr. P. J. Power, Mr. P. J. O'Brien, Mr. William Abraham, and Mr. Sheehan are Chairmen of Boards of Guardians, and that the following either are or have been members of Boards—Mr. Pinkerton, Mr. Leahy, Mr. O'Hanlon, Mr. Jordan, Dr. Tanner, Mr. Gilhooly, Mr. Mahoney, Mr. T. Harrington, Mr. Marum, and Mr. Condon. But I think the hon. Member's argument in this respect utterly irrelevant, for it does not require men to be members of Boards of Guardians to discuss this Bill intelligently. The Chief Secretary saw the mistake of the hon. Gentleman when he adduced the moonlighting case in Clare, and gave away that part of his argument altogether. The cheer which went up from this side of the House when the hon. Member for Bow and Bromley was speaking was exactly such tation which the ex officio element have upon the Cork Board that the dissolution took place. According to the present law when a Board of Guardians is formed one half of it is ipso facto constituted of ex officio Guardians and opponents of what is known as the Nationalist Party in Ireland. It then only requires the party representing the landlords and the Tories, which are almost synonymous terms, to carry a single popular seat in order that they may have a majority and control of all matters connected with the Poor Law in Ireland. On the Cork Poor Law Board the non-representative element have been able by the use of their proxy votes and property votes to obtain this majority and put the whole control of the management of Poor Law affairs in the hands of the Tory Party. The Chairman is a Tory, the Vice-chairman is a Tory, and the Deputy Vice-Chairman is a Liberal Unionist. They have the Chair completely in their hands on all occasions, and on the day in question the difficulty which ended in the dissolution of the Board arose simply out of the wish on the part of the elected Guardians to pass a vote of congratulation to Mr. Parnell, one of the Representatives of the city, on his victory over the Times, which had endeavoured to ruin his character and reputation. I do not think any one in the House will deny that the elected Guardians representing the constituency of my hon. Friend were perfectly entitled to put on the records of the Board some indication of their feeling of rejoicing at the victory the leader of the Nationalist Party had secured. The Tory Chairman refused to take the resolution, refused to allow it to be entered on the Minutes of the Board, and the Nationalist Guardians insisted, so far as it was in their power, to place it on record. Will it be believed that because the elected representatives of the City of Cork tried to place on record their pleasure at the acquittal of Mr. Parnell from the abominable charges brought against him by the Times the whole of the Poor Law representation of the city and the Union of Cork has been abolished by the stroke of the pen of three gentlemen who are called the Local Government Board, and that the rate-payers of Cork are for the next 14 months to be deprived of any voice whatever in the management and disposal of their poor rates? Perhaps I may be permitted to acquaint the House that one of the first results of the dissolution of the Board was a public meeting of the citizens of Cork called by the Chief Magistrate. I have never seen a larger or a more representative gathering than that.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is hardly now dealing with the subject of the Bill.

*MR. LANE: I am referring to that part of the Bill which deals with representation.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is out of order in referring in such detail to questions connected with the dissolution of the Cork Board of Guardians.

*MR. LANE: I will bow, Sir, to your ruling, and simply add that, individually, I should be very sorry to stand up and support a Bill which recognises the principle of ex officio representation. I should be sorry to support a Bill which recognises the right of proxy voting, and I should be very sorry to support a Bill which recognises the right of multiple voting. I do not see why, in these democratic days, when the principle of one man one vote is becoming universal all over the world, and when that principle is practically applied at the present moment to the election of Members of Parliament, we should adopt a principle of ex officio representation in the case of Poor Law matters. However, the Bill is brought in by my Party, and as a matter of Party discipline I feel bound to support it. At the same time, I should be glad to see Amendments introduced in the Bill which would amend it in the opposite direction to that in which the Chief Secretary intimates he intends to amend it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.0.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The present system under which Guardians are elected undoubtedly gives by the multiple vote the preponderance of power to property, though I hold that the bulk of cases of maladministration in the Unions of Ireland. We invite him to an examination of those cases, for we can show that it is precisely in those places where the ex officio manage the affairs of the Unions that maladministration occurs. Take the case of the Cork Board of Guardians which was dissolved the other day. What was the immediate cause of the dissolution of that Board? It was that the ex officio or landlord party combined against the elected or popular party, and that a reactionary chairman refused to permit a political resolution to be put to the meeting. The ordinary business of the Board had to be postponed for a week, and the result was that the Local Government Board dissolved the whole Body. If the ex officio had exempted themselves the whole business would have been transacted. The right hon. Gentleman also referred in a mysterious way to some illegal results obtained by the popular party in Ireland. He said we had obtained our way not by statutory or by legal means. I do not know what he means. If any persons have been elected to Boards of Guardians by means that are not statutory and legal, why have not the elections been set aside? His course, he says, is plain and intelligible. It is. I agree with that description of the right hon. Gentleman's policy. His course is plain and intelligible, and it is to stand by the landlord party through thick and thin, right or wrong; and the fact that he here to-day refuses to accept the more important provisions of this Bill, or, that when he gets into Committee, he means to cut out of the measure all that is good, shows what he means to do when he comes to construct a scheme of local government for Ireland. We have been promised a scheme by which we shall be put on a footing of equality with England and Scotland as regards local affairs. It now seems that we shall have a scheme by which the most important details of local Irish administration will be left as hitherto in the hands of the minority in Ireland. That seems to be a pretty commentary on the success which the right hon. Gentleman thinks he has achieved by the enforcement of the Crimes Act. He himself has declared officially that the greater part of Ireland is now free from disturbance, and does not need the operation of the severe provisions of the Crimes Act; but he is still unable to assent in its entirety to such a Bill as this, because he believes the power it will confer on the people at large will be misused, and the minority will be oppressed. I suppose we shall have once more presented to us the spectacle of a measure of reform demanded by a majority of the people, supported, as it has been for 20 years, by a majority of the Irish Parliamentary Representatives, cut to pieces, and all for the sake of gratifying a small faction in Ireland which insists on retaining all the power in its own hands. I regret that the Second Reading is a mockery and delusion, and if I would be in order, I would be inclined to move that the Order be discharged so as to have the illusory promises of the Chief Secretary exposed in all their hideous nakedness.

*(4.48.) MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I did not intend to intervene in this Debate, as I am more interested in the Bill which stands third on the Paper, but to the statement that the Cork Board of Guardians broke up the other day without having finished the work which was on the notice paper of that day, I wish to give the most unqualified contradiction. No doubt the last sitting of the Board of Guardians was a most stormy one, and one which was protracted for a great number of hours beyond the usual period of sitting; and I have no hesitation in saying that many things took place at that meeting, and many things were said that I would much have preferred had been left undone and unsaid. But it is only right that it should be said here that before the Nationalist Guardians of the Cork Board adjourned upon the day in question they disposed of every item of Poor Law work upon the agenda paper. Great capital has been made by our opponents in politics out of the suppression, or, as it is called, dissolution of the Cork Board of Guardians, and it has been sought to instance it as an example of the incapacity of Irishmen to deal with local affairs. A more misleading use was never made of what I must characterise as an unjustifiable act on the part of the Authorities of Dublin Castle. It was entirely owing to the enormous representation which the ex officio element have upon the Cork Board that the dissolution took place. According to the present law when a Board of Guardians is formed one half of it is ipso facto constituted of ex officio Guardians and opponents of what is known as the Nationalist Party in Ireland. It then only requires the party representing the landlords and the Tories, which are almost synonymous terms, to carry a single popular seat in order that they may have a majority and control of all matters connected with the Poor Law in Ireland. (5.0.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The present system under which Guardians are elected undoubtedly gives by the multiple vote the preponderance of power to property, though I hold that the bulk of the rates is paid by the workers. Now, when we turn to municipal elections we do not find any such principle recognised; we do not allow plural voting or a property vote except in the case of freeholds. I would appeal to the Attorney General will he not use his influence to get applied to these elections the same principle of representation as is recognised in municipal affairs? The work of municipal government is well carried on, and there is no necessity found for ex officio members. There are merchants who pay many thousands of pounds in reference to certain duties, but that does not give them a multiple vote. If you admit this principle there, I do not see why you should exclude it from other positions in life. The fact is, this ex officio and multiple vote system has been condemned for years, and I have heard even strong Tories in the North of Ireland condemn the system. I remember on one occasion there was an election in an electoral division of Armagh, and the Protestant Primate held 18 votes. The voting papers got as far as the gates of his house, but they never got any further, though they were returned duly signed, and were recorded. Will not the hon. and learned Attorney General use his influence to put an end to scandals of this kind? He, as head of the legal administration in Ireland, and a prominent member of his party, might use his influence with effect. I do not wish to accept the decision of the Chief Secretary as final, and I think the Attorney General might yet use his influence. I know, of course, how a man's opinions are trammelled by his official position; but I am sure, if it were put to him in his private capacity, the learned Gentleman would admit that there is no more reason for ex officio seats on these Boards than on municipalities or in the House of Commons. In Ireland these ex officio members are all nominees of Dublin Castle; that is to say, that Dublin Castle has as much representation as the whole of the ratepayers of Ireland put together, and not only so, but the influence of these ex officio members is greatly increased by the exercise of the multiple vote. The usual way, as the Attorney General very well knows, is for the landlords with their agents, who are ex officio members and magistrates, to have proxies left with them. I am sure in future days, when this reform is granted, the Attorney General will have cause to congratulate himself should he have had a hand in bringing it about. We can claim something from the Tory Party. They have declared that, setting aside the great dividing question of the day, all Irish grievances shall be attended to. Now, this Bill embodies a few matters earnestly desired by the ratepayers, and here is an opportunity for the Tory Party to make good their declaration. We cannot be accused of being precipitate in our demands. Eighteen years ago the Ballot was adopted, and it cannot be said its adoption has been attended with the slightest harm, in Parliamentary or municipal elections.

(5.10.) MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): The Chief Secretary expressed himself as being at considerable loss to know what the central principle of this Bill is. The central principle of the Bill is to extend in some degree, and only in a very slight degree, popular representation on the Poor Law Boards in Ireland. As I understood the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, the promises he made as to some parts of the Bill he proposes to accept, and his remarks on those parts he proposes to reject, and the unfitness of popular representation in Ireland to conduct Irish affairs—as I understand the general tone of his speech, it amounts to this: that he will not sanction the principle of popular representation extended to Poor Law Boards. Those parts of the Bill he is willing to agree to are provisions which, no doubt, would be useful, but they would not have any material effect in extending popular representation on these Boards. He objects to the abolition of the proxy vote and to the reduction of the number of ex officio members; but these are the material parts of the Bill as affecting representation. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be under the impression that in England the number of ex officio Guardians is the same in proportion to elected Guardians as in Ireland; but I am informed that in this country the proportion is the same as that we propose in the Bill it should be—a quarter of the total number, or a third of the number of elected Guardians. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the Liberal principle that representation and taxation should go together; and it is true that principle has been adopted in many cases, but the principle does not go so far as to declare that representation shall be in proportion to taxation. If such a principle were carried out to its fullest extent, we should have a man who pays £100 in taxation with a hundred times the representation of the man who only pays £1 in taxation. Such a principle as that was banished from our legislation long ago. Ex officio members have, as has been pointed out, enormous power as the representatives of property; but, in addition, they have enormous power under the system of plural votes. In the Union where I happened to be an ex officio member, I am aware of the fact that some time ago, though it does not exist now, there were more property votes than all the occupation votes put together, so that the property qualification outweighed the occupation opinion, and could set it at defiance, while in addition it had the representation by ex officio members on the Board. In rural parts of Ireland, and in small towns which come under the Towns Improvement Act, Boards of Guardians are the Sanitary Authority, who dispense all the medical relief in the district, and the number and extent of the duties and responsibilities they discharge are very great and closely bound up with the conditions of rural life. The people who receive benefit from the administration of these Boards, although not large rate-payers, have a right to a considerable voice in the representation on the Boards. Now, the Chief Secretary gave as a reason why he did not think the extension of popular government in Ireland in the direction of making Poor Law Boards more popular was desirable, the maladministration of some Poor Law Boards. He did not go into particulars, or dwell on this point, and if he had done so, it would no doubt have given rise to a more or less acrimonious debate, for it is a subject upon which much friction has been excited and much comment provoked throughout Ireland. I can speak from knowledge and personal acquaintance with administration of these Boards, and I am bound to say I take an entirely different and wholly opposite view to that of the right hon. Gentleman. There are cases of maladministration, no doubt, and unpleasant and regrettable scenes occur, but they are few and far between. One of these scenes may occur, and, making amusing reading in the English Press, is placarded from one end of the kingdom to the other, and so an impression is created that is unfair to Irish Boards of Guardians generally. In the great majority of cases where the proceedings at a Board meeting are in the nature of what newspapers call a "scene," they arise from the fact of the chairman of the Board not being in sympathy with the working majority thereon. On the day of election of chairman the ex officio Guardians attend in force, and, combining with the small number of elected Guardians who agree with them, appoint the chairman of their choice. But from that day until the end of the year, unless there happens to be an appointment of a medical officer to be made, or some job to be perpetrated, the majority, who put in the chairman, disappear until the time for another election of chairman comes round. The result is, you have a chairman entirely out of sympathy with the usual business majority of the Board. The chairman has very considerable power in administration and in the arrangement of business, and nearly all these scenes have occurred from the refusal of the chairman to act in conformity with the wishes of the majority of Guardians present at the meeting. But if the Chief Secretary's opinion is such as he has expressed to-day what becomes of the Local Government proposals of the Government? Are they going only to give such a measure of popular representation as is now allowed in Poor Law administration? I hardly think that can be so, consistently with the promise that the Local Government Bill for Ireland shall be on the lines of the measures accorded to England and Scotland. Why not make the small concession asked for in this Bill? If you will not abolish ex officio members altogether, then reduce the proportion from a half to a third. Deprived of this the Bill is not worth accepting. No doubt election by Ballot would prevent many scandals that now occur. I have seen the policeman going out with the papers, and followed by agents for the landlord party and three or four members of the National Party, and in the house where a paper is left there is a contest over it. It is a scandal that there should be this state of things, but still I say it is not worth proceeding with the Bill unless you deal with ex officio members and proxy voting, and make these Boards more representative of the people for whom the Poor Law is administered.

(5.15.) Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. SEXTON: As a matter of order, Sir, is it competent for me now to move the discharge of the Order?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is possible for the hon. Member to move that the Committee on the Bill be deferred, and it will be competent for him, on the Order for Committee to move that the Bill be withdrawn.

MR. SEXTON: Can I do that now, Sir?

*MR. SPEAKER: The proper course would be for the hon. Member to move it on the particular day for which the Committee may be set down.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to move that the Committee be taken this day six months.

Ordered, That the Bill be committed for this day six months.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS (IRELAND) HOURS OF SALE BILL.—(No. 44.)

SECOND READING.

(5.20.) Order for Second Reading, read.

MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): Owing to a lamentable event, the death of our beloved Colleague, the late Mr. Biggar, it falls to my lot to introduce this Bill. It is a Bill of two clauses, and proposes a very small alteration in the laws regulating the sale of intoxicating liquors in Ireland. It requires no speech to recommend it to the House, or to explain its provisions, so I content myself with formally moving the Second Reading.

(5.21.) MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to second the Motion for Second Reading, and in doing so would join with hon. Members on the other side in regretting the very sudden loss sustained by the House in the death of one of its Members, who, differing widely from myself in politics, always was on kindly terms with his political opponents, and ready to co-operate with us on matters such as this. I will not occupy the short time we have by any observations. Mr. Biggar asked me to put my name on the Bill, and I did so with the greatest pleasure.

(5.22.) MR. P. McDONALD (Sligo, N.): In rising to move an Amendment, deferring the Bill for six months, I, in the first place, express my entire concurrence with the expressions that have fallen from the Mover and Seconder in reference to the death of my friend, the late Mr. Biggar. I do not think there is a single Member on this side, and, I think there can be a very few on the other side of the House, who do not agree in expressing regret for the loss of our beloved Colleague. In reference to the Bill, I will only say that I do not think there is any serious intention on the part of its promoters to carry it further than the present stage. I look upon it as merely an anticipation of the Bill of the hon. Member for South Belfast; in fact, a pilot balloon sent up to gauge the current of public opinion on this subject. I can assure the hon. Member that the current of public opinion is not in his favour. I must admit there are a very large number of Gentlemen in the House who will give him their support; but I gather that there are a still larger number entirely opposed to any coercive legislation on this subject. This Bill proposes that licensed traders in Ireland shall close their establishments from nine in the evening until nine the following morning, while their fellow-traders in England are allowed to carry on business during 18 hours out of the

24. I do not see the equity or necessity for such a proposal; and I move that the Bill be read this day six months.

(5.24.) Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. Peter McDonald.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

(5.25.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): In rising to support the Amendment of my hon. Friend, I must also join with those who have preceded me in expressing regret for the death of our late lamented friend and Colleague Mr. Biggar. As much as Mr. Biggar differed from the hon. Gentlemen opposite on many points, he and I differed on this question now occupying the attention of the House, but I must say in all these differences of opinion my late friend ever bore himself with a kindly, courteous demeanour towards his opponents and with respect for their opinions. I am surprised that the Party with whom my late friend acted should introduce a Bill of this character outside and beyond the scope of that inquiry instituted some few months ago and upon the result of which they base their hopes of legislation for restricting the sale of intoxicating liquors. Yet I must admit that I welcome the introduction of this Bill, because I believe the more drastic the measures proposed, the less chance have they of passing this House. The proposal in the Bill is so unreasonable that it is scarcely necessary to argue against it to secure its rejection by the House. However, if the measure is to be discussed, the Report of the Committee and the evidence taken by that Committee, which is before the House, will materially assist us to a decision.

It being half an hour after Five of the clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday, 3rd March.

COUNTY COUNCILS ASSOCIATION EXPENSES BILL.—(No. 152.)

Resolutions [25th February] reported.

Resolution 1. [See page 1,177.]

VOTE OFFICE OF WORKS.

*(5.36.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): Before this Vote is passed I should like to ask if the Government have taken into consideration the desirability of appointing a Committee to inquire into the supply of labour in this building and other Government premises by means of contractors who deduct part of the workmen's wages. I have raised the question in previous years, and I hope the Government have now made up their minds.

*(5.37.) MR. JACKSON: The subject is under consideration. Her Majesty's Government are most anxious to find a remedy for the present unsatisfactory system, and are in hopes of being able to do so shortly.

*MR. CREMER: Nearly eight months ago we were told the matter was receiving the serious consideration of the Government. It takes them a long time to make up their minds. Will the Government appoint the Committee of Inquiry which they had promised me last year? The question is of great importance to the working classes, as all this time serious deductions are being made from the workpeople's wages.

*MR. JACKSON: I can only repeat the Government are endeavouring to find a solution of the difficulty.

*MR. CREMER: If a new arrangement is effected will the House have an opportunity of discussing it?

*(5.38.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The negotiations which have been going on have not reached such a stage as enables me to make any definite statement regarding them. Of course the hon. Member will have an opportunity of discussing the matter when the Estimates for the year are brought on.

Resolutions 2 to 15 agreed to.

*(5.40.) MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I desire again to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, and I do so on account of the extraordinary attitude adopted by the Under Secretary and the First Lord of the Treasury towards the House on this Vote yesterday. The House was asked to grant a sum of £2,700 for the expenses of the Swaziland Commission, but Her Majesty's Government declined to enter into any discussion of this Vote, on the ground that Sir Francis de Winton's Report had not been considered and they had not made up their minds as to the policy to be pursued. Nevertheless we were asked to vote the money. I asked Her Majesty's Government to undertake that Sir Francis de Winton's Report would be laid on the Table before the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool came on for discussion, and that no final decision should be arrived at by Her Majesty's Government as to the policy to be pursued until after the discussion on this Motion had taken place. But both these requests were refused, somewhat curtly, and the Under Secretary and the First Lord of the Treasury laid down the doctrine that this House could not discuss this matter until it had been settled by the Colonial Office. The First Lord said that then, if the action of the Colonial Office was not approved by the House, Her Majesty's Government might be censured. Yes, we might censure the Government, but we could not undo the policy after it had been settled upon, and after despatches had been sent out ordering its execution. I want to know what becomes of the control of the House over the administration of the Colonies. I insist upon the constitutional and indefeasible right not only to control and criticise, but to guide and shape the Colonial policy of the country. I maintain that the doctrine laid down by the Colonial Under Secretary and the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury is not a sound one, nor in accordance with the best traditions of the Colonial Office. Every important step in colonial policy; such, for instance, as the suppression of the slave trade in the West Indies and the granting of a Constitution to Canada, has been the result of animated and protracted debates in this House, and if we accept the proposition laid down by the right hon. Gentlemen, the control of this House over the colonial policy of the Empire will be a delusion, a sham, and a farce. Why should the Government refuse to give the undertaking asked of them? After all, they are only an Executive Committee of this House. I maintain that the Government is simply the organ of the majority of this House. That is the sound Constitutional doctrine, and in my opinion the Government ought to be very glad to learn the wishes of hon. Gentlemen in all parts of the House on this most important question. I cannot but think that I am asking nothing unreasonable when I do most earnestly press upon the Government again to say they will not arrive at a decision regarding Swaziland until after the Motion of the hon. Member for Liverpool has been thoroughly debated.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I must say I am astonished at the definition of Government given by the hon. Member. It is one of the strangest ever enunciated in this House or out of it. The hon. Member must be aware that in any Government, and especially in Party Government, the Ministry of the day are alone responsible not only for colonial, but for Imperial Policy, and if that policy, after being decided on, does not meet with the views of the Parliamentary majority, then it is open to that majority to express its disapproval. But to lay down the doctrine that the responsibility of deciding upon a great colonial or other policy is to be removed from the shoulders of Her Majesty's advisers to the House of Commons, is to lay down a principle which no Government ever has or ever can adopt. I can only repeat the answer I gave last night—that it is impossible for the Government to consent to postpone the consideration of their policy in Swaziland until the subject has been fully considered by the House of Commons. When the Government have arrived at their decision then it will be for the House of Commons to express approval or disapproval of it.

IRELAND—CASE OF HENRY O'CONNOR.

On the Motion for adjournment,

MR. SEXTON: I desire at this the earliest possible opportunity to bring to the notice of the Attorney General for Ireland a fact which has just come to my knowledge. Very recently, in Ireland, Henry O'Connor, the sub-editor of the Leinster Leader, was tried before two removable magistrates upon a charge of having published in a newspaper a report of the proceedings of a branch of the National League. He was convicted and sentenced to a month's imprisonment. The magistrates refused to state a case, but the matter was brought before the Court of Queen's Bench on mandamus, and the conviction was squashed, while the Court, to mark their sense of the conduct of the magistrates who had been guilty of the illegal imprisonment and conviction, ordered process against them. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Irish Government will consider the desirability of granting compensation to O'Connor, who was kept in prison five days. And as one of the magistrates, Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, was the person who, at Clongorey, within the last few days, convicted Father Kinsella and 17 artisans and sent them to prison on a charge of disobedience to a precept which it now appears was not legally served, I wish to know if the Government will give a particular scrutiny to these proceedings with a view to ordering the release of Father Kinsella and the 17 artisans from prison?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I think the hon Member will see that the questions he has asked are of such a nature that I could not answer them now. I would ask him to give notice of them.

House adjourned at five minutes before six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 27th February, 1890.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

Report from the Committee of Chairmen of Standing Committees, That they have (in pursuance of Standing Order No. L.) appointed the Lord Herschell Chairman of the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c., and the Earl of Kimberley Chairman of the Standing Committee for General Bills; read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

PARTNERSHIP BILL.—(No. 25.)

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, I need only say that it is a Bill which has been committed to one of the Grand Committees, the Law Committee. It is for the very desirable object of defining some branches of the law applicable to partnership. That is the scheme of the Bill—not a very easy task—in the first place; then to settle the legal relations between persons who are partners and persons dealing with them; then to settle the relations of the partners themselves; and then to deal with the question of dissolution and the consequences of it. I do not know that I should assist your Lordships by going further into a question which is so highly technical than is necessary for the purpose of describing its general object. The draft of the Bill has been most carefully prepared, and I may state that I have had the very valuable assistance of Lord Justice Lindley in framing the various clauses. I have no doubt that the measure will be thoroughly considered in Committee by your Lordships' House.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I need hardly say that I do not intend in any way to oppose this Bill; but, on the contrary, I heartily support the proposal for its Second Reading, inasmuch as it is substantially the measure which I asked your Lordships to read a second time at the close of last Session of Parliament. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack on that occasion intimated that, in his view, any measure of this description ought to be introduced by the Government of the day, and by them alone; and that any attempt at codification by any private Member was a usurpation of the prerogatives of the Government. I dissented on that occasion from the view of my noble and learned Friend, and I repeat that dissent to-day, seeing that the only successful measure of codification has been one that was introduced by a private Member. But if the Government of the day are willing to undertake the task, I need hardly say that I am well satisfied, and that I will give them every assistance in passing it into law.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

House adjourned at half past Four o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 27th February, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

ARTISANS' DWELLINGS.

MR. SALT (Stafford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is able to produce any statistics, or to lay any Reports upon the Table of the House, that will give reliable information as to the effect of the erection of artisans' dwellings, and of street improvements, during recent years, upon the poorest and most crowded portions of the population, who cannot afford to pay more than 1s. or 1s. 6d. per week for house accommodation?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have endeavoured to collect information on this subject, and have made inquiries in various quarters, but they do not enable me to produce statistics, or to lay a Report upon the Table of a complete or reliable nature. I have no better information than was elicited by the Royal Commission on the Housing of the Working Classes, by whom, as my hon. Friend is doubtless aware, the subject of street improvements is dealt with, and full use is made of previous inquiries by the Select Committee of this House in 1881-2.

THE STAFF COLLEGE.

SIR RICHARD PAGET (Somerset, Wells): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is a fact that, though officers after entering the Staff College are permitted to study and pass out in Turkish, no provision is made for award of marks in Turkish at the entrance examination of the College; and whether, in view of the importance of encouraging the study of a wider range of modern languages, he will consider the advisability of placing Turkish on the same footing as that now occupied by Hindustani and Russian in the entrance examinations of the Staff College?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln, Horncastle): No provision is made at the Staff College either for the study of Turkish or for passing out in that language. The object of the College is primarily the advancement of knowledge of specific military science rather than of languages. Great importance is, however, attached to the knowledge of languages, and rewards of considerable value are offered to officers passing in them, but not through the Staff College.

In reply to a further question by Sir R. PAGET,

*MR. E. STANHOPE said he should be glad to have the study of the Turkish language placed on the same footing in regard to War Office appointments as Hindustani and Russian.

THE SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANIES.

MR. BAUMANN (Camberwell, Peckham): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will lay upon the Table all correspondence that has passed between the Board of Trade and the four southern Railway Companies with reference to the return of the running of their passenger trains recently presented to Parliament; whether he will find out if it is the custom of the southern Railway Companies to keep analyses of the punctuality of their trains, abstracted at regular intervals, for the information of the officers and the directors; and, if not, whether he will ascertain from what sources the figures in the above return were compiled; and, in the case of the South-Eastern Railway in particular, whether the times of arrival were taken at Cannon Street and Charing Cross respectively, or only as far as London Bridge?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have no objection to lay on the Table the correspondence with the four southern Railway Companies with regard to the running of their trains. I understand from the South-Eastern Railway, the London and South-Western Railway, and the London, Brighton, and South Coast Railway Companies that they do not make any abstracts or analyses of the punctuality of their trains. The figures in the Return were compiled from the guards' daily reports. The South-Eastern Railway Company further state that the times of arrival were taken at Charing Cross and Cannon Street respectively, and not at London Bridge.

BOMBAY—FACTORY LABOUR.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether any action has yet been taken on the Report of the Commission appointed to inquire into the grievances of the factory workers in Bombay; whether he is aware that the average time worked in the Indian cotton mills is 80 hours per week, as against 56 hours in Lancashire, and that great indignation exists among the Lancashire operatives at the competition to which they are exposed by labour working 80 hours per week in one part of the Empire while they are restricted by law to 56 hours; whether he is aware that, on 24th October last year, a petition was sent to the Indian Government by the Bombay factory workers asking for a reduction of their excessive hours of labour, and that in the future they claim that all mill hands be allowed one day's rest on Sunday, and that half an hour's rest be allowed them at noon; that all mills should commence work at 6.30 a.m., and cease working at sunset; and that compensation should be afforded for accidents; whether he is aware that very young children are employed 80 hours per week, to the extreme detriment of their health; whether he is aware that one mill manager writes—

"That he had seen children so small, working 80 hours per week, that he had taken them up in his arms, put them in the scales, and found them to weigh from 42 to 45 pounds only," and that factory managers in Bombay who have had experience of slavery in South America say that such slavery is mild compared with that which exists in the factory system of Bombay; and whether the Government will undertake that the recommendations of the Factory Commission shall promptly be carried out?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham):

My answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. A Bill on the lines stated last Session in Parliamentary Paper 162 was introduced into the Indian Legislature on the 31st of January last. My answer to the second paragraph of the question is that the hours of labour of adult males in India are as unrestricted as they are in Lancashire. My answer to the third paragraph is that such a petition may have been received by the Government of India, who would give it every consideration, but it has not been forwarded to the Secretary of State. My answer to the fourth paragraph of the hon. Member's question is that according to the existing law no child can be employed in Indian factories for more than 54 hours a week, and the Secretary of State cannot understand how such a case as that described in paragraph 5 can have occurred. But if the hon. Member will furnish his authority the Secretary of State will cause inquiry to be made. In regard to the last paragraph of the question the Bill for commending the Indian Factory Act in the sense I have indicated is now before the Indian Legislature.

*MR. S. SMITH: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that the Bill now before the Government of India raises the ages of children entering mills from 7 to 9 years, and allows them to work 11 hours a day, from 9 to 12, while in Lancashire they only work 5½ hours a day?

SIR J. GORST: I am afraid that I cannot answer any question as to the contents of the Bill in question without notice. The hon. Member had better put a notice down on the Paper.

*MR. C. GRAHAM (Lanark, N. W.): Do I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that no restriction in regard to the hours of labour exists in India? Is it in his power to advise the Indian Government to introduce some law whereby Her Majesty's subjects in different parts of the Empire shall not be reduced to slavery?

SIR J. GORST: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to give me notice of that question.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACT—THE LAINETER.

MR. JARVIS (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if his attention has been drawn to the prosecution of William Laine, captain of a Foreign ship named the Laineter (as reported in the Shipping Gazette of 17th February), who was charged at King's Lynn with breaking the Merchant Shipping Act by carrying a deck cargo of 32,000 cubic feet of pitch pine, which would weigh about 32 tons; and why the Board of Trade was content with so small a penalty as £5 and costs for the infringement of English Law when he was liable to a penalty of £5 per ton, and it is probable that a much larger sum had been made by breaking the law?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: My attention has been called to the newspaper report to which the hon. Member refers with regard to the prosecution of the captain of the Laineter. It is in more than one respect inaccurate. The deck cargo consisted of 3,200 (not 32,000) cubic feet, and the maximum penalty under the Act is £100. The representative of the Board of Trade did not press for a heavier penalty than £5, because it was the first offence of the kind for which the master had been summoned. He was prosecuted summarily, and the magistrates in their discretion imposed that penalty and costs.

RABBIT COURSING.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the continuance of the practice of rabbit coursing, particularly to what took place at the Crown Inn at Saltford on 3rd February, as narrated in the Bath Chronicle of 13th

February, in which the proceedings are thus described—

“Each round being a match between two dogs, a couple of terriers were let loose and set on a rabbit, which they seized. One dog was tearing the live rabbit on the side of the head and body, whilst the second dog fixed its teeth in the flesh on the other side, both dogs pulling at the rabbit in opposite directions, till the unfortunate animal was torn, mangled, and worried to death. In some instances the rabbits' backs were broken by the dogs; and again a mutilated and half-dead rabbit was carried round the field for five minutes in the dog's mouth. About a hundred rabbits were maimed and subsequently worried to death in this manner;”

and whether he will now re-consider his statement of 9th August, 1889, and introduce legislation to render such practices illegal?

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Isle of Thanet): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers that question I should like to ask him whether his attention has been called to the fact that in the North of England coursing, and especially rabbit coursing, conducted under recognised and established regulations, affords pastime to large masses of the industrial population who are unable to indulge in more expensive forms of sport; and whether he considers it desirable, on ex parte statements, to commit the House to an opinion on the subject?

MR. BUCHANAN: May I further ask the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary whether he has not received Petitions on the subject not merely from the West of England, but also from the North of England, complaining of the gross cruelty which goes on in connection with this so-called sport.

MR. MATTHEWS: I have directed the Chief Constable to make inquiry and report as to the allegations contained in the paragraph quoted. Legislation on the subject of cruelty to wild animals is surrounded with difficulties, and I cannot promise to introduce it. I feel confident, however, that public opinion is growing on the question, and will not tolerate that cruelties should be permitted in the name of sport. With regard to the question put by my right hon. Friend, I am not acquainted with the habits of the population in the North of England with regard to rabbit coursing.

Mr. Buchanan

PRESUMPTION OF LIFE LIMITATION (SCOTLAND) ACT.

MR. BUCHANAN: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he has received communications complaining that “The Presumption of Life Limitation (Scotland) Act, 1881,” is in great measure inoperative; and whether he will introduce a Bill this Session to amend that Act?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Bute): I have recently received a communication to the effect stated in the question of the hon. Member. I cannot at present give any undertaking as to the introduction of an amending Bill this Session, and this must depend upon the progress of other business.

POST OFFICE ORDERS.

MR. LEATHAM BRIGHT (Stoke-upon-Trent): I beg to ask the Junior Lord of the Treasury whether it is a fact that a post office order signed by an agent of the Government is not a negotiable security; whether the Government are aware that a serious case has occurred in New Zealand of an advance of money having been made against post office orders, the payment of which money was repudiated; whether the Government is aware that the credit of the Post Office has suffered severely in the Colony by the above case of Mr. Cairns, of Auckland; and whether the Government will take any steps to remedy the grievance?

*A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigtonshire): With the permission of the hon. Member, I shall reply to the question. The Post Office is not in possession of any information as to the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member; but if he will be good enough to give the Postmaster General the particulars of the case which he has in view he will be happy to cause inquiry to be made on the subject. Under the regulations governing the exchange of money orders between the United Kingdom and the colonies money orders are not negotiable. They are payable only to the persons in whose favour they are drawn by the senders, unless they are passed through a bank. This is not so much a matter for the British as for the New Zealand Post Office, which has the power to make its own regulations, subject, of course, to any agreement made with this country.

BI-METALLISM.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it is true that repeated applications were made to Mr. Giffen by the Royal Commission on Gold and Silver to assist them in their investigations into the theory and practice of Bi-metallism; and whether Mr. Giffen declined to give such assistance; and, if so, upon what grounds?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: There is nothing in the Report of the Commissioners which in any way suggests that they considered that Mr. Giffen did not render them all the assistance they required from him in their inquiry which is not, I think, accurately described by the hon. Member as an investigation into the theory and practice of Bi-metallism. As a matter of fact, he gave two days' elaborate evidence, besides assisting them in other ways in his official character. I am, however, informed by Mr. Giffen that he was subsequently asked to go beyond this and to appear before them as the champion of Monometallism. He considered this to be outside his official duty, and was left free by Lord Stanley, then President of the Board of Trade, to decline the request, which he did, mainly for reasons of a private character.

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): Before Mr. Giffen published a series of letters in the Times commenting on the Report of the Royal Commission, did he ask and receive permission of his official superiors in the Board of Trade?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I understand that Mr. Giffen, when he accepted the office which he at present holds with great advantage to the Public Service, stipulated that he should be allowed to write on subjects outside his official duties, and his stipulation was conceded. He therefore did not ask my permission before publishing these letters; but it appears to me that the publication of the letters has been very much to the advantage of the Public Service.

IRELAND—THE QUEEN'S COLLEGES.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen the statement of the Educational Committee of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in Ireland, just issued, dealing with the system of education in the Queen's Colleges, and the relation of Presbyterians to Queen's College, Belfast, in which it is stated that—

“The education imparted in the Queen's Colleges” is “undenominational and unsectarian;” and “as to the Queen's College, Belfast, Presbyterians have no rights or privileges whatever in connection with it that Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, and Methodists have not;”

whether he is aware that, in consequence of the growing prosperity of Queen's College, Belfast, some of the class-rooms are now too small and need to be enlarged, and other improvements are necessary to the efficiency of the college; and whether, considering the serious disadvantages under which the college thus labours from want of proper accommodation and equipment, he will consider the propriety of recommending a Government grant to promote such enlargement as the success of the college and the growth of Belfast render necessary?

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg also to ask the Chief Secretary if his attention had been recently drawn to the urgent necessity that exists for a grant to be made to the Queen's College, Belfast, for the purpose of extending its accommodation and perfecting its equipment; and considering that large Government grants had lately been given to the Scotch Colleges and the Royal University in Dublin, and having regard to the fact that the City of Belfast contributes so largely to the Imperial revenue, would he give some assurance that an outlay would be sanctioned adequate to extend the accommodation so as to enable the Professors to discharge their duties to the students under their control in some other way than, as at present, in detachments?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I will answer the question of the hon. Member for East Belfast at the same time. I believe it to be the fact, as stated in the question, that the deficient accommodation in Queen's College, Belfast, is a source of inconvenience, and I am also aware that the college, like the city in which it is situated, is growing in size and prosperity.

If the alterations desired by my hon. Friends are merely of the relatively restricted kind contemplated as being from time to time necessary under the Statutes by which the Queen's Colleges were established, questions relating to them should be addressed to the Minister who answers for the Board of Works. If, on the other hand, some larger scheme is contemplated, such as I myself would desire to see carried into effect, I am afraid it will not be possible for me to make proposals on the subject to Parliament until some agreement is arrived at with regard to the difficult problems connected with higher education in Ireland.

CROFTER EMIGRANTS TO MANITOBA.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the statements in the Canadian newspapers, that "great destitution exists among the crofters recently settled in Manitoba;" whether the Rev. Dr. Robertson, the superintendent of the North-West Presbyterian Missions, has appealed to the public in Canada for aid to these distressed settlers; whether the statement of the Rev. Dr. Robertson, that some of the crofter settlers are from 65 to 70 years of age, and some were in bad health before leaving Scotland, are accurate; whether St. Andrew's Presbyterian Church at Toronto has opened a fund for clothing and money to relieve the destitute crofters; and whether the Government intend to take any action in the matter?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: When the statements referred to in the first part of the question appeared in the newspapers the Colonization Board at once telegraphed for information, and the reply stated that there was no foundation for the reports. The Government are not aware that any such appeal as is mentioned in the second part of the question was made. The statement in the third query is inaccurate. Only one emigrant is over 60 years of age, his age being 64. The crofters were apparently in good health when they started, and are now reported to be in vigorous health. The Government have no information to show that a fund has been opened at Toronto as suggested; but the clothing of some of the crofters has been supplemented by contributions from Winnipeg.

Mr. A. J. Balfour

The Government do not think it necessary to take any action on the reports referred to.

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISEMENTS IN IRELAND.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been drawn to the following letter, alleged to have been sent to the editor of the Carlow Nationalist in reply to an application made by that gentleman to the Commissioners of Irish Fisheries for advertisements for his newspaper:—

"Office of Irish Fisheries,

"Dublin Castle, 21st Feb. 1889.

"Sir,—I have received instructions to inform you, in reference to your letter of the 18th ultimo, that you are under a misapprehension in supposing that the advocacy of particular political opinions is any reason for giving or withholding Government advertisements, and that, if such advertisements have been withheld from the Nationalist and Leinster Times, it was solely because that paper continued to violate the law.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"M. P. DOWLING.

"P. J. Conlan, Esq., Nationalist and Leinster Times, Carlow."

Whether he will state the name of the official or Member of the Government who instructed this letter to be written; whether he will explain how the Carlow Nationalist continues to violate the law; and whether any instructions, and, if any, what instructions have been issued to the Government Departments in Ireland to inquire into the character of the contents of newspapers in that country before giving or refusing those newspapers public advertisements?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The letter mentioned was written by direction of the Government. The newspaper in question continues to violate the law by publishing the alleged proceedings of the local branch of the National League, which has been suppressed in that district as an unlawful Association. Government advertisements are not given to any newspaper which violates the law. Departments are so instructed.

MR. CLANCY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered any of the questions I put to him. Have any instructions been issued by the Government on this subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I thought I had answered the hon. Gentleman's questions when I stated that I was responsible for the action of the Government. I stated that the Carlow Nationalist had offended against the law by reporting the proceedings of a suppressed meeting.

MR. CLANCY: If the Carlow Nationalist violated the law, why has it not been prosecuted?

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As this is a matter which occurred about a year ago, may I ask how long the official boycotting of an Irish newspaper is to continue, and by whose authority this course of action has been decided upon?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Instead of being a year ago the last offence was committed on the 8th of February.

MR. SEXTON: This year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not inquired into the facts; but if the hon. Gentleman says there is any doubt I will do so.

FAIR RENTS.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that nearly 50 tenants living in the district of Rush, County Dublin, lodged nearly two years ago applications to have fair rents fixed, and have since been unable to get their cases heard by the Land Commission; and, if so, whether any steps will be taken to expedite the hearing of the cases of those tenants, and of other tenants in the County of Dublin who have served originating notices?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners report that there are but 57 cases outstanding from the whole union of Balrothery, County Dublin, which includes the Rush district referred to, in respect of which applications to fix judicial rents were received prior to the 31st of December, 1888. A Sub-Commission will again sit for cases from this union at an early date. The Commissioners are making every exertion to have outstanding cases disposed of.

DEATH FROM VACCINATION.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that Emily Maud Child, an infant, whose parents live at Arthington, near Leeds, was vaccinated on 26th March, 1889, when three months old, and died on 1st July, 1889, but previously to vaccination the child was perfectly healthy; and whether a medical examination proved that the parents were perfectly healthy too; and at the inquest subsequently held, the jury found a verdict in accordance with the medical evidence, that "the deceased died from syphilis acquired at or from vaccination;" whether the mother specially requested that calf lymph might be used in the vaccination; whether the gentleman who performed the operation, according to his own words at the inquest, "avoided the question by saying it would be pure lymph;" and whether the Local Government Board has made any inquiry into this case; and, if so, whether the evidence so obtained will be laid before the Royal Commission on Vaccination now sitting?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am aware of the facts as regards the child referred to in the question. The child was, as I understand, vaccinated on the 26th of March, 1889. The age is recorded as four months. According to the evidence at the inquest the child was healthy prior to vaccination, and there was no evidence before the coroner that the parents were not healthy. The medical evidence at the inquest was that the weight of evidence was in favour of the view that the syphilis was acquired and not congenital. The verdict of the jury was as stated. The facts as regards the request of the mother, and the statement of the vaccinator as to the lymph, appear to be substantially the same as those given in the question. An inquiry has been made by an Inspector of the Board with regard to the case. His conclusions are not the same as those arrived at at the inquest. He states that the child in question was the only sufferer from subsequent syphilis among all the children he reached and whom he saw that had been vaccinated with the same or any other lymph in the whole course of the vaccinator's March vaccinations; and, further, that the entire family to which the alleged vaccinifer belonged were, as far as he could discover by examination of them, free from any syphilitic taint or suspicion of such taint. The Report of the Inspector will be at the disposal of the Royal Commission on Vaccination.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman explain what we are to understand by the term "pure lymph?"

*MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid that it would take up too much of the time of the House to enter into an explanation.

IRELAND—TREATMENT OF JOHN DALY.

MR. WILLIAM O'BRIEN (Cork, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the nature of the inquiry he has instituted into the prison treatment of John Daly, and what is the result; and, whether, having regard to the admitted fact that an overdose of belladonna was administered to him, any independent medical inquiry has been or will be made with regard to the nature of his medical treatment and condition?

MR. MATTHEWS: The inquiry will be conducted by the prison visitors, who are quite independent of the Prison Department, and I hope it will commence at the end of this week or the beginning of next. The inquiry will, in the ordinary course, include the whole question of the prisoner's medical treatment and condition.

MR. SEXTON: Will the evidence taken by these visitors and the Report be laid upon the Table, and what opportunity will be afforded for calling attention to this matter?

MR. MATTHEWS: I think the hon. Gentleman ought to postpone that question until the Report has been made.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state the offence for which this man was in prison?

MR. SEXTON: No matter what he was in prison for, I wish to give notice that on the earliest opportunity I shall press for the production of the evidence and Report of this inquiry.

TORY ISLAND.

MR. MURPHY (Dublin, St. Patrick's): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the difficulty and delay in the establishment of a signal station at Tory Island is caused by the price, namely, £480, demanded by the landlord for an acre of rocky land from Lloyd's, who are willing to erect and work the station; and whether the Board of Trade have compulsory powers for obtaining land for such purposes; and, if so, will they exercise those powers in this case?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Lloyd's have informed me that the proprietor of Tory Island has demanded excessive terms for the land necessary for a signal station, but there is also some difficulty about the cost of a telegraph cable. Powers to obtain compulsorily land for signal stations have been granted by Parliament to Lloyd's, and not to the Board of Trade.

THE RAILWAY AND CANAL TRAFFIC ACT.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when he intends to submit to Parliament, in pursuance of Section 31, Sub-section 4, of "The Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888," a Report of complaints made to the Board of Trade under that section, and of the other particulars referred to in that sub-section?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I expect shortly to lay a Report before Parliament in compliance with the provisions of the section to which the hon. Member refers.

THE TURKISH COURTS AT ALEPPO.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the attention of Her Majesty's Government has been called to the complaints of the continued denial of justice, practised in and through the Turkish Courts at Aleppo, to Mrs. Barker, a British subject owning property there, of which she has been violently dispossessed, and thereby reduced to destitution; and whether the Government will take prompt action in the case?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N. E.): Mrs. Barker has had, during her protracted litigation, every assistance from the Embassy at Constantinople, and from the Consulate at Aleppo. She has adduced no proof of the alleged corruption of the Turkish Courts. She has had recourse to two processes in respect of her complaint, one in the Criminal Court on account of violence on the part of her opponent, in which she was successful, the other in a suit concerning the right to property, in which she has failed. She will continue to receive advice and assistance; but her case cannot be withdrawn from the legitimate jurisdiction of the Turkish tribunals.

THE WATERFORD ARTILLERY.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it is a fact that during the non-training period the battery sergeant-majors and sergeants of the Waterford Artillery are obliged to show their kits once a month, and shake out their shirts, socks, &c., side by side with the trumpeters, and in view of the non-commissioned officers and men of the Cavalry in the barracks; if it is usual for battery sergeant-majors of the Royal Artillery or colour-sergeants of the line to show kits with the men of their corps; if it is true the non-commissioned officers of the corps in question made a representation on the subject complained of in 1885, to Colonel Shortland, R.A., Commanding Auxiliary Artillery, Cork District; whether he gave orders it should be discontinued; and whether this was done while he remained in command?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The marching order kits of all the staff of the Waterford Artillery—which includes five trumpeters—are examined together once a month in a room in barracks, but not in view of the Cavalry. The inspection of their other clothing takes place at their quarters. Colonel Shortland is in India, but I cannot find that any formal representation was made to him. The adjutant communicated with him, and apparently some relaxation in the rules for inspection was made. Lately the commanding officer has found it necessary to be more strict again, as several non-commissioned officers were found to be parading without complete marching order kits.

THE HIGHLANDS AND ISLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the effect of the decisions in the matter of rents in the Highlands and Islands of Scotland, pronounced by the Crofter Commissioners, upon the electorate for the School Boards; whether he is aware that the numbers entitled to vote according to Clause 12, Sub-section 2, of the Education Act of 1872 has greatly diminished; and that in one case, namely, the parish of Lochs, with a population of upwards of 6,000, the electorate for the current year has fallen down to 33 persons; and whether the Government will introduce a measure to assimilate the School Board with the Parliamentary franchise?

DR. MACDONALD (Ross and Cromarty): I have also to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that in Barvas parish, in Lewis, owing to the rents being reduced below £4, only two crofters now have votes, whereas 67 had votes formerly for School Board elections; whether he is aware that the said elections are now in the hands of 13 other voters, who are mainly large farmers and estate officials and servants; whether only five crofters have votes in the parish of Lochs, with a population of 6,000 persons, 19-20ths of whom were crofters; whether a similar state of matters exists all over Lewis and the Highlands generally; and what steps the Government propose to take to put such elections on a popular basis, instead of being, as now, in the hands of a few well-to-do people?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: I propose to reply to this question and that of the hon. Member for Ross and Cromarty in the same answer. While the result of the reductions of rent in the Lewis has been to diminish to a large extent the number of persons entered on the valuation roll as owners or occupiers of the annual value of £4, and therefore qualified under the Act of 1872 as School Board electors, the reduction in the number has not, according to my information, been so great as is indicated in the questions of the hon. Gentlemen. The numbers in several school districts are as follows:—

Barvas	172	98
Lochs	133	70
Uig	178	145
Stornoway	901	991

The existing constituencies contain a considerable representation of the crofting element, as there are numerous crofts still above £4 rental. It is only in a small number of parishes that the number of electors has been reduced in anything like this proportion, and the circumstances do not seem to justify a disturbance of the statutory qualification which is general over Scotland.

METROPOLITAN ASSESSMENT RETURNS.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Inland Revenue Board adhere to the terms of their letter with reference to Metropolitan Assessment Returns, addressed to the City Remembrancer on the 17th March, 1885, which states—

"I am now directed to inform you that the Board of Inland Revenue will not enforce penalties upon those who do not fill up Question No. 4, and further as regards No. 7, that they will be satisfied with a simple statement as to whether a premium has or has not been paid as consideration for the tenancy;" and, if not, will he explain for what reason?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Board of Inland Revenue do adhere to the terms of their letter of the 17th of March, 1885.

WRONGFUL CONVICTION—CASE OF FEELY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the remarks made by the Recorder at the last Sessions of the Old Bailey, at the close of the trial of the man Seeley, who was found guilty of perjury in giving evidence against four innocent men, who were convicted on his false statements; whether complaints have reached him that Sergeant Adams, of the L Division, prevented witnesses from entering the Court to speak on behalf of prisoners, if he will cause an inquiry to be made into the matter; and if the four men convicted on Seeley's statement are still in prison; and, if not, have they received any compensation for false imprisonment?

MR. MATTHEWS: The whole of this difficult and intricate case, including the conduct of Sergeant Adams, is now under consideration, and I am not in a position to say what will be done. The name of the man is Feely and not Seeley.

Mr. J. P. B. Robertson

THE FOOD AND DRUGS AND MARGARINE ACTS.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, relative to the Return of cases under the Sale of Food and Drugs and Margarine Acts, which have been brought before the magistrates sitting at the Wandsworth Police Court during the past year, and to the small fines inflicted in the various cases, whether the Local Government Board have in several of their Annual Reports drawn attention to the varying and insufficient penalties imposed upon offenders under these Acts; and whether, having regard to the importance to the public of the efficient administration of the Sale of Food and Drugs and Margarine Acts, he will take such steps as he may deem advisable, with a view to uniformity of practice of the Police Magistrates in the Metropolis in dealing with offenders against the Acts in question?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes, Sir; my attention has been called to those passages in the Annual Reports of the Local Government Board which comment upon the smallness of the fines frequently imposed in cases under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts. I propose to draw the attention of the Chief Magistrate to this subject and to the complaints of the hon. Member, and to request him, in conference with his brother magistrates, to arrive, if possible, at some common understanding with a view to secure uniformity of practice in the administration of these Acts.

EMIGRANTS TO WESTERN AUSTRALIA.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what is the number of emigrants who have left the United Kingdom for Western Australia during each year from 1880 to 1889?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): It has been impossible to give these particulars at so short notice; but an endeavour will be made to obtain them at an early date.

THE TRADE MARKS PROTECTION ACT—COLONIAL LEGISLATION.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade what colonies and other possessions have adopted the Trade Marks Protection Act, and what colonies propose to introduce legislation in the same direction?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The list of colonies and other possessions which have legislated, or proposed to legislate, in the direction indicated is a somewhat long one to read to the House, but I will send a copy to the hon. Member. India and 29 colonies have legislated; in seven others legislation is proposed. Cyprus has rejected it, and we have no answer from New South Wales.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): Will the right hon. Gentleman say what colonies have not adopted it?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Cyprus is the only one which has rejected it. We have had no answer from New South Wales. I believe that they are the only two colonies which have not adopted it, or taken steps in that direction.

ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether in any cases, and, if so, in how many, the capitation grant of 30s. had been drawn by members of the London Corps of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers who did not possess certificates of efficiency, and to what cause this was due; and whether it is contrary to the Regulations; and, if so, who is the official responsible for the breach of them?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The capitation grant of 30s. has in no case ever been drawn for any member of the London corps of the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers who has not strictly complied with all the conditions for efficiency as laid down in the Admiralty Regulations. If any "efficient" member should not be in possession of his certificate of efficiency it is in consequence of his not having applied for the same. The certificate of efficiency is not issued annually as a matter of course. It is signed by the officer-instructor, the commanding officer of the battery, and the commanding officer of the brigade. The capitation grant is paid by the Accountant General, on the basis of the list of efficient rendered by the commanding officer of the corps through the Admiral Superintendent.

IRELAND—THE ARREARS ACT, 1882.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland (1) what was the amount paid to Mr. Percy Magan, J.P., for the Counties of Westmeath, Roscommon, and Wexford, under the Arrears Act of 1882, on account of arrears alleged to be due by his tenant, Bernard Clogher, of Cartron, County Roscommon; (2) in the schedule sworn to by Mr. Magan, what was the amount alleged to be the annual rent; (3) in the same schedule, sworn to before Mr. C. Hancock, J.P. for Westmeath, on 28th November, 1882, what was the amount of arrears alleged to be due on 1st November, 1880; (4) is a landlord entitled under the Arrears Act to return in the schedule a reserved penal rent, being double the ordinary rent he was in the habit of receiving, or to receive a year's rent calculated on such reserved penal rent; and (5) when a landlord has received money under the Arrears Act, to which it can be shown he was not entitled, what steps can be taken to have such amount recovered and restored to the public fund from which it was paid?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: (1.) The Land Commissioners report that the amount referred to in the first paragraph was £15. (2.) The annual rent given in the schedule verified by the joint affidavit of the landlord and tenant was £15. (3.) The amount of arrears set forth was £30. (4.) The rent which the tenant was legally liable to pay during the period in which the antecedent arrears (as defined in the Arrears Act of 1882) accrued, formed the basis for the payment to which the landlord was entitled. No reference was made to a reserved penal rent in the case in question. The tenant, in his affidavit, stated that the arrears mentioned were justly due. (5.) Provision is made under the 7th section of the Act to meet any claim which may have been falsely made.

MR. HAYDEN: May I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that he has not answered the fourth paragraph of my question?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give any further answer than I have given.

GALWAY DOCKS.

MR. HAYDEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether complaints have reached him that the new dock lately constructed at Galway is totally unlighted at night, that the previously existing dock, also called the new dock, is very imperfectly lighted; and there have been three deaths by drowning within the last six months; is there evidence in the possession of the Harbour Commissioners to show whether any of the frequent drowning accidents at Galway Docks were occasioned by the defective lighting; is the Irish Board of Works responsible for the existing state of affairs; and will he get the opinion of the Galway Harbour Commissioners on this last point direct from the Galway Board?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no information as to the first four paragraphs of the hon. Member's question. With regard to the latter part, I understand that the Board of Works has been in communication with the Galway Harbour Commissioners as to improving the lighting, and I am sure that any representation of the Harbour Commissioners will receive the most careful consideration.

MR. JOHN SLATTERY.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the imprisonment of Mr. John Slattery, of Cork, for six months (in default of giving bail), if he can now state under what section of the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act Mr. Slattery was convicted?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, University of Dublin): As this is a question relating to the administration of the law in Ireland I may be allowed to answer it. Mr. John Slattery, of Cork, was tried under the 2nd section of the Crimes Act of 1887, on a charge of using intimidation towards one Richard Quinlan. The magistrates held the charge proved, and made an order that the defendant should give security to be of good behaviour, or in default of bail be imprisoned for six months.

*MR. FLYNN: Is the power to hold to bail for good behaviour derived from the Crimes Act?

*MR. MADDEN: No; it is derived from the Statute of Edward III.; but as proceedings are being taken to test the legality of the decisions of the magistrates I think it is undesirable that I should enter further into the subject.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman say how often this decision has been come to under the Coercion Act?

MR. MADDEN: If the hon. Member wishes for statistics on the subject, and will put a notice on the Paper, I will consider whether it is practicable to give them.

*MR. FLYNN: As an appeal is pending, will the right hon. Gentleman order the release of Mr. Slattery on bail?

MR. MADDEN: It is not necessary for me to give any special direction, nor am I competent to do so.

*MR. FLYNN: Then there is practically no appeal at all?

MR. MADDEN: I did not say so. I said that proceedings were about to be taken to bring the matter before the Superior Courts. I understand from the newspapers that that is so; but I have no further information on the subject.

WEST AFRICAN AFFAIRS.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can now state when it will be possible to lay upon the Table of the House the Agreement concluded with France for the settlement of West African questions?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Agreement concluded with France for the settlement of West African questions was distributed to hon. Members in a Parliamentary Paper on the 13th of the present month.

THE BEHRING SEA FISHERIES.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is correct that the Behring Sea dispute has been settled, and that Sir Julian Pauncefote has conceded the right of Americans to exclude British sealers from the waters of the Alaskan Company; and, if true, that damages to British vessels are to be settled by arbitration, and that a close time for the capture of seals is to be fixed alike for American and Canadian waters?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The statement that the Behring Sea question has been settled is not correct. The negotiations are still going on.

CRETE.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any recent information as to the position of affairs in Crete and the prospects of a restoration of tranquillity in that Island; and, in particular, whether the Turkish Government intends to make any modification in the recently issued Firman?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The latest Reports from Her Majesty's officers in Crete, founded on personal observation in a lengthened tour, state that the general state of the districts was quite quiet. "A stranger," one of them says, "would have been unaware that anything of an unusual nature had been going on." Inquiries made in every village showed an absence of complaints, except of a petty character. There would appear, therefore, to be in general a cessation of the acts of pillage and violence, before reported as having been committed by contending parties. On the other hand, there have been cases of policemen and detached troopers being shot; and inflammatory reports are disseminated in the towns, including some charges of atrocious conduct by the troops, which in some instances, which the British Consul and the British senior naval officer had an opportunity of investigating, proved to be entirely unfounded. Telegrams of the 20th and 27th of February state that certain refugees in Greece, though implicated in recent events, on returning to Crete have not been molested by the authorities, and the Turkish Consul General at the Piræus has published a notice that all refugees, except 16 persons named, may freely return to Crete. The Government have no information of any intention on the part of the Porte to modify the late Firman; but the Vali of Crete has issued a Circular explaining its provisions, and the British Consul reports that if the views of the Vali are carried out, little cause of complaint would be left with regard to the Firman, but that the people are stirred by the action of politicians. The general result at present is more hopeful.

MR. BRYCE: Is the information in the possession of the right hon. Gentleman based entirely upon Reports of the British Consul, or does he derive it from any other source?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is also based on the Reports of the senior medical officer, who has been through the country. Papers will shortly be laid before the House.

MR. BRYCE: How late will those Papers go?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: To a very late date indeed.

DIVISION OF RATES.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Times report of his speech of Friday last is correct, from which it appears that he said—

"With regard to the question of the division of rates. The Government entirely agreed there should be a division between the owners and the occupiers, provided there was proper and adequate representation of the owners. They were anxious to deal with the subject when time and opportunity could be found."

if so, whether the Government will introduce a Bill for the division of rates between owners and occupiers, or give facilities for the Second Reading of the Tenancies Rating Bill, which provides for such division on the principle to which the Government agree?

*MR. RITCHIE: It is impossible for the Government to add to their programme of legislation a Bill on the subject referred to in the question. They cannot undertake to give the hon. Member facilities for the Second Reading of his Bill.

IRELAND—THE CLONGOREY ARRESTS.

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on Tuesday last armed emergency men entered Mrs. Kelly's yard, and refused to leave, though requested by the owner to do so; whether the police in charge, instead of protecting the owner, arrested eight workmen who were engaged on the premises; and whether he can state by what authority emergency men, armed or unarmed, can enter upon premises in legal possession of the owner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that, so far as the police are aware, no armed emergency men entered Mrs. Kelly's yard on Tuesday last, nor did anything occur calling for police interference on behalf of Mrs. Kelly, who, as a matter of fact, was not on the premises. The police arrested four men that day, not eight, as alleged in the question. The men were arrested for refusing to desist from working after repeated cautions, and were subsequently discharged, to be summoned.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask whether the police acted legally or illegally in breaking into the house of Mrs. Kelly; and whether, as the illegality in respect to the service of the precept is now admitted, the Government will order the release of Father Kinsella and the other persons now in prison?

*MR. MADDEN: I understand that the police had a warrant; and, if so, they had legal power to force open the door. Even if the service of the precept were wrong, that did not affect the question of unlawful assembly, because the way to test the legality of the precept was not to collect a number of persons to disobey it. I do not, however, wish to discuss the case, as the trial for unlawful assembly is pending; but if the hon. Member forces me to give an answer I can only say that, in my opinion, an assembly to forcibly interfere with a precept cannot be justified because of some technical informality in the service of that precept. It is extremely undesirable to discuss the point, and I must respectfully decline to give any further answer.

MR. CLANCY: Was not the forcing of the door absolutely illegal, seeing that the officers refused to produce the warrant when requested to do so by the persons inside?

*MR. MADDEN: My information leads me to infer that the forcing of the door was not illegal, as the police officers had a warrant in their hands at the time.

MR. CLANCY: Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that the warrant was asked for, and that the police officers refused to produce it?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

Mr. Carew

THE CASE OF MR. HENRY O'CONNOR.

MR. CAREW: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the conviction of Mr. Henry O'Connor, sub-editor of the Leinster Leader, for publishing reports of League branches, was yesterday quashed in the Court of Queen's Bench, Dublin, with costs against the magistrates who tried him; whether, after sentencing Mr. O'Connor to two months' imprisonment with hard labour, the magistrates were asked and refused to state a case, on the ground that the point raised was frivolous; whether Mr. O'Connor was kept in prison until a mandamus to compel the magistrates to state a case was obtained from the Court of Queen's Bench; whether one of those magistrates was Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald, who, on Friday last, sentenced Father Kinsella and the other Clongorey prisoners to two months' imprisonment, and refused, when asked, to state a case on their behalf; and, whether the Government will take any steps to compensate Mr. O'Connor for his illegal detention in gaol?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand the facts are as stated in the first three paragraphs of the question, except that the Division of the High Court in which the case was heard is not correctly stated. It is not the fact that one of the magistrates was Mr. Vesey Fitzgerald. With regard to the last paragraph, I must wait for further information, the only facts within my cognisance in addition to those stated in the question being that the judgment of the Exchequer Division was on a purely technical point—one of the Judges stating at the time that there could be no moral doubt as to the substantial truth of the allegation, of which, in the opinion of the Court, strict legal proof had not been given.

SCOTCH SCHOOL BOARDS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case that School Boards in Scotland must obtain the sanction of the Scotch Education Department prior to the sanction of new schools, and whether application was made to the Department for sanction to the erection of a Board school in Lenzie prior to its erection; whether the School Boards concerned, in their application for such sanction, included, in the number of children requiring school accommodation, the total number of children of school age in Lenzie District; what was the number of children of school age in Lenzie District at the date of application; upon what date did the Department proceed in sanctioning the erection of school buildings to accommodate 560 children, seeing that the average attendance is only 201; what is the cause of this small attendance at this school; whether the school fees charged in Lenzie Board School are complained against as not being within the reasonable reach of children of the working classes resident in that district; whether the School Boards have made any provision, and, if so, what, and where, in Lenzie District, for providing free education in the compulsory standards; and whether provision for free education in schools outside the district of the children's residence (especially in the face of there being vacant places for 300 children in Lenzie School, specially built for the accommodation of children resident in Lenzie District) is a compliance with the condition precedent set forth in the Minute of the Department of 26th August?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: School Boards in Scotland must obtain the sanction of the Scotch Education Department to any loan for the erection of a new school. A long correspondence took place with regard to the school at Lenzie, extending from the year 1884, when a memorial was presented by the inhabitants of the district urging the necessity of a school at Lenzie, which was a rapidly-increasing district, paying large school rates. The two School Boards of Cadder and Kirkintilloch ultimately assented to the Petition of the inhabitants, and in the year 1887 presented an application for sanction to a loan for the provision of a school for the children residing within the districts of these two Boards at Lenzie, where they certified that there were 133 families at that date for whom no efficient school was available. This loan finally received the sanction of the Department in August, 1888. The Department do not know the cause of the present attendance at the school. I have already stated, in answer to the hon. Member, what representations have reached the Department with respect to the school fees at Lenzie Academy, as well as the assurances received from the School Boards as to the supply of free places for the district, upon the faith of which this school was sanctioned as a fee-paying school; and I have also stated that the Department is prepared to consider any statistics showing that hardship exists, or that the representations of the School Board were unfounded.

SANITARY ARRANGEMENTS AT BUCKINGHAM.

*CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether, in view of the letter addressed by the Board on the 30th of January last to the Buckingham Rural Sanitary Authority, observing on the urgent need of a pure and sufficient water supply, on the absence of a hospital for infectious cases, and of proper means for disinfection, and also on the grave structural defects of the sewers, and wholly insufficient action of the Authority, the Local Government Board can compel this Authority to exercise their powers for the protection of the public health of their district; and, if so, whether the Board intends so to compel this Authority?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The Local Government Board, in the event of formal complaint being made to them under Section 299 of the Public Health Act that the Sanitary Authority have failed to provide their district with sufficient sewers or with an adequate supply of water, can direct a local inquiry on the subject; and if the complaint is substantiated can issue an order limiting the time within which the Sanitary Authority shall discharge their duty. If the authority fail to comply with the requirements of the order, the Board can apply to the High Court for a mandamus. In the case referred to in the question, the Board have not received any such complaint, and cannot therefore at present take the action indicated. If such a complaint were received it would meet with the Board's prompt attention. The Board are clearly of opinion that not only are the Authority failing in their duty, but that, as they have informed them, they are incurring serious responsibility in neglecting to exercise the powers with which they have been entrusted by the Legislature for the protection of the public health of their district.

H.M.S. VICTORIA—THE 110-TON GUNS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Victoria is to be commissioned next month; whether the 110-ton guns have been strengthened to the satisfaction of the Admiralty; and, if so, whether orders have been given that they are not to be fired with the full charge; and what are the precise orders upon that point; and whether the Government will institute an independent inquiry into the utility and efficiency of these monster guns?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The Victoria is to be commissioned next month. The two 110-ton guns of the Victoria have been strengthened to the satisfaction of the Ordnance Committee. No orders have been, or will be, given that they are not to be fired with the full or maximum charge. Only three ships in the Navy are armed, or are proposed to be armed, with these guns. The precise orders as regards practice are laid down in Regulations issued in July, 1888. The utility and efficiency of these heavy guns is so undoubted that there is no intention of instituting any further inquiry into the subject. In an official letter just received, dated February 5, 1890, the captain of the Benbow reports that—

“The 110-ton guns mounted in that ship do not show the slightest sign of any weakness in their construction, and the officers and men have complete confidence in them.”

EXCISE PROSECUTIONS.

MR. NEWNES (Cambridge, E., Newmarket): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that an exciseman at Great Wilbraham, Cambs., induced a carman named Dockerill to sell him half a pound of tobacco, and then issued a summons against him, with the result that Dockerill was fined £25 at the Bottisham Sessions on the 21st of October last; whether the Excise officer acted in accordance with his instructions; and whether he will cause an inquiry to be made into all the circumstances of the case?

Mr. Long

MR. MATTHEWS: The Commissioners of Inland Revenue inform me that the facts are these:—Complaints were received from local tradesmen in the neighbourhood of Great Wilbraham that illegal hawking of tobacco was being practised, and orders were given to the Excise officers to endeavour to prevent such infractions of the law. An Excise officer, having reason to believe that the carman Dockerill was one of the offenders, asked him if he did not sell tobacco, to which Dockerill replied in the affirmative, and then sold the officer half a pound. The magistrates who tried the case at first imposed a penalty of £50; but, with the consent of the Board of Inland Revenue, mitigated it to £25.

THE NEW EDUCATION CODE.

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education when the New Code will be laid upon the Table and in the hands of Members of the House?

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): The right hon. Gentleman will be the first to appreciate the circumstances which have retarded the preparation of the Code. It will be formally laid upon the Table of the House within the usual period; but it will not be ready for distribution until a later date.

THE SUPREME COURT OF JUDICATURE.

MR. HENRY H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Reports of the Departmental Committee appointed to inquire into the question of further reductions in the Staff of the Supreme Court of Judicature?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The Reports for which the right hon. Gentleman asks are those not of an ordinary Departmental Committee, but of a confidential Committee appointed to advise the Government on certain points. Under these circumstances, I regret it is not in my power to give the information asked for; but I shall be glad to show the Reports to the right hon. Member confidentially. Perhaps, however, it would meet his views if, before the Supreme Court Estimate is discussed, there is laid on the Table a statement of what has been done, and what remains to be done, to carry out the recommendations of former Committees presided over by the Lord Chief Justice and the Master of the Rolls, which were referred to in the debates of 1888.

THE HORSE AND WHEEL TAX.

SIR RICHARD PAGET: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to his reply on the 10th August last to the hon. Member for North Herts—"that he did not at present see his way to meeting the views of the County Councils" (namely, as to the supplying the deficiency of county resources, caused by the abandonment of the Horse and Wheel Tax); whether he is now prepared to consider the propriety of dealing with the matter, and affording some assistance to the ratepayers in meeting the charge for maintenance of main roads, which is now borne exclusively by the rates?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It appears that there is a growing regret at the loss of the blessing which I intended to confer on the ratepayer two years ago. I doubt whether that feeling is yet strong enough, or widespread enough, to admit of a revival of the Wheel and Van Tax. I do not think that it is perfectly correct to say that the ratepayers pay the cost of main roads exclusively, as there is the excess of the sum produced by licences as a set-off.

SIR R. PAGET: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to inform us what further expression he desires to receive in order to satisfy himself of the desirability of introducing a measure?

*MR. GOSCHEN: As soon as I can ascertain from the ordinary channels of information to which Ministers have recourse in order to ascertain the general feeling that there is the slightest chance of carrying a measure, I should be glad to introduce a Bill; but it would be useless to attempt to carry any measure of the kind unless there was a general agreement upon it. Perhaps the hon. Member will be able to persuade his colleagues in some of the boroughs that such a measure ought to be passed.

VOL. CCCXLI. [THIRD SERIES.]

DUBLIN HOSPITALS BILL.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Government intend to introduce the Dublin Hospitals Bill during the present Session?

*MR. JACKSON: It is the intention of the Government to introduce legislation dealing with the Dublin Hospitals.

MR. SEXTON: Will the Bill be introduced soon?

*MR. JACKSON: As early as possible.

SOLDIERS IN UNIFORM AT THEATRES

LORD RANDOLPH CHURCHILL (Paddington, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on the evening of the 7th January last, three non-commissioned officers of the Royal Horse Guards were refused admission, by the manager of Her Majesty's Theatre, to a box which had been specially given them by a General Officer commanding in the district; that the ground of such refusal was that the men were in uniform; and whether it is in his power to take steps to provide that soldiers in uniform shall, when frequenting places of public entertainment, enjoy the same rights and privileges as the civilian, and shall no longer be subjected to disabilities and vexations on account of their wearing the uniform of Her Majesty's Army?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: My attention has been called to this case, and I should like to express my entire agreement with the view expressed by the noble Lord in the question—that it is intolerable that any disability should attach to wearing the Queen's uniform. I have no direct power in the matter, and the best means of dealing with it effectively require consideration. But, after consultation with the Lord Chamberlain, I propose, as a first step, to send him a Memorandum setting forth the views we entertain, and he has undertaken to circulate it to the theatres within his jurisdiction.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE AT ETTINGSHALL.

SIR W. PLOWDEN (Wolverhampton, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, when replacing the Post Office at Ettingshall, he would give the locality the advantage of a Telegraph Office at the same place, bearing in mind the considerable works in the immediate neighbourhood, employing large numbers of workmen?

*SIR H. MAXWELL: I am informed by my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General that he will be glad to inquire whether the circumstances will justify the establishment of a Telegraph Office at Ettingshall.

THE TITHES BILL.

VISCOUNT CRANBORNE (Lancashire, N.E., Darwen): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury when we may hope to have the Tithes Bill in our hands?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope in the course of a few days to be able to circulate it.

CLASS VI.

1. £8,101, Supplementary, Superannuations and Retired Allowances.

(4.30.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I should like to receive from the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury some information in reference to the offices of the Supreme Court. The reason I press for it is this: There was in 1880 a re-organisation of the offices, and the result was that a large number of persons drew considerable salaries without doing any work, the Government not being prepared to superannuate them nor to utilise their services. Two have since died, and three have been placed on the pension list, but for a long time they were kept on the books on full pay. It may be that there may be difficulties of the same kind hereafter, and it is to be hoped that some different arrangement will be made. I hope the Secretary to the Treasury will inform us what has been done in regard to this matter.

(4.31.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I am afraid I am hardly prepared to discuss the general question of re-organisation; but I may tell the hon. Gentleman that the re-organisation which has taken place has no elements in it likely to lead to difficulty such as he has described. It was no part of my duty to call on the gentlemen referred to to perform duties other than those for which they were originally engaged, and as those duties had lapsed they continued to draw their salaries as stated.

*(4.32.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): There are two questions I wish to put to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treassury. One is as to pensions granted to two officers, one of £1,333, and the other of £1,233. I observe that the services rendered appear to have been about the same; but there is a difference of £100 a year in the pensions in the case of one who had served 27 years, against the other who served 36 years. I should like to know the reason for that. I should also like to hear from the hon. Gentleman what are the intentions of the Government with regard to the whole question of superannuation. The Commission appointed to inquire into the matter made an elaborate Report upon it and a Bill was brought in during the last week of last Session, when, however, there was not time to pass it into law. We have, I think, a right to ask Her Majesty's Government to deal with the matter this Session. The question is a very grave one, and one that involves the country in a very large expenditure.

MR. JACKSON: I should prefer, if the right hon. Gentleman will allow it, that any discussion which it may be desirable to raise on the general question should be deferred until the introduction of a Bill, or until the general Estimates are reached. I believe it is the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce a Bill on the subject. With regard to the question the right hon. Gentleman asked about two varying pensions for apparently equal services, the explanation is to be found in the additional allowances for professional qualifications.

Vote agreed to.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.—(No. 112.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.43.) THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): This Bill is introduced for the purpose of granting Responsible Government to Western Australia. It is, in form and substance, identical with the Bill passed in another place last year, and which for want of time we were unable to pass through this House. The delimitation of territory which the Bill proposes to give to the Responsible Government is the 26th parallel of south latitude. To the Responsible Government will be granted the whole area of the country; but within this delimitation certain regulations will be made relative to the sale or disposal of land, and this question with regard to the sale or leasing of land we propose to refer to a Select Committee representing all shades of opinion in this House. That being so, I do not think the House will want me to go into all the details of the Bill, but I wish especially to call attention to two or three clauses which are of great importance as embodying what I may call vital principles. The principal clauses of the Imperial Bill are:—Clause 3, vesting in the Local Legislature the management and control of Crown lands south of the 26th degree of south latitude; Clause 4, reserving to the Home Government the management of Crown lands north of the 26th degree of south latitude and providing for the application of the fund arising from the sale and lease of such lands; Clause 7, reserving power to Her Majesty to subdivide the colony hereafter; and Clause 8, reserving for the signification of Her Majesty's pleasure any local Act that may hereafter be passed restricting the immigration of British subjects. This clause is, in my opinion, one of the most important in the Bill, because I have often heard it urged with great force that power should be reserved by the Imperial Legislature to prevent a newly-enfranchised colony from prohibiting immigration. This clause absolutely prevents any such action by the colony, inasmuch as any local Act which might be framed—I do not suppose one ever would be—to prevent immigration could not become law without receiving in the first instance the assent of Her Majesty through the Secretary of State. There is another clause of great importance. We all know that in connection with our colonies one of our first duties is to protect to the utmost of our power the aboriginal races, and it has always been the endeavour—I hope the successful endeavour—of this House so to protect them. This duty has not been overlooked in this legislation. In Clause 70 of the local Bill passed by the Western Australia Legislature it is enacted that :—

“There shall be payable to Her Majesty in every year out of the consolidated revenue fund the sum of £5,000 mentioned in Schedule C to this Act, to be appropriated to the welfare of the aboriginal natives, and expended in providing them with food and clothing when they would otherwise be destitute, in promoting the education of aboriginal children (including half-castes), and in assisting generally to promote the preservation and well-being of the aborigines. The said annual sum shall be issued to the Aborigines Protection Board by the Treasurer on warrant under the hand of the Governor, and may be expended by the said Board at their discretion, under the sole control of the Governor, anything in the Aborigines Protection Act, 1886, to the contrary notwithstanding. Provided always, that if and when the gross revenue of the colony shall exceed £500,000 in any financial year, an amount equal to 1 per cent. on such gross revenue shall, for the purpose of this section, be substituted for the said sum of £5,000 in and for the financial year next ensuing.”

I think this clause not only affords ample protection to the aboriginal natives, but it also affords the ways and means of providing substantially for the relief of any natives who may be destitute, and for the education of those who may need it. I would point out to the House that in no other Australian Constitution Act does this clause exist, and therefore this is a distinct advance on all other enactments; and I believe the House will regard the provision with special favour. I have heard it stated that one of the objections to this Bill is that the population of the country to which it is proposed to give Responsible Government is quite out of proportion to the area inhabited by it. I am quite prepared to admit that there is a vast discrepancy between the existing population of Western Australia and the large area over which they will have responsible control; but I would ask the House to remember that that must have been and has been the case with every one of our Australian colonies. At the inception of Responsible Government in those colonies there was naturally a very large disproportion between the population and the area which they were called upon to govern. But what was the result? Responsible Government having been granted, the discrepancy became less and less; the colonies did all in their power to increase the resources of the country; and as a result labour flowed in from other countries and prosperity followed. I hope and believe that will again be the result now, and I am warranted in that belief by a comparison of the condition of Western Australia now with the condition of Queensland when that colony was endowed with Responsible Government. Queensland was separated from New South Wales by Order in Council and established as a distinct colony in December, 1859. It had Responsible Government from the first; its area was 668,497 square miles; its population, exclusive of aboriginals, was, in December, 1859, 25,000, as against 40,000, the population of West Australia now, and in December, 1887, the population was 367,000. Its revenue and expenditure in 1860 were each about £180,000; they are now upwards of £3,000,000. In 1860 there were no railways or telegraphs; there are now over 2,000 miles of railway and 16,000 miles of telegraphs. I think that these facts afford an almost unanswerable argument against the views of those who say that Western Australia ought not to have Responsible Government because the population is so very small in proportion to the size of the territory. We can go even further. Recollect what the development of Australia has been and the comparatively short time in which that development has taken place. It is only 102 years ago since Australia became part of these dominions, and what changes have taken place in that vast continent in that time! Surely, if we are to reason by the light of facts, we are not justified in withholding Responsible Government from Western Australia on the bare ground that the population and the area are not in proportion. In addition to the fact that we have seen a rapid development in the different Australian colonies after the assumption by them of full responsibility, we must bear in mind that the great question which is at present agitating Australia is that of federation. The realisation of the project may be near or far distant, but the idea does exist, and it is welcomed by the Government, because they, in common with most politicians, believe that union represents strength. If Responsible Government, which exists everywhere in Australia except in Western Australia, be still withheld from that colony, it is evident that federation must of necessity be delayed. Again, we must remember that views with regard to granting Responsible Government to Western Australia have been expressed with absolute unanimity by nearly every portion of the Australian Dominions, to the effect that Responsible Government should be granted to Western Australia. Telegrams and despatches, the result of Conferences, have reached us from every part of Australia, all in the same direction. Five successive Secretaries of State have now expressed a similar opinion, and now that the Legislative Council of Western Australia has confirmed that opinion and passed a Bill, Her Majesty's Government ask the House of Commons to ratify its decision and to grant its request. There is one very important argument which I ought to impress upon the House. It is that the present system of Government in Western Australia is really not an efficient system. The Government is nearly always in the minority—a condition of things much to be regretted. I will shortly explain the Constitution under which the country is governed. The present Constitution comprises—

“(1) The Governor; (2) the Executive Council holding office during pleasure, and composed of heads of Departments and one unofficial member; (3) a single Chamber—the Legislative Council—consisting of 26 members, nine nominated by the Crown and 17 elected: the nominated members include the Colonial Secretary, the Attorney General, the Commissioner of Public Works, the Surveyor General, who also are the official Members of the Executive Council. The Legislative Council has the fullest powers of discussion; private Members have the power of introducing measures (not being money Bills); the Governor takes no part in their debates, communicating with the House by message, and has the power to veto Bills.

“This Constitution dates from 1870, when a local Act, passed under the power conferred by the Act 13 and 14 Vict., cap. 59, sec. 32, introduced elective members and increased the size of the Council. It was admittedly a transitional stage in the progress of the colony towards Responsible Government, and it was not long before the question of taking the final step began to be raised.”

The Government, as I have already observed, is in many instances in a minority, and that is a condition of affairs which cannot conduce to the good government or the well being of any country. I think that is a proposition which does not require any proof. Hon. Gentlemen will see from the constitution of this legislation that I was not incorrect in stating that in many instances the Executive Government must be in a minority, and that is a condition of affairs which cannot conduce to the good government or the well-being of any country. These, Mr. Speaker, are the main arguments which I think will induce the House to grant full Responsible Government to Western Australia. Australia may be said to be a type of what British energy, British independence of character, British intelligence can achieve. I do not think the whole history of the world can point to any such magnificent effects of colonisation as are shown in our Australian colonies. They have another advantage. They are the only colonies, or the only important ones, which have never been the cause of any war to this country. Not a shot has been fired in defence of Australia. It was founded in peace, it has grown in peace, and peace has always been maintained within its borders. Sir, that is a very important element to consider when granting such vast powers as these for which I am now asking the House. It is one which, as I said before, cannot be sufficiently accentuated. But we may reasonably ask whether this great prosperity of Australia—a prosperity which has changed primeval forests and wildernesses into great cities and vast fields teeming with cattle—has produced any countervailing disadvantage. When we consider this prosperity, which has been developed surely and steadily, may we not ask ourselves whether any prejudicial results have accrued with regard to the relations between Australia and this country? The answer is, no. We find that the people are thoroughly contented and essentially loyal. Prosperity has not engendered either ingratitude or disloyalty. The pulsations of the heart of the Old Country vibrate in the arteries of the new; and when the time came for a practical test to be given of the loyalty of the Australian people, when England herself was involved in war, and danger threatened the old country, there was no hesitation on the part of the colonists, and New South Wales sent her contingent to serve side by side with their English brethren on the fields of Egypt. Surely, then, we need no further argument in favour of granting greater powers of self-government to Western Australia. I have proved, if proof were needed, how loyal she is to the Mother Country. I have shown that Western Australia is as much entitled to Responsible Government as the other portions of that great continent, and I ask the House, in full confidence, to ratify the decision of the Legislature of Western Australia, and grant that responsibility of government which they now ask by reading this Bill a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Baron H. de Worms.)

*(5.7.) SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): Sir, if the Government desire to press on this Bill, I am very glad indeed that they have given us a fair opportunity of considering it. I am not quite sure that the House, as a body, was conscious that the measure was going to be discussed, looking at the state of the Benches around; but, at any rate, it is a source of satisfaction to find that the Government have given us a night on which we can discuss the subject. For my own part, I do not profess to know why the Government should have put this Bill in the very fore-front of their business, giving it precedence over every other measure. But I desire, on this, the Second Reading, to make a protest by way of caution, and to say that in assenting to the present stage we must not be taken as assenting to the principle of the Bill, which is the alienation from this country of the only temperate lands that now remain to us—of a territory as large as Europe—by handing it over to a handful of colonists. I accept the suggestion that this matter shall be threshed out before a Special Committee, and I think that in making that suggestion the Government are treating us fairly. At the same time I feel we shall be placed in a difficult position when we have read the Bill a second time, for the House has not the same command over a measure when it is asked to read it a third time that it has over it on previous stages. It must be thoroughly understood that in reading the Bill a second time we claim the right to the fullest discussion in Committee, and the fullest discussion when the Bill comes back again to the House. We must not be asked to part with the measure with any undue haste. I am a little suspicious of the extreme rapidity with which the Government seem anxious to deal with the measure. We have very little information as to the nature of this enormous territory, which comprises about 1,100,000 square miles. I have tried very hard to get information, but have not succeeded, and I cannot but complain that Blue Books have not been circulated.

BARON H. DE WORMS*: The Blue Book was circulated, as the hon. Member will find if he refers to the Pink Paper.

SIR G. CAMPBELL*: It is only the less important Blue Books which are referred to on the Pink Paper, and I venture to say that nineteen-twentieths of the Members of this House have not seen the Blue Book dealing with this question. Now, I desire to say that while I recognise the propriety of referring this matter to a Select Committee, I have considerable doubt as to whether the Members who act on the Committee will have a fair opportunity of dealing with the subject. What I am afraid of is that all the evidence that will come before the Committee will be of a one-sided character. The Government, at home and abroad, are committed to the Bill, but I believe the people of Albany are not inclined to support it. The dominant party in Western Australia, of course, are in its favour, and so are the regular Opposition. But the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Munro) is, I am told, himself a large landowner and is naturally interested in the measure. We do not hear both sides of the question. I do not want to say anything disrespectful of the people of Ireland, but in this matter we are in the position in which we have often found ourselves when asked to spend money in Ireland. There is another view of the matter which seems to me to be a very serious one. We have the interests of the colonists on the one side, and to some extent the interests of the British Empire on the other—at all events we are not directly, so to speak, in the same boat with the colonists in this matter—and we are entitled to look to the Governor of the colony as the representative of British interests and as a man who is bound to safeguard British interests. I think it, therefore, a matter very greatly to be regretted that the Governor of this colony, Sir F. Napier Broome, has taken the part of a strong partisan on this question. There is no doubt great temptation for a Governor to be carried away by the popularity which results from strongly and entirely espousing colonial interests. We have heard something of circumstances which make us think that Western Australia has been not altogether a happy family. We have heard of the Governor and the Chief Justice, and the Attorney General, carrying on a sort of triangular duel; but, after all, the Governor who has espoused the cause of the colonists in this matter has left the colony in a blaze of glory. He seems to have begun by writing a very long letter to the Times, and he has accused the Members who opposed this Bill of something very like ignorance and obstruction. He has made use of expressions which I do not think a representative of Her Majesty's Government ought to have used. For instance, he said the tinkers and the tailors and apothecaries who hang about the towns should not be sent out to the colonies against the wish of the colonial Legislature, and that Western Australia is too poor to be answerable for pauper emigrants. I do not think he ought to make use of such expressions, for no one has proposed to do anything of the kind. At an entertainment given to him when he left the colony he said unkind things of the Members of this House, and writers in the Press in this country, who did not agree with him, and he seemed to be of opinion that Members of this House who were foolish enough to believe that the Return presented to the House last year, showing that single individuals held millions of acres in the colony, was accurate, were almost fools and idiots. It seems to me to be a matter of very considerable regret that the Governor of the colony should have taken this strong partisan view, the more so because I think this Governor has to a certain extent sacrificed his independent position by accepting the post of paid delegate to this country. I have said we ought to obtain some knowledge of the physical aspect of this territory. I hoped we might have got it from the Australian Commissioner of Crown Lands, Mr. Forrest. But what I find is that this officer has made himself a strong political partisan in the matter. It was even proposed to delegate him to go to the eastern colonies and get up an agitation there, and this proposal would have been carried out if the Secretary of State had not stepped in. Mr. Forrest has taken a great deal of trouble to show what fools are the Members of this House, and the writers in the Press, but the great object of a letter which has been written by him has been to get rid of the statistics presented to the House last year, showing that the land was held in enormous blocks. He tells us that as a matter of fact a great many of these holdings have accumulated in consequence of money having been advanced on mortgage by banks, and so on. There may be some truth in that statement, but we certainly ought to be entitled to believe in the Return presented to Parliament, and all I gather from Mr. Forrest's letter is that the lands are very much in the same position as what are called tied public houses. He tells us we have been casting unjust and unfair reflections on the people of Western Australia, and talks about the people of Greater Britain having equal rights and privileges with those who remain at home. Equal rights and privileges, certainly, but I think we have some right to an interest in these colonies, and that the few persons who own large tracts of land in Australia should not have it all to themselves. His arguments may be good or bad in the mouth of a delegate of Australia, but it seems to me to be very regrettable that this officer, whose duty it was to give us statistics, has given us instead mere polemical arguments. I find that all the statistics given in regard to this great territory are compressed into about half a page of the Blue Book, and they are of the vaguest, most general, and most attenuated character. The officer by whom they are prepared admits that a small South-Western part of Australia has fine territory, and excellent rainfall, very productive land, and very fine forests. He admits that the rainfall goes up to 45 inches, but I understand other people to say that it reaches 60 inches. I may mention, as an instance of the very loose way in which the statistics are presented, that in the next division we are told that the highest rainfall is 20 inches, the lowest 10 inches, and the average 10 inches, which, of course, is a physical impossibility. I find that the size of this South West territory is 126,000 square miles. It is, therefore, 50 per cent. larger than Victoria, considerably larger than the whole colony of New Zealand, and considerably larger than these British Islands. We are told that this part of the colony is already occupied. Well, you have some 30,000 people there, and I find from a subsequent part of the Return that of the 30,000 some 20,000 are in the towns, leaving only some 10,000 occupying territory considerably larger than the British Isles. A resident, writing recently to a newspaper, tells us that the greater part of the land is occupied by squatters with very many thousands of acres each, and with flocks of sheep and cattle, and that side by side with them are the blacksmiths, the shoemakers, the wheelwrights, and other country tradesmen, each with a piece of land of his own, and with his own cart and bullock. These seem to be the only small proprietors. Beyond this territory it is admitted that there is an enormous eastern territory, extending to I think more than half-a-million miles, of which this Return tells us absolutely nothing. I find the rainfall is unknown, the average temperature is unknown, the highest temperature is unknown, the lowest temperature is unknown, and everything is unknown. I will ask the Government whether they propose that this land shall be handed over to a handful of colonists without any knowledge whatever of its condition or any explanation of any kind, or whether they are going to give us time to investigate the matter fully in the first instance. The Land Commissioner, I find, has given us certain statistics with regard to the amount of land which has been alienated. This is naturally not large because the price paid for it is 10s. an acre, whereas it can be rented at a farthing or half a farthing an acre, the consequence being that people prefer to rent on terms which some of them say are practically perpetual, the leases being renewable. I find that whereas the population of Western Australia in the last 31 or 32 years has only increased about 50 per cent., the quantity of land alienated has been something like

20 times what it was 30 years ago. On the 1st of January, 1860, the alienation amounted to 5,275,000 acres, whilst on the 1st January, 1889, it amounted to 108,000,000. Supposing there are 20,000 or 21,000 people living on the land the result is that, on the average, 5,000 acres per head of the population have been alienated, or 25,000 acres per family. We are told that this is not a permanent alienation, but that the leases run only to the year 1907. That is no doubt true, but we have other statements coming from residents and others to the effect that the leases are renewable and that they are practically perpetual. I admit that when I come to look at the letter of the land laws the leases are not as good as freeholds, but on the other hand there is an enormously large compensation clause. There is no limitation whatever as to the nature of the improvements for which tenants are to receive compensation in the event of the land being taken over. The tenants may also take up small holdings, and may thus take the eyes out of the territory, so that it will be impossible to find others to rent or buy the rest of the land. We may be pretty sure that dummy holding which has been well-known in other parts of Australia is not likely to be unknown in Western Australia. If we turn over the country to the Legislature of Western Australia they will, of course, be able to alter the land laws as they please, and it is an extremely difficult thing, unless you have a very strong administration, to stop dummy holding. My own belief is that whatever they may put on paper these great holdings are practically or very nearly perpetual holdings. The experience of other colonies in Australia has been that whatever arrangements are made the great squatter—the great land king—always manages to get permanent possession of the land. The real truth of the matter is that our emigrants to Australia, having got out of touch with the land in this country have not got into touch with the land in Australia. You have there little homesteading population—no popular cultivation of the land. The population prefers the privilege of wage-earning in a country which is the paradise of wage-earners. The consequence is that these Australian colonists are drifting into two classes—one consisting of the enormous land kings and the other of the wage-earners, there being very little of that peasant proprietary system which has been so successful in America, and which I think might be as successful in Australia also, if we kept the thing in our hands and did not make the colony over to this handful of squatter kings. There is one Return which puzzled me very much indeed. It is a Return of leases, and licenses forfeited for non-payment of rent, and to be offered for sale by public auction at the Crown Land offices at Perth on the 11th October, 1889. There we have an enormous list of prodigious holdings to be sold by auction in this way on account of non-payment of rent. I do not know why they should be sold by auction. I should have thought the natural thing would be to let the leases lapse, and to let them return to the hands of the Government. In one division I find that a gentleman named William McKinnon has had no less than four plots of 500,000 acres each, for each of which he has been liable to pay £250 a year, or half a farthing an acre. He had not paid this amount, and the land therefore is to be sold. There is another man who has got 20 blocks of 20,000 acres each, and the New Zealand Prime Minister has got 64,000, at half a farthing an acre, which is going to be sold. The Motion of which I have given notice suggests that this matter should not be settled until the Committee on Colonisation has come to some conclusion. I do not suggest that it is desirable that the Committee on the Western Australia Bill should be hung up until the other Committee has reported, but if the Colonisation Committee should think it desirable in the interest of this country to propose some measure promoting colonisation, they would find, if this Bill had been already passed, that the steed had been stolen, and that their labours had been thrown away. Therefore, I think we ought not to hurry this matter too much. I protest against the way in which the alienation of the rights of this great country is carried out in the form of a Bill by which Western Australia is to receive while we are to give. For my part it would be much more proper that the Bill should originate in this House. Then in the local Bill there is the question of the Franchise.

I had the opportunity of discussing this matter with the Governor of the Colony the other day, and he said—

“At any rate you could not for a moment think of interfering with the Franchise; that is a matter which must be absolutely settled by the colonists.”

I do not know that at all. Suppose you find the colony is in the hands of a small oligarchy, are you going to allow them to regulate such a matter? I believe that at present the colony of Western Australia is in the hands of a small oligarchy, and that this Bill is drawn in anything but a popular manner. It is proposed to exclude all the poorer colonists and all the natives. I certainly think that if we are to make over the government to the colony we ought to take care there shall be sufficient popular government. We are told that gentlemen have come over here from Australia as delegates, and must not be kept waiting. I entirely repudiate that view. Let us hear these gentlemen, let us give them the amplest opportunity of having their say, but I protest against our being hurried on that account. This is a very serious matter with regard to which we want a great deal of information. The Colonial Office are very anxious to get the Bill passed, but with all respect to the Under Secretary for the Colonies and Lord Knutsford that Office has meddled and muddled greatly in colonial affairs. The Under Secretary talks a great deal about the affection of the colonies to this country, and specially mentioned Queensland. That was a most unfortunate selection to make in connection with the assertion that the colonies are loyal to this country, because if there is one colony more than another which has shown a nasty spirit towards the Mother Country it is Queensland. Queensland had also been engaged in a very objectionable labour traffic, little to be distinguished from slavery. I admit that the colonists of Australia, taken generally, are kith and kin and enterprising men, and are entitled to be heard fairly and respectfully, but at the same time we must have some regard for the interests of the Mother Country. It is all very well to ascertain what the colonies want, but there must be some consideration paid to the wants of the Mother Country. We are bound to look to the interests of the population of Great Britain and Ireland, and not to yield everything to the colonists. I believe this is not a question of the interests of this country only, but of the colonists as well. We must give some thought to the way in which the land of Australia has been alienated and to the way in which the great territorial aristocracy has been created. I will not, however, move my Amendment, but I think it is most desirable that the matter should be thoroughly threshed out.

(5.57.) MR. STAVELEY HILL (Staffordshire, Kingswinford): There are two great dangers which we should be prepared for in the Bill now before us, and if it were not that the Bill is to be referred to a Select Committee, where we shall have the opportunity of discussing the matter fully and of guarding against those dangers, I certainly should move the Instruction of which I have given notice. The two points to which I wish to call attention are these. There is an enormous amount of open sea, and Western Australia enacts laws and imposes duties which are very much to the prejudice of vessels under the British flag. That is one of the points to which the Committee will have to direct their attention. But the other question is one with which I am, perhaps, more familiar, having had considerable experience in the Dominion of Canada, and it concerns the land. There is the danger that the Legislature, when it becomes a Representative Government, instead of dealing with the land as it is doing at present, namely, giving leases for short periods, which leases can be done away with, will deal with it in such a way that there will be no opportunity afforded of any of it passing into the hands of emigrants. Now, in Canada that is completely met under the Land Laws and there is no such alienation. Leases are granted of grass lands, but they are terminable at any time by the Government. We must, when the Bill comes into Committee, take care there shall be a provision in the Bill under which it will be rendered impossible that there shall be any alienation of these lands during the time when there is this very small population. These points will, I hope, be fully and fairly dealt with in the Select Committee, and if there is anything that escapes the vigilance of the Committee it will be dealt with when it returns to this House. It is not my intention to move the Instruction of which I have given notice.

*(6.0.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): I am sorry my hon. Friend behind me (Sir G. Campbell) imported so much irrelevant matter into his speech. Why did he give so much time to the opinions and actions of Sir F. Napier Broome? Nor do I think my hon. Friend has much reason to complain in reference to the last Blue Book. All he has to do is to sign his initials to the Pink Paper, and I consider the system is a great boon to Members. Surely our colonial policy by this time is well settled; whether for good or evil, we have made up our minds and come to a conclusion founded on painful experience that as soon as a colony can walk alone we must give it Representative Government. It would be as absurd to withhold it when the colony is ripe for it as to attempt to keep a young man in the leading-strings of his infancy. Whether the colony will make a good use of the concession or not is a different matter; it may or it may not. But I cannot help thinking that colonists on the spot are entitled to say that they know what is good for them much better than the Colonial Office, many thousand miles distant. The question therefore is, Has Western Australia arrived at the particular point when it should have Representative Government? On this matter I would commend to the attention of my hon. Friend the latest Colonial Statistical Abstract, and he will find that in the years from 1874 to 1888 the progress of Western Australia has been something phenomenal. The railways increased from 34 miles in 1874 to 417 in 1888, the lines of telegraphic communication from 762 to 2,966. Trade and revenue progressed in a similar ratio, and last, but not least, looking at the Stock list in the Times, I find the colonial securities of Western Australia stand as high as any other Australian colony, and are second only to New South Wales. I would point out, too, that since the question was last under discussion in the House, it has entered on a new phase. I refer, of course, to that great federation movement, and which, from the bottom of my heart, I wish every success. It will open a new era of prosperity for Australasia, from which the Mother Country will benefit. We cannot forget how, 23 years ago, Canada became a federation, since which time, Canada's prosperity has increased by leaps and bounds. I hope the same thing may hereafter be said of Australia. I mention this because it has an important bearing on this question. It is the movement of federation that has made the question now before us an Australasian instead of a West Australian question, for it is perfectly certain that a federated Australia must attract to itself every inch of Australian territory. This is the meaning of the support Western Australia has received from the other colonies. Under the circumstances, we must make a virtue of necessity, and do what we have to do with a good grace. The land has been referred to, and no one is more anxious than I am to reserve an outlet for our surplus home population. But let me call attention to the small number of emigrants Australia has attracted in the last few years. I have looked at the Returns for 1888 and I find that only 31,725 persons have gone out as emigrants to Australia, as against 293,081 to the United States. So it seems that the United States attracts nine times as many emigrants as the whole of Australia. I am sorry this should be so. I would much rather that our own flesh and blood went to build up and strengthen our own colonies. And how many of these 31,000 went to Western Australia? I asked that question of a gentleman well able to give an opinion—Sir F. Napier Broome—and he says only 200 emigrants went to Australia last year from this country. Only 200 persons! exactly one-fifth of the number of persons by which it is said the population of England and Wales is increased in a single day; and, probably, not more than half the number of those who proceed in a single day from the port of Liverpool to the United States. Under the circumstances I should have thought this matter of land, as regards our own emigrants, became a matter of secondary importance. One other matter there is I should like to mention. It seems to me that when we are giving up everything south of the 26th parallel of latitude, we are giving up everything worth having. Is it then worth while to retain a hold on any part of the country at all? I am told that as to the northern part it is such that no European can work there. The riches and natural resources of the country may be great or not, but they must be developed by Asiatic labour. Is that a burden it is quite wise for us to undertake? Is it wise to saddle ourselves with the settlement of the thorny question of Asiatic labour in view of the advent of great Australasian federation? I should have thought the wiser course would be to at once wash our hands of the whole thing and to hand it over, this damnosa hæreditas—northern part—subject to certain conditions, to the control of the Representative Government. I have always found it is better to do spontaneously, and with a good grace, that which ultimately you will be obliged to do. As soon as we get federation we must do it. As to the other matters raised by hon. Gentlemen, they are really such as should be dealt with in Committee.

*(6.10.) SIR G. BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): There are a few remarks I should like to make to remove a misconception before it proceeds further. The Bill is not as some Members seem to think, a Bill dealing with the alienation of land in Western Australia. It is a Bill for altering the constitution of Western Australia. That I take to be the main and chief principle of the Bill, and in regard to alienation, very much misconception exists in the minds of hon. Members and the public. These lands are, at present, or the great proportion of them, in the hands of the Crown. I believe that of over a million square miles less than 3,000 have been alienated, that is to say have become private property; and in the transfer to be carried out by the Bill there will be perhaps 300,000 square miles likely to become private property. Now, the wish of the hon. Member opposite is not to hurry with the Bill because he wishes first of all to know the value of this land. Let me here remark that Western Australia is essentially a new country of which we know very little. But we do know this, that it is a part of Australia of which, like other parts, we cannot know anything of the agricultural or commercial value until it is occupied. The Reports of explorers and those who travel through the country are to my mind worthless for our purpose. We can only find out from the experience of settlers what the land is worth. There is a large area in New South Wales, as there is in other colonies, but I refer specially to New South Wales, which was reported upon by explorers a few years since. The first exploring party nearly perished from thirst. The second party were so impeded by floods that they reported the existence of an inland sea. The third exploring party carried boats with them on waggons and brought them back without using them and were astonished to find the country rich in grass lands, and surmised that the previous party had gone in the wrong direction, for the country proved to be most fertile. That may or may not be the case in Western Australia. But what I wish to point out is that even under the present land regulations of Western Australia, which undoubtedly are not oligarchic but democratic, there has been very little progress towards the alienation of land, the reason for this being the paucity of population. Population is not there, and therefore lands have not been alienated. Another point that has been referred to is the division the Bill makes of the present colony of Western Australia into halves. To my mind that division is a most important matter. I could myself have wished to see the division in Clause 7 made substantial and not permissive, because, I think, in granting certain land revenues and rights to a small population in a large area, we ought, as far as possible, to confine the area to that portion of the colony immediately affected or controlled by the residents there, and in the present case I should like to see Western Australia defined, not only by the 26th parallel, but also by the meridian of say 120, and so you would have a small portion of Western Australia, say 250,000 square miles, handed over to a population of 50,000. It is well, I think, to sever this great area, especially the tropical portion from the new Government soon to be set up and for this reason: I confidently believe that Australian federation is a matter for the near future, and I think one of the greatest problems will be how Australia, with the aid of the Mother Country, is to deal with that large area within which white labour is not possible. I do not think that it would be desirable that the large area in the north of Western Australia should be handed over to the residents of Perth; it should be held in trust by the Imperial Government with a view to coming to an arrangement with the other colonies as to what should be the future position and control in that territory. I need not now add anything further, except to say that I hope in Committee the Government will be prepared to consider the two important points raised, according to their promise last Session. I hope they will restrict the area of Responsible Government, or else lay down such regulations as my hon. Friend (Mr. Staveley Hill) suggests, that in some way or other it shall be made clear to the inhabitants of Western Australia that they shall have, from their local knowledge, full control of the lands, provided they do not check immigration of British subjects. I hope in the Select Committee these questions will very speedily be settled, for the general reason that federation is coming, and because when once an Australian colony tries Responsible Government progress is very fast—much faster than before Responsible Government is conferred, and especially in the direction of increased immigration. We know from experience of the history of other colonies that immigration proceeds for the first few years after establishment of Responsible Government on a scale that is not reached afterwards.

(6.20.) MR. MUNRO FERGUSON (Leith, &c.): Few will object to the principle of local self-government for Western Australia. My hon. Friend behind me (Sir G. Campbell) has referred to the territory of the United States as a precedent, but I think his analogy hardly holds good, because the States are all of them coterminous, and there is not the difficulty of the Supreme Government being administered thousands of miles away across the ocean. But although I think we are justified in giving local self-government to the colony, it may be observed that the population is very much smaller than the figure under which the United States Government has given local self-government to a territory. I believe Dakota had a population of 600,000 or 800,000 before it was formed into a State. On the other hand, as to the argument of the Under Secretary from the fact that we have given self-government to the other Australian colonies, with authority over vast areas, farmed by by a very limited number of settlers—some 20,000 or 30,000—I do not think that is a precedent to follow for handing over half-a-million square miles in Western Australia to 42,000 inhabitants. The question before us to-night is not that of self-government; it is a question of what area shall be handed over to the new self-governing colony, and I think the feeling in the House is that the area proposed to be handed over is far too great for the number of inhabitants there. The whole population of the colony is practically in the south-western division, which has an area of 67,000 square miles; you have there a population of 39,000 out of the whole population of 42,300. That may be held to be too small a division, and you may select a larger division such as was suggested just now, but I hope a very strong protest will be made against the proposal for handing over half, and that the best half, of Western Australia, containing half a million square miles, to this very limited number of citizens. Australian interests are great and entitled to full consideration, no doubt. I do not agree with all that my hon. Friend has said in regard to the Australian colonies, and I think if we try to solve the problem of the attitude Queensland has taken up, we are more likely to find a solution in the policy formerly pursued in regard to New Guinea and the South Pacific Islands than in the reasons my hon. Friend has given. There is no Member on this side of the House, I believe, nor I should think on the other side, who does not wish to see our Australian colonies in that state of prosperity described by the Under Secretary to-night, but, at the same time, we also have our interests there. The whole of the rest of Australia, except Western Australia, has certainly not had the responsibility of discharging the duties of government towards that area of the continent which we have had, and therefore, I think, as regards the future we may be entitled to some consideration as well as the self-governing colonies there. Our interests are not the same as they were in the "fifties," to which the right hon. gentleman referred. There were then immense unoccupied areas all over the world open to emigration, but that position is now very much changed, and one of the few areas left to us is this area of half a million square miles it is proposed to hand over to the new colony. I think there is something in the contention of my hon. Friend that this question might very properly be considered by the Colonisation Committee before it is definitely decided what land policy we should pursue in Western Australia. I think the proposed area is much too large. I object to the best part of this million square miles being handed over in the manner proposed. If there is a case for the Bill in the form in which it stands now, I venture to think it has not been placed before the House by the Under Secretary to-night. Once more I say our unanimous desire is that local self-government shall be extended wherever it is demanded, but not that vast unoccupied areas should be handed over to the self-governing colony. Vast territories have so been treated in the past, and never should have been so handed over. This is what is being done now, under this Bill. An immense amount of country in Western Australia, which may become available for colonisation, is thought to be desert now, but may be made to smile in that fruitful manner described by the Under Secretary. Many an area of which nothing is known now may in the future support an abundant population. In the interest of the vast number of emigrants who annually leave our shores, I protest against the proposed arrangement.

(6.27.) MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I think on this side of the House many will feel not only surprised but gratified by what has fallen from the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. The hon. Member, though he did not move his Amendment, expressed himself as against the principle of Home Rule for Australia, divided from us by 14,000 miles of sea, though he is willing to concede the principle to an island lying close to our shores. I was much gratified to hear the statements of my hon. Friend (Sir G. Baden-Powell), and also of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Ferguson), in regard to the Land Question. They are jealous of our territorial sovereignty in that country. I quite agree this is a question whether or not we shall grant a Constitution to Western Australia. Upon that I think we are all agreed. The question to solve has reference to these unoccupied lands. It is entirely a question of how much land we shall give to a population of 42,000, some of whom, I believe, are descended from the convicts formerly sent to the country. That, I believe, is a fact, and with facts we have to deal. I listened with considerable attention to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies on introducing the Bill, and with all he did say I find myself in agreement. But, at the same time, he omitted a most important subject, saying hardly anything about this Land Question. We may be told that the Land Question can be considered in Committee. I protest against that suggestion, because I venture to think that the question of the land goes to the very root of the principle of this Bill. I do not want to detain the House for any length of time, but I wish to draw special attention to this point. We are asked to assent to the general principle of the Bill. I am in favour of the principle of granting Home Rule and self-government to Western Australia; but I want a little more information as to the reason why the land is to be divided in the manner in which it is proposed in this Bill. I should like to know whether it is not possible, while granting a Constitution to Western Australia, to retain a larger portion of that enormous area of 1,060,000 square miles under our own control? We find that that enormous area is practically divided into equal parts, the Northern of which is to be retained under the control of the Imperial Government, while the Southern is to go in its entirety to the Government of Western Australia. I happened to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies privately what the reason was for making this division, and he told me that there was no reason beyond the fact that it was proposed by Western Australia itself. I am not surprised at all to hear that Western Australia proposes the division, for the simple reason that they are taking all that is worth having, and they are giving away all that is not worth having. If hon. Members look at the map they will see that almost the whole of the land to be retained by the Imperial Parliament—or, at any rate,

Mr. Seton-Karr

19-20ths of the area—is marked as sandy desert in a tropical clime. Of course, there is a certain amount of sea-board, but it will be of no practical use to this country, and on the area we propose to retain it would be almost impossible for us to settle colonists. Now, is it not possible to get a better division of the land than this? I am rather inclined to agree with what the right hon. Gentleman opposite said when he suggested that if we could not get anything better than this, it would be as well to allow Western Australia to take control of the whole of the area. Why should we be troubled with a sandy desert and with a lot of responsibility when we can hope to gain no benefit whatever from the land itself? But at present I do not want to go so far as to urge that. I prefer, instead, to press for an explanation of the reasons for this particular division. We must remember that the population of the colony is only 42,000, whereas the colony of Victoria has only an area of 88,000 square miles, and yet it is one of the most progressive colonies in Australia. Why cannot the small population of Western Australia be satisfied with a smaller area of land? They can have a Constitution in the fullest degree, but why should they have reserved to them such enormous tracts of land? That is what I want to know. We all know that right hon. Gentlemen opposite are fond of making free with the land of this country, and I am therefore glad to find that there are some among them who are jealous about the territorial rights of our colonies. We have in this country, as everybody knows, a population of over 37,000,000. We are sending out a constant stream of emigrants to our colonies, and surely it will be to our advantage to retain under the control of the Imperial Parliament tracts of land for colonisation purposes. Is it absolutely necessary, in order to satisfy the demands of Australia, that we should hand over to them the whole of this land? Could not some better division be made? Could not the dividing line be drawn from north to south instead of from east to west? Let us, at any rate, retain a portion of the land which is worth having, and of which we could make some use. These are the questions which I have risen in order to ask. I may add that I am inclined to agree with the suggestion which has been made that this Bill should be submitted to the Colonisation Committee, who could go into the Land Question, and would possibly be able to elicit some very valuable information.

*(6.36.) MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy in his speech found great fault with Sir Napier Broome because he so warmly advocated the passing of this Bill, and I suppose that if Sir Napier had taken up an entirely different line my hon. Friend would have praised him. But I agree with Sir Napier, and I am strongly in favour of the Bill for reasons which I will shortly give. It may not be in the knowledge of many hon. Members that Sir Napier Broome will not be Governor when the colony, under this Bill, gets a representative form of Government. Sir William Robinson has already been appointed his successor, and among the many who have held responsible positions in connection with our colonies I think no better man could have been found than Sir William. He is exceedingly popular, and, no doubt, will be still more popular when Western Australia obtains local government. And now I come to the Land Question. I am satisfied from my knowledge of the colonies, of which I have made a study, that the land would be better managed by the Western Australians than by the Colonial Office in this country. It is impossible for us in this country to deal with subjects in places so remote, and it is not the fault of the Colonial Office. The truth is, we have not the means of obtaining the requisite knowledge. And yet my hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy proposes that a large proportion of the land in Western Australia shall remain in the hands of the Colonial Office, although he admits the impossibility of the Colonial Office properly dealing with these subjects. I never heard anything more illogical than the argument he used. I have seen with great regret that so very few emigrants have gone to Australia from this country of late years, but I think the reasons are quite clear. The older colonies are unfavourable to assisted emigration, but I hope that Western Australia will favour it. If so, I believe that a considerable number of people will go out from this country. I have expressed a wish to sit on the Committee dealing with this Bill, and if I am on it I shall ask the Representatives of the colony whether they will not agree that a certain portion of the revenue derived from the sale or rent of the land shall not be devoted to assisting emigration from the United Kingdom. I know there is a strong objection in Australia to immigrants from China and India. I sympathise with it; and I hope to see Western Australia occupied almost entirely by people of English, Scotch, Irish, and Welsh blood. Lord Norton, who once held the office of Under Secretary for the Colonies, wrote with reference to this matter of the disposal of these lands—

“It is worth while to note that the disposal of colonial lands through a central Government has always been more wasteful and the grants far more detrimental to central, as well as local interests, than disposals made on the spot.”

I agree with that, and believe that the best the Colonial Office could do would be worse than the worst the Western Australians would do for themselves. And now, as to the Franchise Question. Many on the Opposition side of the House may think that the £10 franchise proposed for Western Australia is too narrow, but such a franchise will include every house in the colony, and it practically means universal suffrage. I hope that perhaps the day is not far distant when Western Australia will follow the example of the other Australian Colonies and adopt manhood suffrage. And now with regard to the northern territory. Some years ago the northern territory of South Australia was surrendered by the Crown to the colony, and it has proved rather a tax to the latter. Why, then, should the Government be so anxious now to retain the northern and tropical portion of Western Australia? I think we shall make a great mistake if we do not give the whole of the territory of Western Australia to the colony. Every one of the Australian Colonies is strongly in favour of the Bill before the House, and that is a fact of very great weight in itself. I look forward to the day when all the Australian Colonies will be federated, and that is why I think that Western Australia should have, as nearly as possible, the same form of government as the other colonies. I am very glad that this discussion has taken place, but I think these matters could be better dealt with in Committee.

(6.43.) MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I am glad that this discussion has been of so very satisfactory a nature, and that it has not in any way been coloured by Party politics. I think that the hon. Member who has just sat down stated a true fact when he said that, when dealing with Western Australia, we are practically dealing with the whole of Australia, because on this question there is a common and almost unanimous feeling among all the Australian Colonies. They have thrown in their lot with Western Australia, and are anxious to assist that colony in obtaining the advantages of self-government which are asked for in this Bill. I think that if we give Western Australia Responsible Government we should do it with no niggard hand. What have we done for Western Australia, in the matter of colonisation for the last quarter of a century. Only about 200 colonists go out there from this country every year. How can we say, then, that by our methods of dealing with Western Australia we are opening it for the reception of emigrants from this country? Although it is not closed for colonisation, we, as a Government, are not doing anything towards getting it occupied; and, I should like to know, are we likely to do more if we have the northern tropical parts of the land left in our hands? It appears to me well worthy the consideration of the Government whether it would not be better to hand over the whole of the land to our kinsmen in Western Australia to deal with as they choose. I hope, Sir, we shall give autonomy to Western Australia without putting any clauses in the Bill that will limit the freedom which they desire. I think we may be quite sure that our Australian kinsmen are not likely to act in any hostile way towards England or towards the Empire. We may trust them perfectly well to continue the work of colonisation, for they are much more capable of dealing with it, living as they do on the spot, than we are who live far away.

*(6.47.) MR. W. A. MCARTHUR (Cornwall, Mid, St. Austell): I am extremely anxious that this Bill should go to a

Mr. O. V. Morgan

Select Committee at the earliest possible moment, and that it should be passed into law. I desire to say a word or two, however, not because I think there is much more to be said on the general question, but because I think it is time that somebody connected with Australia should raise a protest against the extraordinary speech delivered by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy. I think it will be news to a great many of our Australian fellow-subjects to find that there is at this time of day a Member of this House prepared to taunt the Australian colonists with disloyalty, and prepared to insinuate that the only object of the land legislation in the new colonies of Australia is to put money into the hands of big squatters.

*SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I did not say that that was the only object.

*MR. W. A. MCARTHUR: The hon. Gentleman ascribed motives of the most sordid kind to every possible movement of these colonies in the direction of self-government. He poses here as the representative of omniscience. I do not deny that he has had great experience, but I do deny that he has had Australian experience. If I were to attempt to reply to the speech he has delivered tonight, it would probably take me until 11 o'clock, because there was a mistake in almost every sentence. I will give but one example. The hon. Member for Kirkcaldy said he doubted whether Queensland could not have taken some better way of showing their loyalty than they had done in relation to the questions which had recently arisen. He said he could not understand their petty spirit, and he further stated that Queensland was engaged in a most unfortunate traffic.

*SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I said "had been" engaged.

*MR. W. A. MCARTHUR: I am within the recollection of the House. The hon. Member implied that the Local Government had not put the scandalous labour traffic down. It seems to me that Queensland has some cause for dissatisfaction against this country in regard to the action taken respecting the New Hebrides and New Guinea. But let that pass. May I point out that the hon. Member did not state that the labour traffic in Queensland has been absolutely stopped by an Act of Parliament which comes into force this year or next?

*SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I said Queensland had been engaged in a very nefarious labour traffic. I did not say it was so engaged at this moment.

*MR. W. A. McARTHUR: The hon. Member carefully refrained from informing the House that the Local Legislature had long ago seen the evils of the traffic and taken steps to put an end to it. At this moment the traffic is virtually stopped. I wish now to say a few words on the Land Question. Sitting as I do on this side of the House I naturally hold very strong views as regards aggregation of large masses of land in the hands of single individuals; and if I thought it was likely, or that it was in the interests of the Western Australian people themselves to retain large tracts of land in the hands of private persons, and to prevent emigration, I should be among the first to oppose this Bill. But I would put this question to hon. Members as men of business: What is the good of the land unless people occupy it? The land alone would be worthless to a native of Western Australia. He could not cultivate it; he could not raise flocks of sheep and herds of cattle upon it unless he had people to assist him, and therefore the land would be absolutely valueless; and it is only by colonising it that the people of Western Australia can hope to make it valuable. But there is a far wider question than that. Who is it that has made the land of Western Australia valuable? Has it been hon. Gentlemen like the Member for Kirkcaldy? Has it been Members who sit in this House and never trouble themselves about the colonies until legislation of this kind is proposed? No, Sir, it was made valuable by people who ran great risks and underwent great hardships; who toiled and worked to make the land what it is, and who have made the colony a possession of which we may well be proud. The hon. Member says we ought to wait until Western Australia has been thoroughly explored. What sort of assistance have we given in the past in the work of exploration? How many English men have gone out to carry it on? The exploration has been done solely by Australian settlers—by people sent out by the Western Australians themselves—without the assistance of any Englishmen and without the assistance of any Member of this House. Somebody has said in the course of this debate that the northern territory ought to be separated from the southern portion of Western Australia, because it is land situated in the tropics, and, consequently, not fit for English people to work upon. But supposing that the Western Australian Legislature passed a law excluding the Chinese or labour from the Pacific Islands from the southern part of the territory, does any one suppose that the country would force the importation of that labour, or even allow it into the northern part of the territory? I do not believe that it would be allowed, and therefore I say that the argument that if we separate the colony into two parts there will be the possibility of coloured labour being employed in the north, is an argument which will not hold water. I am in favour of handing over the whole territory to Western Australia. The Australian people themselves are in favour of it. Indeed, the Australians ask for it, and I ask is it possible to withstand a demand of that nature? The growth of the Australian Colonies has reached such a pitch that it is practically impossible for this country not to concede a demand made by United Australia. I do not believe that any Government in existence could seriously contemplate for one moment the possibility of doing so if they desired to maintain intact our Australian connection. These colonies are loyal colonies, and have now acquired such a position that you can no longer afford to treat them as children, and you will be running great risks if you strain their loyalty by yielding to the advice of Scotch gentlemen who have studied this question in the armchairs of their libraries instead of accepting the counsel of practical people who live on the spot and know exactly what they want and what best they can do with their own country when they once get the form of government they require.

*(71.) SIR J. C. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow): As this Bill is to go before a Select Committee, I will not trouble the House with any lengthened observations upon it. Still, I would say the importance of this question must be obvious when it is remembered that the Bill proposes to hand over a territory equal in area to the whole of our Indian Empire, and, indeed, as great in extent as half the aggregate territory comprised in the 38 States of America. This enormous area it is intended to hand over to a population smaller than that of an average London parish. I quite admit, and cordially re-echo, what has fallen from the hon. Member who just sat down, namely, that we must recognise what has been the result to the colonies of our policy in the past in making over large tracts of land to a small number of individuals without reservation, a policy which I am afraid it is too late now to reverse. I also agree with the hon. Gentleman in thinking that the reservation of the sub-tropical portion of West Australia would be practically a useless, if not also a dangerous, reservation. I fully share the opinion expressed by other speakers that we are very near the time when we shall have a federated Australia. Let me draw the attention of the House to this consideration, namely, that if this reservation is made as provided for in the Bill, and we afterwards get a federated Australia, we shall have a large portion of the north-west corner of the continent left out of the federation, and administered by the United Kingdom. That is a position which, I think, would be practically untenable, as it would become a source of irritation and trouble. I also think that, looking at the rapid growth of the population of India and the difficulty of providing for any overflow from that country, we may have serious trouble there, and that it would be only right and prudent to provide some tropical territory to which we might shift the surplus population of the Indian Empire, and so give relief to the overcrowded centres of that country. But we shall certainly get into difficulty if, with a Federated Australia, we attempt to utilise for such a purpose the northern and reserved territory of Western Australia. There is one point which I do not think has been touched upon in this debate, and it is mainly upon that subject that I venture to trouble the House. There are some 3,000 miles of coast line in the colony we are now dealing with, and we have not reserved a single portion of it in the temperate zone for the use of our vessels for the protection of the commerce of India and that part of the world. I think we are bound to look ahead in this matter. It so happens that in the south-west corner of that colony we have one of the most important strategic possessions that could be used as a base for the operations of our fleet in the Indian Ocean and South Pacific. That point is King George's Sound. There has for years been correspondence between the Mother Country and the Australian Colonies with regard to the establishment of the necessary naval base at King George's Sound, but no agreement has as yet been arrived at. One of the difficulties is the want of money and how the necessary means may be found. This being so, instead of reserving the northern territory, we ought to take steps for making some Imperial reservation with regard to the Port of Albany and the district of King George's Sound, so as to provide the necessary revenue for maintaining in the future the naval power required in the interests of our commerce. This, to my mind, is a very material point, and I think it is rendered all the weightier by this consideration, namely, the growth of the commercial interchange between India and Australia, and New Zealand, and Tasmania, which has been excessively rapid. In all probability, we shall find, even in the near future, that that trade will have attained proportions of great magnitude. The coast line we are going to part with flanks our sea roads of communication in that part of the world, and I apprehend that it is hardly right for the Ministers of the Crown to propose to make over the heritage that should be held, not only for the use of the millions of our people who may desire to emigrate there in the future, but, generally, for the naval interests of the State. I attach great importance to the fact that under the provisions of this Bill it is proposed to put beyond the power of recall any facilities to provide for our having a port to which we may have secure access for all future time.

*(7.8.) MR. RATHBONE (Carnarvon, Arfon Division): I desire to call attention to a point which, I am sure, all who have an interest in emigration and are watching its progress will regard as one of great importance, and one as to which it is necessary that any legislation upon the subject should be carefully safeguarded. It is evident to those who have watched what has been going on in America that there is a growing disposition to interfere with the freedom of emigration even from the Mother Country, and even though at present in South Australia we have no fear of any such action, because it is largely in the interest of Australia to encourage emigration rather than to discourage it; nevertheless, we have to look ahead and prepare ourselves for the difficulty we are almost sure to be placed in some 20 or 30 years' hence in dealing with the increased population of this country. We have learned a good deal from what is going on in America. In that country those who have to deal with questions of this sort, being afraid that the excitement of local feeling might lead to imprudent hasty action, have taken the precaution to provide by a clause in their State Constitutions which enables them to meet the difficulty. There are means of altering any such clause; but in order to do so a considerable time and a very large majority is necessary. What I would offer as a practical suggestion to the Government is, that in Clause 8 of this Bill, which deals with the Emigration Question, instead of putting it in a way that seems almost to encourage the South Australians, as soon as their temporary interests have been served, to deal with this matter in a manner that might be unsatisfactory to ourselves, it ought to be laid down as a part of the Constitution of Western Australia that there should be no interference with the emigration of the surplus population of those kingdoms either now or at any future time. Of course, if they want afterwards to check the inflow of the Chinese or any undesirable immigrants there should be no difficulty in their getting a measure passed through this House to alter their Constitution in that respect, but I think it only just to the people of this country, who bear so large a share of the burden of taxation for the maintenance of the Navy necessary to protect the Australian and other colonies, that we should reserve to our own people their rights of colonisation and carefully guard against that selfishness of labour which seeks to set up a monopoly of its own, for there is undoubtedly a selfishness of democracy as well as of aristocracy, although I do not say that the selfishness of the one is quite the same or as great as the selfishness of the other. In America, however, we have seen that selfishness in action, and I do trust that care will be taken to make it a part of the Constitution of Western Australia that they shall not be able in the future to debar their fellow countrymen from emigration to their shores.

*(7.14.) MR. S. HEIDGE (Stockport): I think abundant reason has been shown why we should be either very slow to pass this Bill, or else take care that it comes from the Select Committee in a greatly improved form. None of us would object to give Responsible Government to any colony that can demonstrate its ability to run alone. The question is, when is a colony able to run alone? A few people may establish a colony in some small island and be entitled to a Responsible Government; but that case is different from one in which we are asked to give Responsible Government to a small population whose territory includes upwards of a million of square miles. We are told that, apart from the intrinsic merits of the case, we ought to comply at once with the request for a Constitution on the part of the colony of Western Australia, and it is urged as a reason why we should accede to that request that all the Australian Colonies have united in asking the British Parliament to grant the form of Constitution proposed in this Bill. I find in the Colony of Tasmania the House of Assembly ask that "Her Majesty will be pleased speedily to extend to Western Australia that full measure or Responsible Government under a Constitution similar to that of Your Majesty's other Australian Colonies."

Then it goes on

"And that Your Majesty will be pleased to direct that any territory which in Your Majesty's wisdom it may be deemed expedient to exclude from the new Constitution may be reserved for settlement under a similar form of government for the use of the British people, thus advancing the cause of Australian federation and unity, and adding Western Australia to the group of loyal and autonomous Australian Colonies."

The Houses of Assembly of other colonies have sent Addresses couched in similar terms. I agree that by all means we should give a Constitution to the 40,000 people in the south-west corner of Western Australia. By all means let them have a Constitution over the lands that they have made valuable, besides, if you like, land in the neighbourhood, but I see no reason why, because these 40,000 people have cultivated 170 square miles and so made them valuable, out of 1,000,000 square miles, we should give them a Constitution by which they would have entire control over those 1,000,000 square miles. That is a very different thing to what is proposed by the other colonies; and, if the Bill goes to a Select Committee, I think they ought to confine the new Constitution to a moderate portion of the territory, say even 20,000 square miles out of the 1,000,000. To give 40,000 men dominion over 1,000,000 of square miles, with its enormous seaboard, would be to take away our heritage. I represent a constituency containing a very much larger population than that of Western Australia—a large proportion being working men. There is a strong feeling among them about this gradual giving away of our inheritance in the land which belongs to Great Britain, and giving to a few, who happen to be the pioneers, an advantage which is very unfair to the working men of this country who look to the future, when the teeming millions of England will turn to the colonies for places of settlement. They regard as selfish the policy of those colonists who wish to keep to themselves these large tracts of land and the labour and wages to be obtained in the colonies. It seems to me that we shall not be standing in the way of Australian federation if we limit the Constitution of Western Australia to a small portion of the territory in question, as we shall be doing the very thing which the other colonies recommend.

(7.20) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): Mr. Speaker, I think that the debate which has taken place has been very interesting, and has amply justified the sensible course, at the end of last Session, of those who urged that the Bill should not be passed immediately, and also that of the Government in proposing to refer it to a Select Committee. There are differences in the point of view taken on this Bill, some hon. Members dealing with it from practical knowledge of Australia and sympathy with colonial feeling, while others have treated it on considerations of general policy. I think the general views which have been expressed may be reconciled with the experience of those who are practically acquainted with the development of the Australian Colonies. Interesting data have been furnished us by my hon. Friend the Member for St. Austell. My hon. Friend the Member for Kirkcaldy, and those who followed him on the land question, have confined themselves to pointing out the difficulties which may arise in giving control over this large area to this extremely small population. We must all feel impressed by the somewhat thoughtless way in which, in some other colonies, public land has been wastefully dealt with. I contend that the excitement experienced in some of the Western States of America, arising from the way in which land grants were made, and land titles taken up, particularly in California, shows what difficulties may spring from a faulty and wasteful use of land in the beginning of a colony. It also seems to me that my hon. Friend in dealing with this land question omitted to consider another side of the subject, namely, who manages the land now, and have we any better security for its wise management under a Colonial Parliament? Hon. Members of colonial experience say that our present system does not really offer any greater security for the development of the country, or for the distribution of it amongst poor working proprietors, than would be afforded under a Colonial Legislature. The moral, therefore, seems to be that we want all these matters gone into fully and thoroughly by a Select Committee before another step is taken. I should like to suggest to the Under Secretary for the Colonies, who will to some extent be charged with the preparation of the evidence on the part of the Government or the scheme to be laid before the Committee, that he might direct the evidence, first, to the question whether the colony is ready for representative self-government, secondly, what the methods and limitations for that self-government should be, thirdly, what rules and regulations should be laid down with regard to the distribution of land and for the control of emigration, bearing in mind particularly the valuable suggestion thrown out by the hon. Member for Carnarvon; and, finally, the question which was referred to by the hon. Member for Bow and Bromley—the possible provision for controlling and maintaining for Imperial purposes any harbour or strip of land on the coast. I do not mean to say that this last is a question which at first sight seems to have much possibility of being practically dealt with; at the same time, naval defence is a matter of great and growing importance, and would deserve to be brought before the Committee. I should like, in passing, to refer to a serious dereliction of duty on the part of the Government in the appointment they made to a very responsible and important post, that of Attorney General for Western Australia. They appointed a former Member of this House, of whom I will say no more than this, that I do not think anyone who knew him in this House would say that he was the proper person for so very delicate a position. I will not say more than that; but everyone who sat in the Parliament of 1880 can appreciate the grounds for the remark. It ought to be borne in mind that the difficulties which occur in the colonies very often arise from the unwise selection of the authorities sent out to them. There is another question, which does not exactly arise on the Bill, but may arise at no distant date, to which the attention of the Committee might be usefully directed. Supposing it is decided not to deliver over to the Colony the whole of the territory hitherto called Western Australia, on the ground that the Colony is too small, and that it is not a good service to render the Colony to give it heavy powers, duties, and responsibilities before it is ripe for them—as has been shown in America in respect of the State of Nevada, whose admission to Statehood everyone now recognises as a mistake—what will we do with that remaining territory. Very likely we may have a Federal Government for the whole of the Australian Colonies, as in the United States of America. With the probable advent of that Government, it seems to be deserving of careful consideration whether the management of these remaining territories could not be better undertaken by a responsible Federal Government for the whole of Australia or Australasia than by the Local Government of the Colony.

*(7.29.) MR. A. McARTHUR (Leicester): I do not desire to prolong the debate, and will only make a few observations. The waste land in the Australian Colonies (which would otherwise be utterly useless) is let to squatters at a nominal rent, sometimes as low as a half-penny or a penny per acre. But there is a condition that a certain amount of stock must be put upon it by the person who occupies it within a certain period, or his lease is forfeited. This accounts for the enormous tracts of land occupied by squatters, referred to by the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy; and it is surely better to have it thus occupied, than to have it lying waste. My hon. Friend has also referred to the small number of persons emigrating to the Colonies. The distance of the Australian Colonies makes emigration to them very expensive, compared with emigration to Canada or the United States, where emigrants go in large numbers. One of the principal reasons I had for rising was to deal with the question of emigration. All the Australian colonies that I know are in favour of emigration, or "immigration," as they call it. They believe additional population is wanted, and this applies in particular to New South Wales, where I resided for many years and was a member of the Assembly. Invariably found the Governments of these colonies in favour of emigration. At the same time, it is perfectly true that the labouring population of these colonies have an idea—a very foolish and erroneous one—that if an increasing number of emigrants come into the country the effect would be to lessen their wages. Therefore they oppose emigration with all their might, and these frequently succeed in exercising a powerful influence upon the Government. Formerly grants were made, sometimes as much as £50,000 a year, by these colonies towards the assistance of emigration; but owing to the pressure brought to bear upon them by the working classes that system has almost ceased. At any rate, it only exists to a limited extent. I would only express a hope that some provision may be embodied in this Bill requiring a sum of money to be given in aid of emigration to Western Australia. I do not think the matter should be left as a recommendation to the Government; but I think that we should require a certain sum to be set aside for that purpose. The matter should not be left dependent on the vote of the Colonial Assembly. Finally, I would only say that I think the measure before the House will tend to the rapid development of Western Australia. I do not think we can expect the colony to develop unless we give it Responsible Government; but by conferring that boon upon it I have no doubt that it will largely increase both in population and trade.

*(7.35.) MR. E. B. HOARE (Hampstead): I think that a great many of the fears expressed by hon. Members on both sides of the House are founded on a misapprehension. Hon. Members seem to think that it would be to the advantage of the labouring population of this country that large tracts of land should remain in the hands of the Government, with a view to the settlement of bodies of emigrants. Now, I believe it to be a fact that there is hardly a single successful working man emigrant in the colonies who went there and settled upon the land. Every man who goes to the colonies and succeeds is a man who goes there and works for wages, who accumulates capital and buys land. If you took a mechanic or an agricultural labourer from this country and put him on a piece of unbroken colonial land he would starve before he made a profit; and the only chance for the successful occupation and cultivation of land in these new countries is to put the land in the first instance into the hands of capitalists, who can hire labour for the purpose of cultivating it. From that point of view I think there is no ground for the fears which have been expressed with regard to the alienation of land in Western Australia by putting it into the hands of large squatters. It is to the interest of the squatters to provide labour, and they are able to do it, and to make a profit under the existing conditions of the country; whereas small cultivators would be unable to succeed without handy markets.

(7.35.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, West): I do not rise for the purpose of adding anything to the very interesting debate that has taken place on the principles that are at issue in this Bill. I take it for granted that the Committee to be appointed will give most careful attention to such important questions as the amount of land to be reserved and the conditions to be imposed upon the new constitution. I desire to say just one word in reference to the importance of the matter of emigration. I agree entirely with the hon. Member behind me as to the importance of the question to the people of the United Kingdom. Certainly, it would be most desirable to impose some such conditions as have been suggested, if it could be done with the goodwill of the Australian Colonies, but it must be remembered that we are not dealing with the 40,000 inhabitants of Western Australia alone, but with the whole population of Australasia. Unless we can persuade them that these limitations are reasonable, I think it would be better not to push them at all. It must be remembered that in giving the colonies self-government we have given them practically independence in all that concerns their own affairs. The point to which I wish to refer is indirectly connected with this question, and I expected it would have been referred to by some other Member. I should like to draw the attention of the Under Secretary to the matter, in order that he may give an explanation. I refer to some extraordinary legislation which appears recently to have been passed by Western Australia, which I think concerns the material interests of British subjects. It appears that on the Coast of Western Australia there is a valuable pearl fishery. The Government of Western Australia very rightly thought fit to tax this industry, which they did by imposing an export duty on the pearl shells collected, and also an import duty upon the provisions brought in for the fishermen. Such a course was perfectly within their right. But then it was discovered that the pearl fishers imported their provisions from a distance in vessels which did not come within the territorial limits of Western Australia. The Authorities went for a Bill to impose these same duties upon vessels which kept altogether without the territorial waters of Western Australia. The Colonial Office refused to sanction the Bill, and the Western Australian Legislature went to the Federal Council, and the Federal Council of Australasia passed an Act which gave them this authority. I must say I think that that was a very high-handed proceeding. But, what is more extraordi-mary, they say that these duties are only to be imposed on British vessels. Here we have a British Crown Colony actually imposing duties, and, I think, illegal duties, upon British vessels whilst foreign vessels are allowed to go entirely free. I do not pretend that the imposition of legislation of this kind will be a justification for refusing legislation to Western Australia, but I think it is a matter the Committee should inquire into, and we may ask the representatives of Western Australia to give a security that they will not pass legislation of this character, and particularly against British subjects.

*(7.40.) Mr. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I should not have interposed, especially as the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce) has stated the views of hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House, with his usual precision, and more than his usual felicity, had I not received some statements of importance from correspondents in Western Australia, which prompts me to draw the attention of the House to one or two points connected with this Bill. In the first place, my correspondent calls attention to the property qualification of the Council and the Legislative Assembly. The hon. Member for Battersea (Mr. O. V. Morgan) seemed to think that the qualification embodied in the schedule practically amounts to universal suffrage or household suffrage in Western Australia. If that is the case I should like to know why these provisions have found a place in the Bill. It must be to all hon. Members who are acquainted with the Australian Colonies, a familiar fact that the other colonies have no property qualification for the Members of the Lower Assembly or for the electors to that Assembly. This is one of the main points to which I have been requested to draw attention. I will read a few words from the letter of my correspondent, who is a gentleman of some position in Western Australia, on the whole character of the Bill. He writes—

“Hitherto the Legislative Council of the Colony has been decidedly Conservative. It has consisted of 26 Members, of whom nine have been nominated by the Crown, or Governor, and the remaining 17 have been elected. The electors have been, roughly speaking, £10 householders, and a qualification has been required from the elected Members:—the possession of land of the value of £1,000, or of the yearly value of £50.”

And then I would draw the attention of the House to what follows:—

“There has been great difficulty in this poor community, where everyone almost works for his living, in getting 17 men who have the property and are willing to give up two or three months a year to the work. Again, in this semi-Crown Colony, the people have hitherto taken but faint interest in political questions—they have been disgusted with the recent bad management, and generally desire Responsible Government; but they have left the Council to arrange the terms of the Bill. The Bill is narrow to the last degree in several particulars. First, as to two Houses—Lord Knutsford, knowing the impossibility of getting more than a very few decently fit men to take part in legislation and government, at first proposed a single Chamber. Seeing that we have had a single Chamber with three different sorts of Members ever since 1870, when the present Constitution began one would have thought this was reasonable. But the Tories in the Colony took alarm and worked against it, and Lord Knutsford withdrew the plan. The Bill proposes two Chambers—the Council, with 15 Members; the Assembly, with 30 Members. They cannot get 45 men, with the qualification, who will be content to give up one-third of the year to do this duty. Thus the property qualification, which is to be for both Houses, is altogether absurd here. In the first place, it will be evaded in many cases; but the great objection is that it will prevent a number of honest men who may be in all other respects suitable, from giving their services to the public. Moreover, it is provided that this property must have been possessed for 12 months before the election. The intention of this clause is to keep the management of affairs in the hands of the clique who now rule the roost. Again, in no other colony of Australia is there any property qualification for the Lower House. It will be a different Constitution from the other self-governing colonies of Australia, and this at a time when Federation is being insisted upon. It is said all matters such as this can afterwards be amended. Possibly; but they will not be if the present Members have their way.”

I am sorry to trouble the House with such a long quotation, but the extract is of importance, coming as it does from the former Attorney General of Western Australia, the predecessor of Mr. Warton. I think it deserves the careful attention of the Members of the Select Committee, to whom this Bill is to be referred. I must say that I think this debate has been amply justified by the many suggestions which have been made, of which none are more important than those which fell from the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool, who presented to us the views of one of the best authorities on colonial matters, namely, Sir Charles Dilke, in his Problems of Great Britain. I venture to think that we should give this colony as democratic a Constitution as possible, so as to enable the poorer inhabitants to take their part in the Government and in the settlement of any questions concerning the disposal of the land. The debate has been marked on all sides by hearty sympathy with colonial self-government. I will not detain the House by any further remarks. I considered it my duty to lay these considerations with regard to the property qualification before the House, and, through the House, before the country, before the Select Committee deals with this important measure, affecting, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has pointed out, not merely the 40,000 people in Western Australia, but the whole of the rapidly increasing population of Australasia.

(7.53.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I view this Bill with very considerable repugnance, but I fully admit the difficulty in which the Government are placed. As the Australian colonies have united in advocating the claims of Western Australia, the Government could not do otherwise than bring forward the measure. I think, however, that the opinion put forward on behalf of Australia in connection with this matter is not the bond fide opinion of the 4,000,000 of people in that country. I have read many of the Australian newspapers, and I submit that these newspapers to a large extent reflect the opinions of the squatters and richer classes, and entirely hide from the people the fact that the real objection of the Imperial Parliament is not on the score of the granting of self-government to the colonists, but to the million square miles of territory in Western Australia not being utilised for the benefit of the British race. In opposition to the newspaper opinions I refer to I have received a letter from one of the oldest settlers in New South Wales, whose view I believe represents those of a large portion of the people of Australia. He writes—

"To grant Western Australia Responsible Government means government by squatters, syndicates, and colonial banks, instead of Responsible Government, promoting population and the occupation of the soil, as in America."

Mr. Channing

The evil resulting from such a system as is here described has been exemplified in the case of New South Wales, where, 35 years ago, men who obtained seats in the Legislature for the purposes of self-aggrandisement managed to get 190 millions out of a total of 200 million of acres of the land of the colony into their own hands, leaving only about 10 millions of acres to be occupied by people coming from the Mother Country. Almost the whole of that extensive territory is laid out in extensive grazing farms, from which the owners derive, in some instances, as much as £100,000 a year, while every effort is made to keep out cultivating settlers from this country. America and Canada have dealt with their land upon a totally different principle, the latter colony forbidding any settler to hold permanently more than 160 acres of land. If the same policy had been adopted with the Australian Colonies their population would have been double what it is to-day. Surely it is reasonable, before we grant self-government to the last Crown Colony in Australia, that we should ask for conditions to be laid down similar to those laid down in Canada, namely, that no land shall be permanently alienated that is suitable for cultivation, except to bond fide cultivators who are willing to settle upon the land and cultivate it. We do not grudge Responsible Government to Western Australia. What we grudge is that a handful of irresponsible people should be allowed to gamble on the land, and establish on it an enormous squatting plutocracy, which, in future years, will create enormous difficulties in regard to the development of our colonies. If there is no other way of dealing with the land except handing it over entirely, I would much rather adopt the suggestion to land it over to the entire Australian people, if they are willing to manage it as the trustees both of Australia and of England.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to a Select Committee."

(8.1.) MR. MOLLOY (King's County, Birr): I should like to make a suggestion to the First Lord of the Treasury, and it is this : There are many Members of the House who have a practical knowledge of Australia, and it is desirable that we should pick out as many of these as we possibly can to sit on the Committee. This is necessary, because the speech which we have just listened to is typical of the kind of knowledge that will be brought to bear on the Committee. The hon. Member speaks of small farms in Australia. The hon. Member's correspondent seems to have concealed the fact that in many parts of Australia it takes five acres to feed one sheep; therefore, when anyone can talk of small farms, it is easy to see how necessary it is to bring to bear on the Committee the practical knowledge of men who have spent considerable time in Australia.

*(8.2.) MR. W. H. SMITH : I assure the hon. and learned Gentleman that it will be the desire of the Government to form a Committee which shall be well informed upon all the subjects referred to it. So far as we are concerned, the Committee shall be constituted of thoroughly practical men.

COMPANIES (WINDING-UP)
BILL.—(No. 113.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(8.5.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): For some time past there has been, I think, a general feeling in the country, and especially among the commercial community, that abuses have arisen under the operation of the Companies Acts for which it is extremely desirable that Parliament should find a remedy without doing anything to restrict the principle of freedom of association for the conduct of industrial and commercial enterprise. I hoped at one time to place before the House a measure not only amending the Companies Acts on all those matters in which they are admittedly defective, but also effecting a consolidation of the law. But the more I reflected on the matter the more I felt that, having regard to the difficulty and complexity of the subject and to the number of other matters with which the House has to deal, any attempt to pass a comprehensive measure of that kind could not be successful. I feel sure that to attempt a large and general measure of that character would be to prevent, or at any rate retard, any real reform of the law. For this reason I have been content to prepare the limited measure which I now ask should be read a second time. It deals with a part of the law which is admitted to be defective, and which the commercial community, at all events, is most anxious to see improved. I hope that hon. Members who take an interest in the subject and may desire other changes, such, for instance, as an improvement of the law relating to the formation of companies and a consolidation of the law itself, will not allow their views to prejudice their consideration of the measure I now bring before the House. I shall continue, on the part of the Government, to bear these subjects in mind, and endeavour to deal with them also at as early a date as possible. I would ask that this measure should be simply considered on its merits, believing, as I do, that should Parliament pass it, it will promote and not impede a further amendment of the law. I cannot more shortly state the objects of the Bill than by reading the statement in the Memorandum which has been circulated with the Bill :—

“ To extend the policy of the Companies Act, 1867, by giving jurisdiction in the winding up of companies to County Courts and other local Courts, and to assimilate, as far as circumstances will admit, the law and procedure in the winding up of insolvent companies to the law and procedure in the bankruptcy of individual debtors, particularly by applying the principle embodied in the Bankruptcy Act, 1883, of separating, so far as practicable, administrative from judicial functions, and of subjecting to public examination persons who are responsible for the loss caused to the creditors by the insolvency.”

As to the first of these objects, I have to say that the limit of £5,000 proposed in the Bill must be considered as a merely tentative proposal, made with a view to discussion and consideration, and the Standing Committee on Trade, to which I hope the measure will be referred, can increase that limit or alter its application in any way they think right. As to the second object, I wish to say that the Bill only carries out a principle which has been recognised by Parliament in the Judicature Act of 1875, by which it is provided that the same rules should be observed in the administration of the assets of insolvent individuals and insolvent companies with regard to the respective rights of creditors and the proof of debts and liabilities. We propose to carry out this principle in the way I have described by adapting the procedure in bankruptcy to the winding-up insolvent companies. Now, it may be asked why this change is necessary? Sir, I very much doubt if any hon. Member will defend the present system as being in any way satisfactory, except, of course, to the liquidators and solicitors who profit by it. The present system is as injurious to the public at large as any system could well be. In the first place, it is injurious to the creditors. Surely the chief object of winding-up proceedings in a case of insolvency should be to protect the salvage; yet there is nothing which the present procedure is less calculated to do. "Winding-up," in fact, is a misnomer, for companies are not wound up. As long as assets remain which can be utilised, not, I am afraid, so much for the creditors as for the persons employed as liquidators and solicitors, so long is the winding-up process continued, and even when the assets have apparently come to an end, the proceedings are kept open in the hope that from some unknown quarter further assets may come, only to go into the same pockets. Why is this? The liquidators and solicitors under the present system are paid by time. The liquidator is not appointed by the creditors; he is often a person self-appointed, or at any rate appointed without the control of the creditors. The result has been that in certain cases the liquidation of companies has been kept going from year to year, insuring a very comfortable annuity to the firms employed, and even to their successors. From a Return obtained by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, and ordered by the House of Commons to be printed on December 12, 1888, it appears that of the Joint Stock Companies ordered to be wound up in which the liquidation proceedings were pending, about 22 per cent. had been in liquidation upwards of 10 years, and about 20 per cent. upwards of five years, but under 10. Of the 674 cases, open on the 31st of December, 1886, 147

cases had been pending over 10 years, 125 had been pending over five years and under 10, and 385 had been pending five years and under. There appeared to be one case still pending in which the order to wind up was made in 1863. The result of the system is excessive cost in the process of winding up. This cost is due to the delay which occurs and to the clumsiness of the procedure, which involves constant applications to the Court. This procedure is especially onerous in the case of insolvent companies from the country, necessitating, as it does, the employment of solicitors and counsel, which results in enormous bills. One bill brought to my notice, covering I do not know how many sheets of paper, amounted after taxation to £1,107 for four years' work in winding up a company. It included an item of £57 merely for drawing up the bill and having it taxed, and this case, be it observed, was a short winding up in Chancery. Another defect of the system is the absence of supervision over liquidators. The parties interested can get no information; even Parliament has failed to obtain information when it has asked for it. From the Return of 1888, already quoted, I find that out of 71 cases ordered to be wound up by the Court of Chancery during 1867, 19 years before the date of the Return, it was only found possible to furnish details of receipts and expenditure in 25, showing clearly that there could not have been any proper audit. In those 25 cases the costs were much higher than in similar cases in bankruptcy, though in only three of them did the assets realised exceed £5,000. Compare this with the Stannaries Court, in which there is practically an official liquidator. There, in 1867, 19 companies were wound up. Full particulars of receipts and expenditure were given in each case, and the costs were much less than in Chancery. I do not know whether the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Warmington), who has given notice to move the rejection of the Bill, will defend the present system, or find fault with the proposals we make for remedy; but I think I have said enough to show that nothing could be worse or more discreditable than the existing system. I do not say that the procedure established by the Bankruptcy Act of 1883 is perfect ; but it is infinitely superior to the system which exists in the winding up of companies, both in expedition, efficiency, and economy. Estates are wound up in bankruptcy twice as fast by non-official and three times as fast by official Trustees as they were under the previous law. The Bankruptcy Act of 1883 established an organisation all over the country which, with a slight additional expenditure, might undertake the work imposed on it by this Bill. I think the Bill, if passed, will be of great benefit to the creditors of insolvent companies. But that is not all. Besides the question of salvage, there is also the question of diminishing the number of wrecks, and I have a hope that the Bill may tend to improve commercial morality. It is not too much to say that in the winding up of insolvent companies there are no officials charged with the impartial and independent duty of investigation or the punishment of fraud, so that offences punished in bankruptcy are ignored in winding up. There is a special danger in the recent tendency to convert private businesses into Limited Liability Companies. I saw the other day a long list of small businesses so converted in the past year, and among them there was actually one, with a capital of £5,000, for carrying on a chimney-sweeper's business. Practically, I suppose there is no occupation that is not considered a legitimate field for the enterprise of a Limited Liability Company. What is the result of this? There may, no doubt, be legitimate reasons for such a conversion. But there are in too many cases reasons of quite a different kind ; and certainly we should not permit that the Limited Liability Acts should be used by unscrupulous traders not only to resuscitate their own fortunes for a time, but to escape the penalties which would otherwise await them as private traders at the hands of the Official Receiver. I trust the Bill will succeed in exposing and punishing some of the frauds and malpractices which too often prevail in the formation of companies, and thus deterring promoters from attempting them. The principle upon which the Bill is based is that a man who undertakes to manage other people's affairs should have the same sense of responsibility as in managing his own, and that legislation should be deterrent both to fraud and to negligence. I do not propose to enter into the details of the Bill. I only ask the House to affirm the principles on which it is based. Its details are doubtless open to criticism, and may be susceptible of improvement. We shall welcome any suggestions for that end from Members who have special experience, and especially from the hon. and learned Member for Stockton ; and I trust that the House will be willing to remit the Bill to the Standing Committee on Trade that this Session may not close without completing a reform which I believe will be of great value to the commercial interests of the community.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

*(8.55.) SIR HORACE DAVEY (Stockton) : I do not rise in any spirit of hostility or carping criticism to the Bill, because I quite recognise that the present system of winding up requires reform. But I may be permitted to doubt whether this Bill is likely to effect that reform. The right hon. Gentleman has a little exaggerated the evils of the present system, which is based on the Companies Act, 1862. We have now had nearly 28 years' experience of the working of that Act, and during that period Judges of the greatest eminence have devoted their minds to the simplification of procedure, and to making it as valuable as possible for the objects sought. Judges like the late Master of the Rolls, Sir George Jessel, and others I could name, have applied themselves to the work of improving the operation of the Act ; and I do not think that the evils of delay to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred exist to anything like the extent to which at first they certainly did prevail. The Judge has practically unlimited powers, which are exercised to bring liquidations to a speedy close, and to bring liquidators to account, as, to my own knowledge, they have often been brought to account to their own sorrow. It is not so simple a matter to wind up a company as may at first sight appear. It is not like winding up the estate of an individual trader who has become bankrupt. Companies which are wound up in the Chancery Division are in very many instances such as have carried on a large and extensive business, far greater and more extensive than any business carried on by independent traders, and these companies often have assets which are only capable of realisation at any price by careful administration, and by what is called carefully "nursing" the assets. Although it is undoubted that more delay has taken place in the winding up of companies in times past than was necessary, that is not so now. The House must not suppose it can introduce a millenium of winding-up. A company's affairs cannot be wound up in six months or a year, or even in many cases in less than two years. I think I recognise one of the companies to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. But the assets of that company were of a very peculiar character, and undoubtedly required a long time for winding-up. I have no doubt that a great many people profited by the winding-up of that Company, but I think the right hon. Gentleman did a little exaggerate the defects of the present system. Whatever may have been the case in the past, Judges, chief clerks, solicitors, and liquidators have combined to do their best under the rules of the present system. But my complaint against the Bill is that it does not effect the reform the right hon. Gentleman has shadowed out. If the right hon. Gentleman had brought in a Bill complete in itself, which would tell those who read it what is the system, method, and procedure, I do not think I have even to make any objection to it, but I must put in my humble protest on behalf of those who have to administer the law. We who sit here in the House of Commons, or the other House, and pass Acts of Parliament, are sometimes a little oblivious of those other people who have to construe and administer those Acts, and on their behalf I put in a protest against the manner in which the Bill is constructed. The right hon. Gentleman said that nothing could be worse than the present system. But the Bill leaves the present system exactly where it is. There is not one word in the Bill which in any way repeals or abolishes the present system. What the Bill does is to make a number of new enactments, sometimes superseding, sometimes overlapping, sometimes partially superseding and partially overlapping, the provisions of the present Acts. I do not hesitate to say that a more formidable task for the unfortunate Judge who may have to administer the new system which the Bill would introduce cannot be imagined. He will have the present system. There is nothing in the Bill in any way puts an end to the Companies' Acts and the rules made under them, which form the present code for winding-up companies; then the Bill makes a number of enactments, some of which are partially identical with the enactments in the Companies' Acts 1862 and 1867; it also introduces other provisions, for example those in reference to examination of persons connected with the management of the company, and the Judge will have to say which set of sections is or is not repealed, and there will be two concurrent systems under this Bill if it becomes law. The result will be to increase the confusion and to throw disturbance into what is now, after the efforts of the Judges and the experience that has been obtained, a working system, and you will, I feel quite confident, raise a number of questions as to the effect which certain enactments in this Bill has upon certain enactments in the present Acts—how far they are repealed or are still in force. That is not all. We have had considerable experience lately of the evil and dangerous effects of a measure which incorporates in it a number of clauses from some other Bill, the result of which is that, instead of finding in the pages and clauses what its enactments are, one has to look to two, three, four, or more Acts of Parliament which are incorporated by reference, but you have to change their language and adopt them to this Act, and then questions arise as to how much is incorporated, how much is altered, and how the incorporated clauses are to be read with reference to the existing law and the enactments in the Bill itself. I am not speaking on behalf of a popular Party or one who receives much consideration in the House of Commons, but I do wish to enter a protest, and I hope my hon. and learned friend the Attorney General will support me on behalf of those who have to construe Acts of Parliament which we pass sometimes with a light heart. I can assure the House that it is no easy task for those who have to advise upon or Judges who have to administer the law to construe Acts of Parliament under this system of legislation by reference. Remember that where there are difficulties it leads to litigation, and litigation means expense. I will venture to make an appeal to the President of the Board of Trade on this matter—and I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that I am making it in no carping spirit. It is that he will give us a Bill which we can all understand, an Act which even laymen can take into their hands and read and understand. At present anyone reading this Bill would, in order to understand it, have to refer back to the Act of 1862 and find out how far the clauses of that Act are repealed or incorporated. As a fact, nothing is expressly repealed in this Act. There may be provisions impliedly repealed, but I think we are entitled to ask that the law in regard to the winding up of companies should be put in such a state that those who have to advise upon or administer the law—solicitors, counsel, liquidators, as well as laymen and creditors—can understand it when they read it. It is a question which ought not to be left in doubt what is the relation of this Act to the Act of 1862 and the existing Companies' Acts. As this Bill now stands anyone reading it is compelled to go back to the Act of 1862, which is not repealed, and the winding-up clauses of which are consequently still in force. First he would have to see how the company can be wound up, and he would have to bear in mind such points as consulting the creditors and the contributories; then he would have to find out what were the powers of liquidators under the Act of 1862 and compare them with the powers conferred under this Bill, and then would arise all sorts of questions re cases where they differed as to whether any of them were repealed. I will go a little further. The Act of 1862 provides a means by which directors, managers, and auditors can be examined and brought to book, and anyone acquainted with winding-up proceedings in the Chancery Courts knows that this was proved a most powerful and successful provision. But you have something new here. You have in the 9th section similar powers, but it is not the same power as in Section 165 of the Act of 1862; in some cases it is wider, in other cases it is less wide. Yet

Section 165 remains unrepealed. Who is able under these circumstances to advise an unhappy creditor who wishes to find out the law as regards directors and others guilty of malfeasance by comparing Section 165 of the Act of 1862 with Section 9 of this Bill. This is merely an illustration of the evils and great inconvenience to all concerned through legislating in this manner. Let us for goodness sake have an Act of Parliament which embodies in itself all the provisions which are applicable to the subject, in the interests not only of those who have to administer the law, but also of those who have to obey the law and whose interest it is to understand the law. As to the incorporation of the bankruptcy clauses, I think it is a very great improvement on the present system of winding-up, by providing for an official audit of the liquidators' accounts. At the present time, as we all know, creditors do not take enough interest in these things to audit the accounts; they prefer to write off the debt and take such dividend as is offered. They may be right, or they may be wrong from a commercial point of view, but I entirely approve of the provisions to be incorporated in this Bill, securing an official audit of liquidators' accounts, and I should even go further than the Bill, because I would impose upon liquidators the duty not only of rendering accounts to the Board of Trade, but also of sending a printed copy of the accounts, or an abstract of them, to every creditor. If the creditor chooses to throw them into the waste paper basket, that is his look out. The Bill, I admit, looks very seductive, but again I have to complain that, if it is passed, it will not give all the necessary information on this point; it will be necessary to refer to the Bankruptcy Act itself. And these provisions from the bankruptcy laws are incorporated "so far as applicable." Who is to say how far they are applicable? Of course the Court—and it will be a nice task for the Court to take clauses which are drawn alio intuitu and apply them to a totally different state of things. Why could not we have these clauses, so far as capable of being adapted to the winding up of companies, printed over again in the Bill as the clauses which the Government think ought to be applicable, and why should not the Government draftsman adapt the clauses to the case of the winding-up of companies instead of leaving the unhappy creditor or contributory to get the Court to do so at his own expense? The criticisms I have made upon the Bill I have put forward in no spirit of hostility, for I recognise that the system of winding up at present in use is capable of great improvement, and I cordially approve of the institution of an efficient audit being provided for liquidators' accounts. I also think that the means of bringing fraudulent persons to justice may be very much improved. But I do plead for a Bill which we can understand. I cannot understand the present Bill, but before it is passed into law I earnestly hope that it will contain the whole provisions of the law with regard to winding up, and that those responsible for this measure will take the trouble to go through the whole of the present code and repeal all provisions which are intended to be no longer applicable.

*(916) MR. WARMINGTON (Monmouth, W.) My reason for placing the Motion which stands in my name upon the Paper was not because I am averse to any improvement in the present law, but because I wish to render an emphatic protest against any important Amendment of the law being rushed through without ample explanation. And I am glad to say that I have succeeded in obtaining from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade an explanation of the reasons which moved him to introduce this measure. I am bound to say that those reasons are not entirely satisfactory, and I gather that his information has been drawn from one source only. I should think it had been drawn from persons who might be creditors of a company, but who have otherwise had no experience of the mode in which the business of winding-up companies is conducted. It is a great pity that a Bill which proposes to amend the procedure of winding up companies should be prepared by persons—if it was so prepared—who are not familiar with the working of the present system. The present system, Sir, is a code in itself. There is, in the Act of 1862, a set of clauses exclusively confined to the mode in which companies shall be wound up. And the right hon. Gentleman has, in this House, rather given currency to the opinion that the only persons to be considered in the winding-up are creditors. I think the attention of the House ought quite as much to be directed to a most unfortunate body of persons who are called contributories; and who are in the first instance shareholders. The right hon. Gentleman will, perhaps, allow me to say that he is wrong if he thinks that he can prevent the fraud unless he begins at the right end. Fraud is much more rife at the birth of companies than it is at their burial, and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes really to prevent fraud in regard to Joint Stock Companies, I would humbly request his attention to a Bill which is to be presented to this House, and which deals with that subject; and ask him to give his friendly assistance to prevent directors going scot free who have been parties to prospectuses containing false statements on the plea that they did not know that the statements were false. Then I think we may have some sort of guarantee that fraud will not be so prevalent as it is now. As I understand it, although the right hon. Gentleman had not the courage to say so, this is, in truth, a retrograde step. Probably his researches have not gone so far as to enable him to tell the House of the system that was in operation before 1862. That system was then a system of bankruptcy, and it was because of the crying scandals associated with it, and because it was more costly than winding up in the Chancery Court, that the Companies' Act of 1862 was framed. There are, undoubtedly, a great many points on which the present procedure could be amended, and I agree that the right hon. Gentleman has hit one. When the Act of 1862 was passed, it was considered that the persons directly interested, viz., the creditors and the contributories of a company being wound up should themselves take such an interest in the procedure as to see that the official charged with the winding-up did his duty. Unfortunately that has not been so, and there has been no controlling officer. The learned Judges have more than once regretted that omission, and in some instances have endeavoured to supply it by calling in the aid of an officer, who acts partly under the direction of the Court and partly under the control of the Attorney General. The Official

Liquidator is now bound to do very much what the right hon. Gentleman said he ought to do, but there is no one to see that he does his duty. He has now the duty of preserving an accurate file of every proceeding that occurs in the Court. He must keep every account and every paper connected with the winding-up. But, unfortunately, that enactment in the Companies' Act of 1862, unless you have a conscientious liquidator (and notwithstanding the observations of the right hon. Gentleman there are many most conscientious), becomes a dead letter. I know a great many windings-up of Companies where liquidators, persons of great experience and high character, have, although there is no one to compel them to do their duty, kept a perfect record, which has been open, free of expense, to everybody interested. Therefore I welcome the amendment of law, by the installation of an officer whose duty it shall be to see that the liquidator does his duty, although I confess that end is to be secured by means most cumbrous. My learned Friend the Member for Stockton says there will be difficulty in construing the Act of Parliament. Yes, Sir, but persons who are charged with the winding-up of companies are not expected to have to go to learned counsel like my hon. and learned Friend. They expect to find their duty written in the Act of Parliament under which they are acting; and if this Bill is passed, this point will at once strike a liquidator. He will say "I have two sections dealing with the same subject. Which am I to obey?" My hon. Friend puts only one case that he may have to obey one or the other; but that is not quite the full fact. He may have to obey both, for there is nothing in this Bill to say that the provisions, so far as liquidators are concerned, are not cumulative, and in addition to the powers given to liquidators under the Companies Act of 1862. Thus you put on the officials whom you are going to create the new difficulty of ascertaining how they are to discharge their duties. But not only does this Bill deal with procedure; it also amends the law, and it does so in a most unsatisfactory fashion. There is to be, according to the Bill, what is called a Report, and that Report is to be made by a prescribed officer who is to have the right of making the Report on information that is given to him unsworn. He may get it from any documents, and he is to be allowed, without having submitted any part of the information to the test of an oath, to brand the directors or other people as men of fraud. That is a new and altogether unheard of proceeding in the jurisprudence of this country: that any official shall be able to charge with or to say that another man has been guilty of fraud and breach of trust without that charge having been investigated and put to the test of an oath. Not only that, but I think the framer of this Bill had a notion that there was no such people as contributories. I do not think the word contributory is to be found in the Bill from the beginning to the end. This is the way in which the Bill is prepared. A man is to be deemed a fraudulent man for issuing a false prospectus—to whose damage? The fraudulent statement in a prospectus as a rule—in 99 cases out of 100—is not to the prejudice of the creditors, but it is to the prejudice and damage of the poor people who believe in the statements and on the faith of those statements subscribe for shares. By the 9th clause of the Bill it is provided that if any person among other things "signs or makes himself responsible for any false or misleading prospectus, notice, statement, or balance-sheet," to the prejudice "of the company or of the creditors of the company" he is to be made liable to contribute such sums as the Court thinks just. But what is he to pay for? Is he to pay for the damage done to the company or to the creditors? But they are not the people who are damaged by the fraudulent statement. The people damaged are the contributories. The company gets the benefit of the fraud, and it is the money the shareholders contribute because of the fraud that goes into the coffers of the company. It is absurd to say that the company is damaged by the fraudulent statement in the prospectus, and it is very unlikely that the creditors are damaged because fraudulent persons usually take care that such companies shall exist for such a period as that those who are creditors at the date of winding-up are creditors of a comparatively recent date and were not creditors at the time when the company was started. The person who wants protection is the contributory, not the creditor or the company itself. It is said that the Bill has been introduced to amend the law in that respect, but I do not think it will have that effect. I am only noticing this in order to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to this matter. Let me make a suggestion. I have not the experience of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton, nor have I the experience of the hon. Gentleman who advised the President of the Board of Trade, but I venture to think it will be much easier to take Part 4 of the Act, 1862, which constitutes the code of procedure with regard to the winding-up of the companies, and to introduce it in this Bill with such Amendments as the right hon. Gentleman thinks fit. This is another suggestion I am able to make for a reason which perhaps he does not know. If the right hon. Gentleman will alter the title of the Bill or extend the ambit of it so as to make it a measure not simply amending the procedure of the winding up of companies, but dealing also with the law as to the liability of directors and others issuing prospectuses or notices for applications for shares, then I think that the right hon. Gentleman can rely, not only on the cordial co-operation of both sides of the House, but on the efforts of all those in the House who have the advantage of being practically acquainted with the law of companies.

*(932) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say, in moving the Second Reading of the Bill, that should any part of the Bill be open to observation, it might be alluded to at this time. There is one part to which I think it is especially desirable to call attention before the Bill is read a second time. I cannot help adopting to a great extent the view of my hon. and learned Friend, that the Bill does not seem to be framed on an exhaustive examination of the existing law of winding-up. Those who know anything of the law of winding up are aware that by the Companies Act there are two modes of winding up—voluntary and compulsory. This Bill only deals with the compulsory mode, but there is a well known process of carrying on the voluntary winding up of a company under the supervision of the Court. It seems to be assumed by the promoters of the Bill that every company which fails to carry on its business does so because of misfeasance, but in cases where companies become either insolvent, from causes not culpable, or are unable to carry on their business it is often found convenient to adopt an amicable mode of winding-up, and then if difficulties arise to obtain an order for carrying on liquidation under the supervision of the Court, and as the Bill is now framed it may become the object of interested persons to begin proceedings for voluntary winding-up, in order to save themselves from coming within the more penal provisions of the Bill. I think this point ought not to be lost sight of when the Bill is considered by the Standing Committee.

(935.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Sir, no one will dispute the great evil for the remedy of which this Bill is proposed for consideration, but I question whether it is advisable to deal with the subject in the piecemeal, scrappy manner proposed by this measure. Only a small portion of the Company Law is dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman's Bill, and yet the changes proposed are very important and in some respects radical. The proposal of the Government complicates that which is already more or less complicated and difficult, and it distributes the work connected with the winding-up of companies in a manner which will unquestionably lead to a great many appeals and a great deal of unnecessary litigation, and whether the time now occupied in winding-up companies will be shortened is a point on which I feel considerable doubt. In the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, you had a complete revision of the law, and a codification of it which was a model of drafting, and which has left very little room for doubt or ambiguity. There is another aspect of the matter which strikes me as worthy of consideration. It is proposed by this Bill to throw upon the County Court an additional amount of work. The County Courts, as revised in 1846, were in the first instance intended only as Courts for the recovery of small debts, and in the year 1865 their jurisdiction was extended, so that equity cases to the amount of £500 were included. Since 1865 we have had considerable additions to the jurisdiction of the County Court—the Labourers and Workmen's Act, 1875; the Employers' Liability Act; the Married Women's Property Act; the Agricultural Holdings Act; and last, and greatest of all, the Bankruptcy Act, under all of which there are questions which have to be decided in the County Court. The amount of work thrown on the County Courts is out of all proportion to that which was at first contemplated, and I think it might be worthy the consideration of the Government whether the County Courts as now constituted and—I say it with all respect to the existing Judges—as now manned are in many cases the fit Courts on which to heap up the immense accumulation of judicial business now being borne by them. Certainly this Bill will considerably increase the work of those Courts. It is perfectly true that under the Building Societies' Act, 1874, and the Industrial Provident Societies' Act, 1876, a certain amount of winding-up business does now come within the province of the County Courts. But this Bill will very considerably increase that amount of work. What is likely to be the result of this proposal? Not only will there be a considerable number of appeals, but there is likely to be a disinclination to meet many of the difficulties which will probably arise as the outcome of this Bill. You may have a block of business because of a very natural postponement of questions arising in the County Courts. The County Courts Act of 1888 gave extension of jurisdiction with regard to matters of settlement, besides which power has been given to remove cases below £100 to the County Courts. In the very first six months of that Act there were between 600 and 700 cases removed from the High Court to the County Courts. Two Metropolitan County Court Judges had each between 50 and 60 cases removed to them. I am sure if the right hon. Gentleman inquires into the matter he will find there is ample ground for re-consideration as to whether it is wise to extend the jurisdiction of these Courts, not only with regard to this particular Bill, but with regard to the varied business which is now thrown upon them.

*(9.43.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I am sure, Sir, on both sides of the House there will be a general concurrence in the objects of the measure as set out in the Memorandum. The principles set forth there are good, but they seem to me to be carried out in a very unsatisfactory, defective, and misleading manner in the Bill itself. A very short time ago one of the Judges of the High Court called the attention of the Legislature to the danger and difficulty involved in the modern process of drafting Acts of Parliament by incorporating other Acts, and the Judge severely condemned this most unsatisfactory mode of legislation. But the system had grown under the administration of the present day to quite an intolerable extent, during the last two or three years. We shall have placed upon the Table next week, the Civil Service Estimates for the coming year, and the hon. Members will find that a very large sum is paid for the work of preparing Bills, in addition to which there was a large sum last year for extra assistance in drafting particular Government Bills. As a plain matter of business, considering the amount which we pay our draftsmen, we are entitled to a different class of article from that which is placed on the Table of the House. We are entitled to know what is within the four walls of the Bill, and what it proposes to deal with, not only in the interests of the public and the suitors, but in the interests of the judges themselves. The Bill should contain what the law is. We shall hear the Attorney General shortly, but you have already heard in this debate one of the first advocates at the English Bar, one of the most scientific lawyers of the day, the hon. and learned Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey), saying that he cannot understand this Bill. For my own part, I do not understand the Bill; and if it be passed in its present form it means a crop of litigation. The gist of the whole thing is that the procedure with respect to the bankruptcy of a trader is one thing and the winding-up of a company is a totally different thing. The principle may be the same, but the procedure must inevitably and necessarily be very different. If the Attorney General will turn to page 6 of the Incorporated Statutes, he will see one of the many clauses which I say I cannot follow:—

“Subject to the provisions of this Act the liquidator shall, in the administration of the property of the company and in the distribution thereof amongst its creditors, have regard to any directions that may be given by resolution of the creditors at any general meeting, or by the committee of inspection, and any directions so given by the creditors at any general meeting shall in case of conflict be deemed to over-ride any directions given by the committee of inspection."

There is already a Code under the Companies' Acts, providing how the property of the company is to be dealt with. I am speaking in the presence of lawyers, who will contradict me if I am wrong, but I am certain that a conflict will arise immediately there is any attempt to put that clause into force. Another peculiarity of the drafting of the Bill is the enormous power resting in the hands of the Lord Chancellor for making rules. Everything is to be done by rule. The House is deprived of its legislative control, and it is put into the hands of some rule, making authority which constructs a Code which Parliament might or might not approve. On page 3 you have the first time of its introduction put into the Bill some prescribed officer, who is to do something, and who is to become the liquidator of the company. And then there is to be a meeting of creditors, and no one seems to be worthy of consideration in this Bill except the creditor. When you call a meeting of a bankrupt's creditors, you do not care about the man himself; he is there. But in the case of joint stock companies, in the majority of instances, the creditors are paid in full. It is the poor unfortunate shareholders who are swindled; they are the people imposed upon by prospectuses. There is not a single line to provide for these gentlemen; not a word about calling the shareholders together. They are to have no protection, though I think they are really persons for whom Parliament is bound to provide. There is another important omission in this Bill to which I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention. These three modes of winding-up—a voluntary winding-up, a compulsory winding up, and a voluntary winding-up under the supervision of the Court. This Bill does not apply at all to a voluntary winding-up, and possibly two-thirds of windings-up are voluntary. Now, I am sure the President of the Board of Trade wants to pass a satisfactory Act which will work, and we are anxious on this side of the House to give it every assistance we can. The course I would suggest is that the Bill should be read a second time and then remitted to the draftsmen to put in what is to be the law. We have already the Code of 1862; we must not have two Codes in force at the same time. Clause 9 is a very oppressive clause, for it makes the Report to be prima facie evidence of misconduct. There is to be no verification or cross-examination. You have simply to say A or B has done what? There are several things, of course, which A or B must have done—fraud, misappropriation, misfeasance, and breach of trust. Suppose a director has been a party to the carrying on of the business of "a company after having reason to believe it was insolvent." What is meant by "having reason to believe?" Or suppose he has been a party "to any rash or hazardous speculations." Who is to decide whether a speculation is rash or hazardous? What one may think prudent another may think rash or hazardous. I think there are a great many defects in the Bill itself, so far as the phraseology of it and the scope of it are concerned, and I think it has graver defects in respect of the incorporation of the existing law. Another defect is the power given to the Lord Chancellor; and we know that it is not the Lord Chancellor and that it is not the Board of Trade, but a subordinate of the Lord Chancellor and a subordinate officer of the Board of Trade to whom you will practically delegate the power of legislation. I think, if we give this Bill a Second Reading, that we ought to have an understanding from the Government that the Bill will be re-considered and put in workable shape before it is sent either to the Committee on Trade or the Committee on Law, which ever the Government may think fit.

*(9.53.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Sir, although in the exercise of the privileges of debate, some of the observations of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen have been of a technical and some of a severe description, yet I accept them in the spirit in which they were intended, and I believe it is the wish of hon. and right hon. Gentleman opposite to assist Her Majesty's Government in amending the law as far as they can. I wish at once to join in the just tribute of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton to the great experience and ability of my hon. Friend the Member for Stockton (Sir H. Davey). I am prepared to say, in this or any other place, that if he had one opinion and I another on any point of law connected with this Bill I should be perfectly satisfied I was wrong. At the same time, while conceding the advantage he possesses over me, I venture to think that he has gone a little too far when he says that he cannot understand this Bill. One other observation I must notice. It has been said that this Bill has been prepared by persons who have only considered one side of the question, and without obtaining information from others. That is an absolute and entire mistake. I must take the blame of any defects of the Bill, of course, so far as the legal points are concerned. The best authorities and the persons most skilled in these matters have been consulted. One word on behalf of the draftsmen. The right hon. Gentleman has had experience of the Government draftsmen, and whatever may be said as to the mode of drafting, I do not think we ought to under-rate the extreme learning and ability or industry of those gentlemen, having regard to the burdens put upon them. Let me say a few words in reference to the leading points. The first and main objection taken to the Bill is that it does not codify the law; codification means dealing with an Act of Parliament of 270 sections, or the winding-up part consisting of 99 sections. I say, without the slightest hesitation, that if we had undertaken to codify and amend the law at the same time it would have been hopeless to try and carry the Bill in this or in any one Session. On that point I appeal to the authority of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who, speaking in answer to the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton, said that it is utterly impossible to pass a consolidating and amending law at the same time; that it is necessary first to amend the law and then to codify it.

*MR. H. H. FOWLER: What my right hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lothian objected to was the introduction of any Amendments into a Consolidation Bill. He said a Consolidation Bill should be a Consolidation Bill pure and simple.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: In another form of words that is exactly what I am attempting to convey to the House. As to the codification of the law, if we are to wait for that, pressing evils will long remain unredressed. The right hon. Gentleman has taken exception to the power of the Lord Chancellor to make general rules for carrying into effect the objects of this Act, and repealing or modifying general orders and rules applying to the winding-up of a Company.

*SIR H. DAVEY: What I pointed out was that they did not repeal the winding-up sections which are over-ridden.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member referred to these sections, and he subsequently referred to the rules. I accept his explanation of what he intended, but he directed the attention of the House to the fact that we had not dealt with the existing rules. Well, I am sure, so far as the rules are concerned, the hon. Member will be the first to say that nobody could have framed them and that nobody could say what rules are to be repealed and what are to stand until an amending Bill has been passed. If there is objection taken to temporary officials having to do with the framing of rules, I would point out that that matter is always safeguarded by legislation; but under the circumstances it cannot be said that the Government have been guilty of an omission in not introducing a provision for the amendment of the rules. Then is it or is it not prudent to write at large in the Bill clauses as they are intended to stand, or is it prudent to refer to previous Acts where these clauses appear? As to the incorporation of the Act of 1862, it practically depends on this main consideration whether we have still got left as operative and unrepealed a body of law in itself sufficient to be self contained, or whether that which we are engrafting on the old system becomes in itself the main body of the law. I think it is scarcely just after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, to suggest that this Bill is drafted in a cast-iron shape as if intended to be the final view of Her Majesty's Government, because in his opening remarks my right hon. Friend said he was aware that the clauses made changes in the phraseology and scope of previous legislation, but that his desire was to get the assistance of experts in the matter, so that the provisions might be moulded in the best form. Whatever may be the strictures passed in Clause 9, those who have had experience in the matter think that amendment of the law in that direction is required, as the number of persons who defraud companies and make away with their assets is increasing. The hon. Member for Monmouthshire said we had made a great mistake as sub-Section 9, Clause 9, relates to matters in regard to which the Legislature should give a remedy to shareholders. If he looks at Sub-section 9 he is right, but I think, in fairness to the much abused draftsman, he should have observed the governing words, "And that loss and damage has been thereby caused to the company and its creditors."

*MR. WARMINGTON: Those are the words I pointed to. A company is one thing, and the shareholders another.

*SIR RICHARD WEBSTER: It is only in cases in which the act complained of has caused damage to the company and its creditors that the remedy is given, therefore, it is absurd to say we intend to transfer a remedy that ought to be given to the shareholders to the company and its creditors. I am simply endeavouring to show that there is some ground for supposing there was an evil the framers of the Bill desired to meet. The hon. Member for Donegal (Mr. A. J. O'Connor), whom I admit has rendered himself thoroughly acquainted with the subject, thinks we are overloading the County Courts. The President of the Board of Trade indicated in his speech that the limit of £5,000 has been introduced as a figure on which discussion may take place, though the point is essentially one for consideration in Committee. It does not affect the principle of the Bill. As to the objection that certain clauses are not written out at large in the measure, I say at once that I should be prepared—though there is no necessity for the re-modelling or re-drafting of the Bill before it is considered—if the Grand Committee who deal with the Bill are of opinion that certain provisions in the Bankruptcy Act, or certain powers of the Companies' Act, should be incorporated or applied to the procedure here contemplated, to take the responsibility of writing out those clauses and putting them in the Bill. However, I do not think the Committee will desire that to be done. I am certain that if the President of the Board of Trade had come down to the House with a Bill consisting of 40 or 50 clauses, there would have been much greater opposition to the Second Reading. It seems to me that a wise discretion has been exercised in putting the Bill in such a shape as will accomplish the amendment of the law at which the Government aims. The hon. and learned Member for Stockton has referred to the 27 years' experience which we possess of the working of the Act of 1862, but it is perfectly clear that that experience has brought out some defects, and that the decisions of the Judges show that there are matters which require amendment. But it seems to me that before we attempt to codify the law we ought to cut out the rotten branches and endeavour to engraft new. Therefore, I think the argument based on experience is a strong justification of the course which has been adopted by my right hon. Friend in endeavouring to introduce into this Bill particular matters of amendment which he desires to press forward without entering upon a gigantic scheme which would eventually come out in the shape of a Bill for codifying the law. Voluntary liquidations are advisedly excluded from the Bill, and as to contributories, their omission is not due to carelessness, but it was thought, rightly or wrongly, that they ought not to be included as Members of the Committees proposed. I think the House will agree with me, however, that these are matters for discussion not on the Second Reading of the Bill, but in Committee. If I have failed to notice any point that has been raised during the debate, I hope it will not be thought I have done so out of any disrespect to hon Members, and, in conclusion, I have only to express a hope that a Bill which is brought in to introduce improvements into the law in some important particulars will be allowed to go before the Standing Committee.

*(10.10.) MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): It seems to me that this Bill is framed for the express purpose of encouraging litigation. There is not a clause which does not refer to one or two other Acts of Parliament that it is intended to incorporate. Under Clause 8 no power is given to the "prescribed officer" to report whether or not the officers of the company, whoever they may be, are knowingly or wilfully guilty of any of the offences referred to in the Act. The clause first appoints the prescribed officer as a judicial officer and afterwards transforms him into a prosecutor. The intention of Clause 9 seems to be to prevent people having anything to do with companies, either as officers or as shareholders. There is no allegation in Sub-Section (a) that it is necessary that there should be any intent whatever to mislead. It seems to me to be a principle of the English law that no offence is to be attributable to a man unless there is intent of some sort or other. Suppose a man came from America and brought with him a report from a banker, stating that on a certain property there were 5,000 head of cattle, and in consequence of that report certain persons became shareholders in a company; the mere fact of the report not being true would render them liable to make good the default of other people of which they were totally ignorant. Sub-Section (b) as to the misapplication of money seems to be intended to be read with Sub-section (e), which refers to rash or hazardous speculations. This, in my opinion, would put a stop altogether to the formation of companies for the carrying on of speculative business. Another sub-section provides that if a company postpones payment of any debt they will be unable to give a mortgage because that would be giving undue preference. I consider that the Bill ought to be consolidated with the Companies' Act, and with the Bankruptcy Act, if necessary, so that we could have one Act dealing with the whole subject. As it is, the measure could not be safely construed except on the advice of the highest legal practitioners. On that account alone I regard it as objectionable. Every measure of this kind ought, in my opinion, to be complete in itself, so that an ordinary layman may take it up and understand it without having to read through a number of other Acts.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now referred to the Standing Committee on Trade, &c."—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

*(10.12.) SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the views which have been expressed, he will consider the expediency before the Bill goes to the Standing Committee of inserting in it the clauses which it is proposed to incorporate in language fitting the case of winding-up. Surely there is great practical convenience in that course.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I quite appreciate the wishes of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and should be glad to meet his views. His suggestion can, I think, be carried out before the Select Committee, but there are obvious reasons why it may not be desirable to have to move two Motions at this stage. I trust the House will consent to send the Bill to the Grand Committee to-night.

*(10.13.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton): I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that he will move these Amendments in the Grand Committee, and of course we accept that. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Bill had not better go to the Grand Committee on Law instead of to the Grand Committee on Trade.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, Sir; both my hon. and learned Friend and myself are on the Grand Committee on Trade.

Question put, and agreed to.

COMPANIES (MEMORANDUM OF ASSOCIATION) BILL.—(No. 114).

Read a second time, and committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, &c.

BARRACKS (CONSOLIDATED FUND).

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

(10.15.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): It will be agreeable to the House that at the earliest moment I should place the Committee in possession of the main facts in connection with the barracks scheme of the Government. The Bill is of a financial character, and it is therefore right that some explanation should be given at this stage. It will not surprise any Member of the Committee that a Bill of this description should be necessary. Up to this time there has never been an attempt to devise a general scheme for the distribution and arrangement of our camps and barracks, to apply to them generally the principles of modern sanitary science, or to adopt the barrack system to the altered circumstances of the country. I may remind the Committee that last year

I placed the necessity of a large barrack scheme on three grounds. The first was that of economy. Our present haphazard system cannot be defended on the grounds of economy. The second ground was military efficiency. Nobody who looks into the matter can doubt that our military strength and the training of our troops is dribbled away by the way in which our troops are dispersed throughout the country. The third ground was the health and comfort of the men. Independently of other considerations I can, on sanitary grounds alone, make an overwhelming case in favour of dealing with this matter in a large and liberal spirit. First, I will refer to the great camps of the country. These camps originated mainly just after the Crimean War. There was then great want of accommodation for our troops. To meet pressing requirement huts were run up hurriedly of wood and other perishable material, and in spite of every effort these huts, intended only to last for a few years, are getting into a worse and worse condition. The huts at Aldershot are 35 years old, and in a very bad state. I will try to summarise the Reports which I have received from the General Officers Commanding, the medical officers and others. Those Reports state that the roofs of the huts, which are 35 years old, are flattening down, and the lower frames are rotten. More than 500 have had to be propped up. In addition to the state of the actual huts, the ground on which they stand is becoming so foul as to render them unfit for habitation; £7,000 a year are now being spent on repairs, the sum is annually increasing, and is quite insufficient to keep them in a sanitary condition.

*MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.). Whose Report is that?

*MR. E. STANHOPE. It cannot exactly be said to be any one's Report; I have summarised the facts from the reports of the General commanding at Aldershot; medical officers, and other people. I now come to Shorncliffe. The report is that the position of the huts in this camp is very exposed, and though in two of the lines a casing has been added, it is impossible under present conditions to keep the huts wind and water tight, and some of the quarters are scarcely habitable at all. In the other lines where hardly any casing has been added the state is even worse.

Mr. E Stanhope

Again, the huts at the camp on Woolwich Common were built 30 years ago, and these also are in a most unsatisfactory condition. The wood-work is rotten, and the stables have to be propped up.

Then to pass to the permanent barracks the first place among them must, of course, be assigned to Dublin. A large expenditure is necessary at Dublin in order to put the barrack accommodation into proper condition. The defects are absolutely notorious, and I fear that to accommodate the present number of troops it will be absolutely necessary not only to spend a good deal more money than has been spent in the sanitary improvements we are making, but to spend a considerable sum of money in providing new barracks in the vicinity of Dublin for the troops. Then there are the Galway Barracks, which are also notorious throughout the United Kingdom. I have two Reports on them. The first was made in 1859, and in that the Commission on Barrack and Hospital Improvement stated

"We wish to express our decided opinion with reference to the Shamblo and the Castle Barracks and Hospital that they are amongst the very worst specimens of public establishments we have ever seen."

The second sanitary Report, which I have recently called for from Galway, states that the Castle Barracks are all old, are in a cramped and confined space, and are very difficult to keep in proper condition. The Shamblo Barracks are in much the same state. The rooms are old and unfit for the troops, and are only occupied by a headquarters on account of the limited accommodation in Galway. These two barracks have been repeatedly condemned. Then as to the barracks at Portsmouth, every one knows that one of the two barracks there has been evacuated altogether by troops and is being used for stores, while the other has been pulled down. These barracks have been condemned over and over again, and when they were pulled down the Reports of the medical officers and general officer were found to be amply and fully justified. I could go on giving similar instances, but I should only weary the House; I think I have established enough for my immediate purpose. I am not for a moment casting blame on those who are responsible for barracks—the Royal Engineers. I believe that the Royal Engineers have done the best with the money provided for them. The difficulty is that in times when there has been a cry for a reduction of the Estimates the inclination has been to cut down the expenses for those things which, though necessary to be done, it cannot be said must be done at any particular time. Therefore, over a long period of years the Royal Engineers have not had put into their hands more than enough money to keep the barracks going, and they have never had enough money to deal with them on a really large and effective scale. Indeed, for some years past it has been obvious that the great reconstruction required could not be carried out by means of the annual Estimates only. I hope the Committee will think that on sanitary grounds I have made out a fair and reasonable case for the Government's being absolutely bound, if they wish to consult the health and comfort of the soldier, to make better provision in many cases for the housing of the troops, and upon a reasonably large scale. After having come to the conclusion that the sanitary state of barracks necessitated action, the next step was to frame a general scheme, showing what would be an ideal distribution of the troops in the United Kingdom. Such a scheme has been prepared by the Quartermaster General, and has undergone the most careful examination and consideration. In that scheme the endeavour has been to provide for all the objects for which an army is maintained in this country. There is the necessity for protecting fortresses and the capitals; the necessity for keeping a certain number of troops within reach of large masses of population; the necessity for continuing to use the barracks which are sufficiently healthy at the present time; and the necessity for having troops, as far as possible, within reasonable reach of a good rifle range. I do not pretend to say that an ideal scheme drawn up with those objects could be attained, even with the considerable expenditure which the Government propose. It could not, because there exist barracks in various situations which, although inconvenient, could not be abandoned altogether at the present time. But the advantage is that everything now proposed for the accommodation of the troops can be considered in reference to the largest and most comprehensive scheme ever laid down. The main object to be gained in trying to approximate to the ideal standard is the concentration of the troops. I do not mean merely that sort of concentration which will bring together in a single barrack a whole battalion which is at present scattered in various quarters at great inconvenience and loss of efficiency; but I mean the bringing into a station more than one battalion, more than one regiment, more than one battery, or even more than one arm of the Service. The first concentration is that of the Royal Artillery; and that, I am glad to say, has to a great extent already been effected. I have been advised that it is of the highest importance to the efficiency of the Royal Artillery that it should, as far as possible, be grouped together in groups of three, or at any rate two, batteries, and that it would lead to considerable economy in the working of our system, and accordingly we have endeavoured to accomplish that object. At present the depôts of all horse and field artillery are concentrated at Woolwich. We propose to make concentrations at Aldershot, Newcastle, Colchester, Sheffield, Hilsea, the Curragh, and other places. In several of these places the concentration has already been effected; but it has been done by taking over a part of certain infantry barracks, which has led to a demand for increased infantry accommodation. Some concentration will also take place with regard to the cavalry; but that arm of the Service must be mainly dealt with by bringing together scattered portions of the same regiment; and in putting cavalry in places where they can be more efficiently trained than is possible in the middle of a town. But the main concentration we have attempted is of infantry; and with regard to that it must be said that such concentration ought to be in camps. The time for placing troops in the middle of large towns has gone by. The conditions under which they were so placed have passed away to a large extent; but I do not for an instant suggest that the Government propose to move the troops from all the large towns where they are at present stationed; but, as far as possible, they should be placed in camps where they can be properly trained, and not in the middle of dense populations, for that is bad for the towns, and certain to impair the efficiency of the troops. Accordingly we look largely to extension of accommodation in camps where large bodies of troops can be exercised together, and the most careful consideration has been given to the place where such concentration can be best attained. Various places have been passed under review. The question whether Salisbury Plain is a suitable place to build barracks has been gone into. We considered also the claims of Cannock Chase, and we examined the suggestion made by great authorities, that it would be desirable to make a concentration to some extent in some place in the North of England, such as Strensall. But after careful consideration I have come to the conclusion, with the unanimous support of all my military advisers, that the great concentration ought to be at Aldershot. At Aldershot there is already a large quantity of land in the possession of the Government, and there exists a camp of great practical utility to the Army. Here, I am sure the Committee will forgive me if I venture to bear testimony to the great foresight and wisdom of the late Prince Consort. I believe it was largely due to him that the camp was established, and I am sure if he could now know the great advantage of the camp he would feel amply repaid. My belief is that it is both an economical and efficient system to establish our main camp at Aldershot and to extend the camp which now exists. There are at Aldershot at the present time three regiments of cavalry, eight batteries of the Royal Artillery, six companies of Royal Engineers, and nine battalions of infantry. The Government propose to add to these a battery of Royal Artillery and six battalions of infantry. To accomplish that object we shall have to re-construct a large portion of the existing camps, and we propose to continue the work now being carried on and complete the existing camps. If, however, the work is only carried on at the present rate I believe none of the Members of this Committee will live to see the completion of the work, and, of course, if we are going to add a large number of troops, very considerable additions to the camp will be required. The question then arises, whether we have sufficient land for our purpose. We believe that by a comparatively small addition of land, which can be obtained at a reasonable rate, we can provide not only ample accommodation for all the troops I have mentioned, but also a splendid exercise ground, much better than that which exists at present. Mainly in order to obtain that land, but also for other minor purposes, we have inserted powers in the Bill enabling us to purchase land compulsorily. Here I may say we have also the opportunity by arrangement with the Home Secretary of acquiring Woking Prison; and we intend to take advantage of that opportunity, so that at a comparatively small cost we shall have a barrack at Woking which will accommodate an infantry battalion, near a railway station, and within easy reach of Aldershot. The whole of the work thus described at Aldershot cannot be effectively carried out at a cost of less than something like £1,500,000. With regard to Shorncliffe, the barracks will be adapted mainly for cavalry and Royal Artillery, but something will have to be expended in the repairing of huts; indeed, the camp would require almost complete re-construction. At Woolwich the huts will also have to be repaired to a considerable extent, and for that provision will be made. There is one other camp in England to which I must refer—namely, that at Colchester. I know the condition of that camp is not altogether what we desire; but, upon the whole, and comparing it with other camps, I think the necessity for permanent re-construction is not so strong as in the cases already described, and that what is absolutely necessary at Colchester can be done out of the annual Estimates. At Portsmouth, as we have abandoned one barrack and utilised it for stores and pulled down another, it is absolutely necessary to build a barracks for the Royal Artillery and also complete the existing infantry barracks to enable them to contain a full battalion. At Plymouth the main complaint is the dispersion of the troops in a number of small places, so that the battalion is not brought together and enabled to be got in a thoroughly efficient state. The object of what is to be done there is by re-construction at the Citadel to accommodate a full battalion of infantry, and by certain other small re-constructions to concentrate other troops. The cavalry barracks at Manchester, I am satisfied, ought not to be maintained there. I have seen most of the places I have spoken of, and endeavoured with my own eyes to satisfy myself of the facts I am relating to the Committee. The Manchester cavalry barrack is surrounded by houses close up to the walls, and some of the houses in a low quarter of Manchester absolutely command the barrack windows. I believe the efficiency and certainly the health and comfort of the troops will be benefited by their removal to barracks in some place not too far from Lancashire some place from which we can easily move them if they are required in any large centre of population. I am not able to pledge myself as to where that place will be. There has been a good deal said in favour of Lichfield. Upon the whole that seems a suitable site, especially as the War Office already possess land there; but on this matter I desire to maintain a free hand until further inquiries have been made. I need only mention one other place in England—London. There is, undoubtedly, a very considerable difficulty here with regard to married men's quarters, and we must provide additional married soldiers' quarters somewhere. The only London barracks I need mention are the Albany Barracks, and the main defect is not their insanitary condition as regards the men, but as regards the horses. It is, undoubtedly, in that respect a bad barrack, but after very careful examination we are satisfied that at a comparatively moderate sum we can provide much better accommodation for the horses. The Committee ought clearly to understand that in the scheme now put forward I am only dealing with large permanent improvements; smaller works of a sanitary character ought we feel to be provided for in the Estimates of the year. Now I come to the case of Ireland. I do not think the Committee will be surprised to hear that the force in Ireland is considerably in excess of what is required there, and if new provision is to be made for troops the Government hold that it should be done in England and not in Ireland. At the same time, there is a considerable body of troops to be maintained in Ireland, and for those troops adequate provision must be made, and especially with reference to cavalry, which has better opportunities for exercise, and can be maintained more cheaply in Ireland than in England. At the Curragh the huts are in a deplorable condition, and many of the other barracks are just as bad, or even worse. We must deal with the case of the Curragh, where it is proposed to concentrate the cavalry regiments scattered in different parts of Ireland, and also three batteries of artillery. The next place I would refer to is Dublin, which is a very convenient place for barracks, and it is connected by rail with all parts of Ireland. At the same time, it is also probably the most difficult case with which we have to deal. The sanitary condition of the Royal Barracks has occasioned me almost as much anxiety as any question which I have had to consider. We have endeavoured to ascertain the cause of the defect, and have employed an entirely independent authority—Mr Rogers Field—to report on the Dublin Barracks, and to suggest anything necessary for improving the sanitary condition of the troops there. We are carrying out his recommendations, and we have spared neither pains nor money in endeavouring to put those barracks into perfect sanitary condition, although, no doubt, the state of Dublin drainage generally made it impossible to expect complete immunity from fever. At the same time, I admit that the Royal Barracks cannot be said to be up to the level of the general sanitary condition of Dublin, as is shown by the number of cases of enteric fever. I shall not rest satisfied until the Royal Barracks are in at least as good a sanitary condition as Dublin generally. If the hopes of the Government are realised, and they are able to put those barracks in a more satisfactory condition, we propose to set apart a portion of the barracks for the accommodation of stores, and, of course, naturally they would be convenient also for the men of the Army Service Corps, and that will enable us to get rid of the existing store houses, which are inconveniently situated. The changes proposed will also enable us to put into the barracks one infantry regiment. There are other barracks in Dublin with which we shall also have to deal. Several of them are not capable of containing a full battalion of infantry. Certain small additions have to be made for that purpose, and there are one or two demolitions that are absolutely necessary for the health of the troops. These, however, are comparatively minor matters, as compared with the larger scheme I now have to mention. We are building a cavalry barrack at Grange Gorman, close to the Phoenix Park, Dublin, most conveniently situated for the training of the troops; but we shall also require barracks for a battalion of infantry, though I am not quite certain yet what is the best place to build them in. For the various works I have sketched out in Dublin I shall have to ask the House to allow the Government to expend the sum of £270,000. Then there is the case of Belfast, where an enormous cost is annually incurred by the hiring of temporary quarters, and though there is no doubt a barrack is wanted there on sanitary grounds, I should prefer to justify the proposed expenditure in Belfast more especially on the ground of the large economy that will be effected by getting rid of the hiring system. The same remark applies to Enniskillen, where it is desirable to find accommodation for a whole infantry battalion, instead of the small proportion of troops at present quartered in that place. I now pass from the United Kingdom to the colonies. I hesitated a long time before I determined to ask my Colleagues to deal now with the foreign stations, thinking that this was a subject deserving separate consideration; but, after all, the health and comfort of our troops abroad is just as important as of those in this country, and the conditions to which they are sometimes subjected make it a matter of even greater importance to make the places in which they are accommodated wholesome, satisfactory, and comfortable. There is then, first, the case of Malta. There the garrison has recently been largely increased, and the barrack accommodation is quite inadequate for the large number of troops now maintained there; and accordingly it is proposed to erect an infantry barrack in a situation convenient both for health and for the purposes of the defence of the island. At the Cape, again, one of the barracks has got into a bad state, and for many years past the general officer commanding has recommended that something should be done for the purpose of putting them in a better condition. There we shall have to spend a considerable sum. Two cases of a minor character are those of Gibraltar and Bermuda. The sanitary condition of the barracks at Gibraltar is certainly unsatisfactory, the death-rate is exceptionally high, and we think a moderate and reasonable sum ought to be expended upon them, and the same is necessary in the case of Bermuda, in order to prevent the outbreaks of enteric fever which have occurred at both those stations during the last few years. Coming to the last head on which I have to ask the Committee to approve further expenditure, I have to observe that at present the cost for lodging is enormous; and it would be a real economy that quarters should be built in certain cases for the accommodation of married soldiers and warrant officers, thus getting rid of the lodging allowances. The cost of the expenditure under this head I put at £290,000, which would save at least £15,000 a year. There will be several other savings effected by carrying out the whole scheme. This year alone we have reduced the Barrack Vote by £40,000, and when the scheme is completed it is believed there will be a permanent saving on this Vote of at least £60,000. There are other expenses incurred at present in respect of travelling allowances to ranges and for other purposes, which will be saved by the changes proposed; and there is, lastly, the money that will be realised by the sale of certain old barracks, such as the Manchester Cavalry Barracks, and the proceeds of those sales will be credited to the amount the Committee are now asked to allow the War Office to expend. The sum which the Government estimate they will require to carry out the very important and extensive works which they now propose will not exceed £4,100,000, which is the sum mentioned in the Resolution. The precise form in which we propose to raise the necessary sum it would be the province rather of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to show; but this determination we have formed, at any rate, and strongly adhere to: from past experience we are satisfied that a great scheme of re-construction if once accepted by the House of Commons should be carried out without delay and without hesitation until completed. We are not, therefore, prepared to leave it to the chance of annual Estimates, and our proposal will be embodied in a Bill which we shall ask the House to sanction as a whole, and that done, the War Office will be bound to proceed with the scheme, in the prosecution of which they can only be stopped if Parliament in its wisdom think fit to repeal the Act. There are two other points which will, I think, commend themselves to the Committee. In the first place, I shall no doubt be asked what guarantee we can give to the Committee that the Estimates presented are fair and reasonable; that the Government are not embarking on an extravagant system of building, and that this very large work will be properly supervised in all respects when it is undertaken. I will tell the Committee the steps which I have endeavoured to take. In the first place, these plans have been most carefully prepared by the authorities now in charge of our barracks and are based upon their past experience. But the Government have not been satisfied with that. I have had also the independent opinion of a contractor who ranks high in his profession, and that gentleman has examined the plans very carefully, and has reported to me in strong terms with regard to them that he thinks the Government are getting full value for their money, and he expresses his approval of the plans, both with regard to material and as to construction. But we have not been satisfied even with that. We have, with the hearty assent of the Royal Engineers, now called in the assistance of two outsiders completely unconnected with the War Office, namely, Mr. Creed, the surveyor, to the Land Commission, and thoroughly acquainted with the subject in its rural aspect, and Mr. Pilkington, an architect of enormous experience in the planning of urban industrial buildings. I asked them to examine the plans, and tell me whether they could find anything in the proposed plans, either with regard to plan or material, which savoured in the slightest degree of extravagance, and also to make suggestions as to how the plans could in any way be improved so as to contribute more effectively to the object for which they are intended. Thus I had the fullest guarantee that the plans would be thoroughly examined by independent authorities, and might be confidently recommended to the House of Commons. The second point upon which the Committee will desire to have some assurance is that the sanitary arrangements of the new dwellings are satisfactory. It will, perhaps, naturally be felt that shortcomings in the past require such a guarantee, and the Committee will want to be assured that the Government are really going to satisfy modern sanitary requirements in a reasonable degree. The Committee will recollect the extraordinary interest taken by the late Mr. Sidney Herbert, afterwards Lord Herbert of Lea, in this question. He was the pioneer, in co-operation with Miss Nightingale, of proper sanitary improvements in barracks, and established a system which did an enormous amount of good at that time. Among other things Lord Herbert of Lea brought into existence a body known as the Sanitary Committee. It is now proposed to re-construct and revive Lord Herbert of Lea's Sanitary Committee. It will be composed of persons thoroughly qualified from different points of view to advise on the sanitary construction of these buildings, and I also propose the appointment of one expert, who will be able at any time to go down and examine any place where the Government think it desirable that his opinion should be obtained. This Committee will entail no extra charge upon the Exchequer. Its functions will be, in the first place, to examine all the plans the Government propose for the barracks, and to recommend what alterations they propose in order to bring the buildings up to the modern requirements of sanitary science, and also in the future to examine the Sanitary Reports both from India and the United Kingdom, and report to the Secretary of State for War for the time being on the measures taken for keeping camps and barracks in proper order. The House, therefore, may rest assured as far as sanitary science can go everything in reason will be done. I have now only to move the Resolution already in the hands of the Chairman. We believe that this measure will put all our barrack accommodation that specially requires attention upon a sound and decent footing. I am not going so far as to say that even at the present moment our barrack accommodation compares very unfavourably with that of some foreign countries; but in this country it ought to be better than in foreign countries. In this country much has been done of late years in the way of seeing to the housing of our working classes and the improvement of their dwellings both in town and country;

our barrack accommodation has lagged behind in this and in other ways. That reproach the Government now hope to remove, and with that hope I ask the House to allow me to introduce a measure which will get rid of it at least for a long time to come.

*(11.20.) MR. CAMPBELL BANNERMAN: In common with all hon. Members present, I listened with great interest to the statement which the right hon. Gentleman has just made with that lucidity which distinguishes all his utterances upon this important subject. Speaking for myself, I listened to that statement not only with interest, but with very considerable sympathy, because I am well aware that the housing of the troops of this country is in a most unsatisfactory state, and has been so for a long series of years. The right hon. Gentleman has spoken first of the unsatisfactory condition of the huts at Aldershot, the Curragh, and elsewhere, which are worn out and are almost unfit for habitation; and, for my own part, I should be glad if some reasonable scheme could be proposed for rendering those huts habitable and healthy without imposing too heavy a burden upon the taxpayers. In the second place, the right hon. Gentleman referred to the barracks, many of which, he stated, were in a more or less insanitary condition. I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman that many of those buildings are not only in an unsuitable locality, but are also in the worst part of that unsuitable locality, and that, therefore, it is desirable that the troops should be removed from such places altogether to places in which they would be accommodated under better conditions. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of a certain number of infantry battalions being concentrated at Aldershot and elsewhere, but he did not say where they were to be taken from. My experience in past years has been that when we speak of taking away a battalion of infantry or a regiment of cavalry from any particular locality the authorities at the Home Office are apt to put in a word in favour of retaining the troops where they stand. I should like to know from what particular locality these troops are to be taken, and whether the right hon. Gentleman has made things straight with his colleagues at the Home Office as to the removal. We must presume that the troops were placed in their present position in the public interest, and I suppose we can be assured that their removal will cause no detriment to the Public Service. What I desire to say, however, is that this House, as far as I know, will grudge nothing that is necessary for securing the health of our troops or the sanitary condition of the barracks in which they are quartered. I, however, desire to make this proposal part of a much larger question. I wish to know whether, in point of fact, we require all the troops for whom this accommodation is asked. Last year we had a statement from the First Lord of the Admiralty when he brought forward a proposal for an expenditure of a large sum of money upon the Navy; and now we are asked by the right hon. Gentleman to sanction an expenditure of a sum of upwards of 4 millions sterling—very much "upwards," I fear—for I hardly think we shall keep within the limits of what the right hon. Gentleman calls the net sum. We are invited to spend £4,000,000 upon barracks without any information being given as to whether we really need the large military force which we at present possess. If the Navy is being greatly strengthened the fewer troops should we require, and I think that the House of Commons is entitled to some further statement from Her Majesty's Government on the subject. I do not know whether Her Majesty's Government will be disposed to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, so that there might be a thorough inquiry into the whole scheme. I think that such an inquiry would tend to strengthen the hands of Her Majesty's Government, if they have a good case. The right hon. Gentleman has satisfied himself, or thinks he will be satisfied, as to the sanitary improvements to be made in the barracks. These are very important points, but the great point is as to the necessity of this expenditure, and the conditions under which it is to be made, and I think the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War, as well as the Chancellor of the Exchequer, will admit that it is not an unreasonable suggestion that the House of Commons should have an opportunity, by means of a Committee, of inquiring into this subject, which really lies very much by itself, and is just the sort of subject which the Committee of this House could with advantage inquire into. I venture to say that such an inquiry, conducted by a Committee of the House, would be much more useful than those general fishing inquiries into the Army and Navy Estimates which we have seen, and of which I can speak with some confidence, having myself been Chairman of one of the Committees, and which really do not result, as I think experience has proved, in very much good; whereas a definite inquiry by a Committee into a subject such as this might at once enlighten the House and secure the interests of the public, and at the same time strengthen the hands of the Government, if they really have a good case for the proposals they now make. At this stage of the proceedings I do not think it is to be expected that we should pronounce an opinion either for or against the whole or any part of the scheme, but I thought it right to make these observations on the first blush of the matter, and I hope the Government will take them into their consideration.

*(11.35.) SIR WALTER BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I quite agree with my right hon. Friend who has just sat down that no man could have given a more clear or more lucid statement than my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War. More than that, I go further, and I say that he seems to have carefully considered the whole question, and to have taken, as far as he has been able, every pains that every particular and every detail of this great scheme should be brought under his especial notice. But I must say this one thing. We have had the gravest condemnation both from my right hon. Friend on this side of the House and from my right hon. Friend opposite upon the great neglect which Governments have shown in the past for the welfare of the troops. No man could have listened to what has been said on both sides of the House on this subject without coming to the conclusion that we have not done our duty in carrying out those sanitary precautions which make the life of a soldier bearable. But, Sir, there is something beyond this. It has been admitted on both sides of the House that successive Governments have been anxious to cut down the expenditure, and have cut it down, especially in those directions where outlay is necessary for the health and well-being of the troops. I will only venture to say, without going into detail, because it is absolutely out of place at this time, that the country itself will rejoice to hear that their troops are going to be placed in the same position, as regard health, as those unfortunate people are who are in workhouses or confined in prisons. We have looked after the health of everybody else, but we have absolutely and thoroughly neglected the Army in this respect. I recollect, years and years ago, being in barracks which were at that time considered to be absolutely unfit for habitation. Those barracks still exist. They have been temporarily patched up from time to time, but their condition is no better now than it then was, and they remain a scandal and disgrace to the country. My right hon. Friend who last addressed the House spoke very strongly about troops being taken away from the towns; but I thought one of the great objects of this scheme was to take the troops out of the towns, and to place them in some position close to railways, so that they can be conveniently conveyed into the towns in case of necessity. And I venture to believe that my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, so long as he knows that troops are within easy distance of towns should their services be required, will not object to their removal from those towns to barracks more healthily situated. It has also been asked where the new troops to be concentrated at Aldershot are coming from, and my right hon. Friend especially stated that they were coming from Ireland. I rejoice to hear that Ireland is in so satisfactory a condition that we are able at the present moment to look forward with satisfaction to the withdrawal of troops from the country. That speaks a great deal for the management of my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland. My right hon. Friend opposite went on to say he would like to know if the number of men in the Army could not be decreased. That, Sir, is a very serious question indeed. He has been Secretary for War, and he knows, and knows well, that in case of emergency we have not been able to put sufficient troops into the field without calling out the Army Reserves. He knows perfectly well that even now the regiments at home have to be depleted of their best men in order to fill up the regiments serving in India. Then how can we afford to reduce the number of troops?

I think it would be a most unwise step to take at this particular time. Next, my right hon. Friend said let us have a Committee. He is like many other people who, when we have got a statement before us, when we have seen a scheme which is to be put forward by the Government, are anxious to shelve the whole question by referring it to a Committee. He does not mean to tell us the Committee will not call for all sorts of evidence under the sun. He does not mean to tell us that we shall be able to proceed with this scheme as early as my right hon. Friend is anxious to commence. All he says is—let us have an inquiry. First, as to how many men we want; secondly, where the barracks ought to be placed; and thirdly, what the cost should be. And, in passing, I would like to make one allusion to the sanitary question, and to point out that we have never yet found that sanitary men or experts have been able to build great buildings without some fault or defect being subsequently discovered in the sanitary arrangements. Look at our great offices in Whitehall, and how they had to be altered. Surely, then, we ought not to allow the difficulties of sanitation to further delay the carrying out of that most important scheme. And all I can say is that I hope my right hon. Friend will, before he allows any barrack to be commenced, see that the proper sanitary arrangements are made, which alone can be conducive to the health of the troops. My right hon. Friend has done good service to the country. He has not blinked the question, as he would have done had he asked for a very small sum; but he has been bold enough, and wise enough, and prudent enough, to ask for a large sum, a sum which, however, I will venture to say, the country will ungrudgingly grant if the necessity for it is proved to exist.

(11.45.) SIR W. CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): I am very glad that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War has taken this whole matter into his consideration and asked for a sum of money which will enable him to carry out the work properly. Am I to understand that the only concentration of troops will take place at Aldershot? The right hon. Gentleman said nothing about concentrations at large centres in the north. I should further like to ask what is to be done with the cavalry barracks at Leeds, which are in a disgracefully bad state. Also, are the barracks at Norwich and Brighton to be done away with? And finally, will there be a Schedule attached to the Bill showing where the new buildings are to be constructed, and how many men they will accommodate?

Sir Walter Barttelot

(11.46.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): As the camp at Aldershot happens to be in that part of Hampshire which I have the honour of representing in this House, I should like to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on having made up his mind to spend a certain amount of money for permanent barracks, and I should also like to congratulate him on having induced the Chancellor of the Exchequer to advance the money. As the right hon. Gentleman has said, the huts at Aldershot were built at the time of the Crimean War. They were built, I believe, to last 20 years, and they are constructed of weather boards and felt roofings. But they have already been in existence upwards of 30 years. At the present time, I believe it costs about £5 a year for the repairs necessary for each hut, and, therefore, I believe that the scheme for erecting permanent barracks will, in the long run, prove economical, because it will do away with the necessity for this large annual expenditure on repairs. But in addition to that, it will be all the better for the health of the troops. We make a great outcry about the housing of our labourers, but I venture to say that very few labourers are housed in such a manner as are our troops at Aldershot. Many of the huts there are not fit for men to live in. Now that we are to have a large camp, I hope that attention will be paid to the housing of our soldiers as well as of our labourers.

*(11.47.) MR. E. STANHOPE: The right hon. Gentleman has asked me whether the proposal I have laid before the Committee has the assent of the Home Secretary. Of course it has. I spoke in the name of the Government. He also asked for a Committee to inquire as to what the strength of the Army ought to be. Well, I entirely repudiate any such idea. The strength of the Army must depend on the responsibility of the Government of the day, and we accept that responsibility in full. We are satisfied we are not going into any excess, but I doubt, if all our troops returned from abroad, whether even under this scheme the accommodation would be adequate. I am not prepared to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman to appoint a Committee; we must keep the responsibility in our own hands. As to the camps in the North of England, we have no idea of abandoning them. On the contrary, we shall extend them. With regard to the barracks at Leeds, that has been a question fraught with great anxiety; and with the full concurrence of the Commander-in-Chief we have decided to retain them, although the surroundings are not altogether satisfactory. We do not propose to insert in a schedule the barracks we intend to retain, as the difficulty of carrying the Bill would be enormously aggravated. I am ready to give full information to the public, because I believe our scheme is amply justified.

*(11.49.) MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the barracks at Preston which may easily be made suitable for cavalry. Till recently a battery of Artillery has been stationed there, but it has been removed to Woolwich. The barracks are in an excellent place outside the town, and they are well built, and are provided with a well appointed riding school and other appliances, and could, I believe, be easily made available for a cavalry regiment. In view of the fact that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to remove the cavalry from Manchester, I would suggest to him that Preston would be a more suitable place for locating them than Lichfield.

(11.50.) MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The Resolution, Sir, which you have read from the Chair appears to deal only with the question of barracks, but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for War told the House that his scheme extended beyond that, because it included the purchase of land. I do not know whether it will not be necessary to alter the Resolution, as a Bill is to be founded upon it. But I rise for the purpose of asking the Secretary for War whether he will afford the House information with regard to the mode in which the scheme will affect what was intended to be carried out under the mobilisation of the forces many years ago. In connection with that scheme a certain amount of barrack accommodation was erected in different parts of the country, and I think we ought to be informed whether the barracks then put up will be utilised. There is a reflection which occurs to my mind and which I suspect will occur to many other people to-morrow when they read the account of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman. Here we have a War Minister coming down to ask a vote of between four and five millions, and in order to justify that expenditure he gives a most lamentable account of the present condition of the barracks in different parts of the country. Nothing could be more emphatic than this condemnation of the conduct of present and past Governments. How is it, and why is it, that with the hundreds and thousands of pounds, aye, the millions of pounds, which have been voted in the last two decades in connection with buildings and repairs, we are now told that the barrack accommodation at Aldershot and and at the principal stations in this country is simply scandalous and deplorable? Whose fault is it? It is not the fault of the House of Commons, for I never knew the House begrudge money for work of this description. The responsibility must rest with the right hon. Gentleman and his predecessors. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman owes the House some kind of apology for the state of neglect and disrepair into which the barracks have fallen, and also for their insanitary condition. The country ought to have some explanation of how it is this has come about, and they ought to know upon whose shoulders rests the responsibility.

COLONEL NOLAN: I must express my gratification that the worst barracks in the country—Galway Barracks—are going to be dealt with under this scheme. But there is one point to which I should like to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman, and that is to the accommodation at the dépôt centres. He will find, if he inquires into the matter, that the barracks at these places have not been erected on the most economical scale. They are too small for the number of troops that ought to be provided for, but the accommodation for the staff is unnecessarily large and out of proportion.

*(11.54.) MR. STANHOPE: In reply to the hon. Member, I may say that the dépôt centres will continue to be used hereafter, as at present, with possibly one exception.

*(11.55.) MR. H. J. WILSON (York

W.R., Holmfirth) : I think the right hon. Gentleman must have failed to catch a portion of the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for East Donegal, who asked how it is that the barracks have got into such a condition.

*MR. STANHOPE : It is impossible at this hour to go into that question ; but if hon. Members desire to pursue it at another time, I shall be happy to meet them. I accept my share of the responsibility ; but I think I shall be able to satisfy the House that during the two or three years I have been in office, I have done something to remedy the defects at our military centres, although I may not have been able to apply an adequate remedy.

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment out of the Consolidated Fund, and out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of sums for the purpose of building and enlarging barracks and camps in the United Kingdom, and in certain Colonies.

Resolution to be reported To-morrow.

BANKRUPTCY (IRELAND) BILL (No. 156).

SECOND READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. P. M'DONALD (Sligo, N.) : Will the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland furnish the House with any information in regard to this Bill?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University) : The Bill is one that has been very carefully prepared, and it is also one in which I am aware the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. M'Donald) takes great interest ; but as it has only been circulated to-day, and as the subject is one of importance, I desire, as far as possible, to ascertain the views of the mercantile community of Ireland upon it before it is further considered in this House.

MR. A. O'CONNOR : Will the hon. and learned Gentleman promise that at a future time, after he has had the opportunity of ascertaining the opinions of the mercantile community in Ireland, he will afford the Irish Members an early opportunity of considering the matter?

*MR. MADDEN : I can give no pledge on the subject.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday, 6th March.

M O T I O N S.

EMPLOYERS' LIABILITY FOR INJURIES TO WORKMEN BILL.

(12.0.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.) : I ask leave of the House to bring in a Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the liability of employers for injuries to their workmen.

EXAMINATIONS FOR OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS.

EARL WEMYSS: My Lords, in rising to bring before you the notice which stands in my name on the Paper, I have to make a double apology to your Lordships. I have, first, to apologise for this notice having last Session been so long on the notice Paper, and for not having brought it forward, but, as perhaps some of your Lordships know, when those twin enemies of man, gout and neuralgia, get possession of one's person, they do so to the exclusion of everything else. It was physically impossible for me, therefore, to come down to this House for the purpose of bringing this matter forward. I make that apology to those in particular who may have suffered inconvenience from my inability to attend. The second apology I have to make is for venturing at all to bring this subject before your Lordships, but the explanation I have to make for doing so is this: Those of your Lordships who read the Nineteenth Century—and who does not?—are probably aware that at the close of 1888 and the beginning of 1889 the pages of that periodical were full of letters and articles upon the question of examination. Against what is called "The sacrifice of Education to Examination" a very numerous signed protest was drawn up which appeared in the columns of that serial. On turning to that protest I find it was signed by 415 persons. There were among them 12 Peers, 73 Members of Parliament, 154 principals, professors, tutors, heads of schools, ladies, and others connected with education. Of those persons 37 who signed the general protest, I should mention, signed it with reservation. Now, my Lords, I signed among others, not on account of having any special knowledge of the subject, but in agreement with the general feeling which I have no doubt exists throughout the country, and possibly among your Lordships, that this system of examination was and is being carried in this country to an extreme. I afterwards, to my surprise, one day received a letter from three gentlemen who had been most active in making the protest, Mr. Lowe, Mr. Auberon Herbert, and Mr. Frederic Harrison, asking me to bring this matter before your Lordships' House, and ask for the appointment of a Royal Commission. My answer was that I had no special aptitude for this work, that I had simply signed the protest to show my own feeling in reference to it, and that there were many Members of your Lordships' House far more able to deal with the subject, to whom they had better appeal. But having received a further letter from them I think your Lordships will agree that I could do no other than consent to bring this matter before you. In doing so, I shall not venture to give you any opinions of my own upon this most important matter; your Lordships must look upon me as a sort of telephonic instrument, which will bring to your ears the views and opinions which have been uttered outside the walls of this House; and in giving those views and opinions I shall endeavour to do so in as condensed a form as I can. For that I pray your Lordships' patience. I wish I had the power of condensation, which, as the story goes, was once possessed by a French cook—I do not know whether he was in the service of the Noble Earl Granville—who was supposed to be very extravagant and wasteful of meat. When he was reprimanded, and asked what had become of an "ox which had been sent into the larder a few days before," he was equal to the occasion, for, putting his hand into his pocket he drew forth a meat lozenge — "Voilà le bœuf de

Monsieur." I repeat that I wish I had such powers of condensation ; but I have endeavoured, out of the documents which have appeared upon the subject, to summarise, as far as I can, what appear to me to be the principal protests against the cramming examinations which are conducted at the present time. I think I had best begin by touching upon the general protest upon the question. To discuss the general question would embrace the whole subject of education and culture ; but my Motion is confined to two points, namely, inquiry into the means for obtaining good public servants for the service of the State, and also inquiry into what is done abroad, so that we may, if possible, profit by the methods adopted in foreign countries. I believe that as regards the arguments against the general system of education, so far as general education is concerned, this is the sort of thing that is said : that education, generally speaking, in the proper sense of the word is sacrificed to examination ; that is, education in the true sense of teaching—that which trains the mind and faculties ; and that training of the mind and faculties is impossible with the rapidly succeeding examinations of students, which are constantly going on at the present time. I see that one of the fellows of Oriel says that between the ages of 7 and 22, he was never examined less than twice a year. Then it is stated that what is thus learnt for examination purposes is rapidly forgotten : the examinees' memory is called "a ten-days' memory," and no wonder. The Duke of Argyll, speaking of the present system, says—

"In primary education we have an overburdened memory and a weakened brain, and in higher education an artificial examination."

Then it is said that the aims of students are misdirected : that instead of being directed to learning, culture, and education in the proper sense of the term, men's aims are entirely directed to getting money—prizes, scholarships, and fellowships—and making way in life. The result is that you have superficiality, monotony, and men turned out as from a one-pattern machine. All play of imagination or individual character is crushed out, as it were, by an iron roller, and you have uniformity where Nature intended variety. Education is given into the hands of two classes of specialists, the examiners and the crammers, and everything is directed to the examinations. And what is the direction of these examinations ? They cause the construction of analyses, summaries, and tables to be substituted for the study of Standard works, and the Association of Teachers meets to discuss what are called "wrinkles" in examinations, those wrinkles being intended to meet the crotchets of examiners, with which they are well acquainted. A teacher says that his most intelligent pupils do not do best in examinations. Now here is what a lady, a parent, says—

"It is the duty of parents to revolt against the present system, because a child's life is a perfect torture, and no heed is taken of the child's intellectual bent."

Sir Sydney Waterlow states that he is Governor of a school where there are 800 out-door pupils and 200 boarders, and that in that school

"Ever since they had prevented the headmaster trying for payment by results the educational improvement in the school had been manifest and great."

I am happy to say that, under the wise rule of my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Scotland, within the last fortnight, a revised educational Code for Scotland has come out, under which payment for results in schools is in a great measure done away with ; the payment is given for classes, and much discretion is given to the schoolmaster as to how he will classify his scholars. That is what has been very much wanted ; what parents and teachers have been asking for ; and I think I may say that the proposal of my noble Friend has been received with gratitude in Scotland by all who are interested in teaching. Now, my Lords, the general system of these examinations is pithily put by an old Parliamentary friend of mine, Admiral Sir J. Hay, who says, "There is really nothing like our present system of examination—except in China." It is true we have not got quite to the point yet that they have reached in China in this respect. I saw in a paper the other day that at Canton they have what is called an "examination lottery ;" that is to say, they bet on the students who are going up for examination just as they do in this country upon horse races on Epsom Downs; and in China, too, it is said, that both horses and jockeys—that is, the students and the examiners—are occasionally “made safe” in order that those who make the bets may win in those lotteries. Well, I trust we shall not come to that; but I have here a passage in which a very distinguished scientific man puts the argument very strongly and clearly—Professor Huxley. He says about examinations—

“Examination, like fire, is a good servant, but a bad master, and there seems to be some danger of its becoming our master. I by no means stand alone in this opinion. Experienced friends of mine do not hesitate to say that students whose careers they watch appear to them to become deteriorated by the constant effort to pass this or that examination, just as we hear of men’s brains becoming affected by the daily necessity of catching a train.”

“They work to pass and not to know; and outraged science takes her revenge. They do pass and do not know.”

So much, my Lords, for the general question of education in the proper sense of the term. I point out opinions. I do not merely give names, but they are the names of most distinguished persons who hold these views which I have endeavoured to summarise. This is one class of arguments against the over-cramming produced by the present examination system; but there is one most important feature of the subject, and that is the effect produced on the health, not only on the present but of the coming generations. Here is what is said upon this matter by medical men of great distinction. One says that—

“A great increase of nervous affections is due to”—what?—“school examinations, that much brain disease results from over-pressure, and that both home and colonial experience bears this out.”

Another says—

“That where there are no counter-athletics the physique is deteriorated.”

Dr. Avery says—

“That the effect on girls of over mental strain is great. They grow up highly nervous women, giving birth in case of their marriage to weak and deteriorated offspring.”

And he goes on to say—

“The spirit of emulation is stronger in girls than in boys, and makes them work beyond their strength.”

I was talking to the Rector of St. James’s, Mr. Kemp, and he told me that his observations bore that out, for he said “I constantly see how overworked and strained young women pupil teachers are.” For a moment I may be forgiven, perhaps, for adding upon this point that as I was coming down to this House in a hansom this afternoon, I found I was being pursued by a brougham and pair which finally overtook me. A medical friend jumped out and said, as he knew I was going to the House to bring forward this subject, he would tell me a very instructive incident bearing upon it. He had been attending a lady who had already added several boys to the population. Her boys had recently gone through some severe competitive examinations. After recovering from the chloroform which had been administered to her, she eagerly asked “Is it a boy or a girl?” On being told it was a boy, she burst into tears and said, “Oh dear, then we shall have all those horrid cramming examinations to go through again.” That shows what an influence these examinations have had on people’s minds in this country, and how they look forward to modifying them. Dr. Warre, the Master of Eton, spoke in the Letters from all Sorts and Conditions of Men, of there being many more boys at Eton wearing spectacles than there used to be, and that many a bright boy between 12 and 15 becomes blunt and dull from this cause. And we are told that many more of our distinguished schoolmen die in early life entirely from the results of the work entailed upon them in preparing for these examinations. Now, my Lords, I come to the specific subject of my Motion, namely, whether or not this system is good for the public service, and whether it is the best means that we could adopt for the purpose of giving us efficient public servants. As regards the public service in the Army and Navy, I do not propose to go into that branch of the question. Still, one cannot help thinking there is something wrong in the Army Examinations when one finds what men have to go through. I saw the other day a friend of mine, a captain of Volunteers; we were out shooting, and I thought he looked very much depressed and out-of-sorts. On asking him “What is the matter?” he said, “I have to go up to London for my military examination, and what bothers me is that I have got to sit up all night and learn forty pages by heart; I must not miss a particle or a word of it, and that is where the trouble occurs." I do not think that is a practical way of training men. I think it would be much better to train men in manœuvres and in what they would be called upon to go through in actual warfare. They should be trained for that purpose in the open country, say at Aldershot, and be taught to manœuvre their men under instructing officers, and should be required to show that they had the requisite knowledge of ground. It was not examination that gave us our great generals and admirals of olden times, and, as far as I know, no examination-general has ever had a command yet, except one distinguished officer of the Staff College. As regards generals in command, I do not think any such officers have been in active service, and we have yet to learn whether all that is done in the way of examination in the Army is likely to give us anyone fit to be chosen for it. At any rate, it strikes me that is not the way to make practical soldiers. But, my Lords, it is more especially with the Civil Service that I have to do on the present occasion, and the question is, Does this system of competitive examinations give us the best type or the best men for that service? I happened to be at the Treasury when this system originated. It was in 1852 or 1853 under Lord Aberdeen's Administration; and I well recollect hearing that the whole question of the Civil Service was to be gone into by Sir Charles Trevelyan and a gentleman whom we did not know then at the Treasury. We asked who he was, and we were told that he was a great friend of Mr. Gladstone—by name Sir Stafford Northcote. He was not in Parliament then. That was really the beginning of this new system of Civil Service Examinations. But what was the cause of its origin? It was want of courage on the part of public men and Members of Parliament to enquire into the merits of individuals and to recommend proper persons for admission to the Civil Service; and they thought they would get rid of the whole thing by sending all the candidates to a cram-examination, and so have all responsibility taken off their shoulders.

Earl Wemyss

That was the cause of the system being instituted, and I think your Lordships will not say that it was a good origin. I will say very little, but I hope it will be to the point on this question. Lord Rosebery put the case in a nutshell when he wrote to the Nineteenth Century:—

"I am deeply impressed with the fact that by the present system we lose many excellent, and obtain many useless men."

Another extract from these letters, which I will read to your Lordships is from one by Lady Taylor, the widow of a man well-known to us, Sir Henry Taylor, who was for many years at the Colonial Office. No better public servant I think ever held office. She says:—

"The present system is torture to the victims and does not supply the best materials."

Such, she says, was her husband's opinion; and he said that—

"If our present system had been in force in 1824, he never would himself have got into the Civil Service."

And Lady Taylor says:—

"In such case the State would have lost 50 years' service" from one of its best, as he was generally recognised, Civil servants. Moreover, a point which I would bring particularly to your Lordships' attention is that we do not carry this principle out to the full. It is only appointments in the lower branches of the Public Service that are put up for competition and examination. Cabinet Ministers are not so chosen; Judges are not so appointed; the Right Reverend Bench is not so filled; professors, one and all, are not so chosen. I go further, and ask would any of your Lordships be content to choose your land agent who works for you, or even the odd men working about your house, by such a system as this of competitive examination? Take for instance the Cabinet—I do not say the present Cabinet, but almost any other Cabinet Ministers who have ever held office, would they if that office had to be filled by examination have been able to assert their right to the positions they held? Certain I am, I may say, of one who would have been so qualified, and that is the present Prime Minister. I well remember being told by an Oxford man, the son of the late General Peel, in the course of a conversation about Oxford—"We have at the present moment the future Prime Minister at Oxford." I asked, what is his name? and he said "Robert Cecil." Therefore I have no doubt that if there had been necessity for it my noble Friend the Prime Minister would have succeeded in putting himself in the front in any competitive examination. But there is a very important branch of the Civil Service which we are told suffers greatly by this system, and that is the Indian Civil Service. In India you have races who are extremely intelligent, who know the sort of men who go out there; they draw comparison between the Civil servants of pre-examination times and those who are appointed by special examinations; and they say that there is deterioration in many respects, in many qualities—I will not say precisely what they are—but qualities which are essential for governing those races. They see that manifest deterioration and falling off. Nothing can be stronger than the expression used in a published letter of Sir William Gregory, than whom there is, I think your Lordships will agree, no greater authority as a highly cultured man. He lays the greatest possible stress on the deterioration in the Indian Civil servants and the danger arising from it; he hopes there may be some remedy found for this, as he considers, very pressing and immediate danger; and he speaks most strongly of the necessity for some security being taken for the choice of men fit to deal with and be entrusted with the government of highly intellectual races. Now, all I shall say further upon this subject is in reference to the concluding part of my Motion in regard to how far the system now adopted in this country prevails abroad. I am desired to ask that an inquiry should be made into the working of foreign systems. I find that there is no competition in any of the 26 States of Germany in the sense of our competitive examinations in England. They have qualifying examinations for categories and posts in which success is essential. In fact the English system obtains nowhere in Europe except in France; and what says M. Yves Guyot upon the subject? He writes—

"La protestation est juste; si elle est juste en Angleterre, à plus forte raison l'est elle en France, où nous sommes tous des petits Mandarins, qui n'avons la permission de devenir quelque chose qu'après avoir été broyé par un tas de laminoirs qu'on appelle des examens et des concours, et tout est demandé à la mémoire, rien au jugement, où le mieux noté est celui qui a le mieux retenu la leçon du maître et n'a jamais pensé pour lui-même."

He says if this protest which we are making is right in England, it is even more so in France, where they are all "petty-Mandarins," who have not permission to become anything except after being crushed by examinations and competition, where everything is asked of the memory and nothing of the judgment. And he says of those examinations, that the man who gets the most marks is he who has best retained the lessons he has learned from his master and has never thought for himself. The American view of the subject also bears out that which I venture to set before your Lordships from the protest. From letters published in New York, it appears that this question is being raised in that country also. A New York publication which is headed "Examination and Education," published by Leonard, states that President Adams, of Cornell University, says:—

"From his own experience the best work was done where there was the largest freedom; the least satisfactory where there was the most rigid system of examination and marks. The German method is superior to the English; American experience accords with the German."

Professor Thompson, of the University of Pennsylvania, writes:—

"Thus far we have avoided the worst defects of the English system. We have kept examinations in the hands of teachers, which minimises cramming."

Chancellor Sims, of Syracuse University, declares the whole system of prizes and scholarships and other honours on examination to be vicious and hurtful. And Professor Rogers, of Harvard College, says:—

"It is almost a truism since the days of Matthew Arnold that in Germany, the land of few examinations, scholarship has touched a mark far beyond that reached in England, where an examination begins and concludes everything."

My Lords, I have nothing more to quote to you in opposition to the present system of cramming-examinations, but as my object in moving for this Commission is that in doing so both sides of the question should be brought before the House, so that your Lordships may decide which is right and which is wrong, I think it is right that I should now say a few words on the other side. A reply to that protest has appeared in the Nineteenth Century, and I think I may say that the general answer given is that examination and competition act as a stimulus to candidates to work, and that without it not one in ten, or even one in a hundred, would work for learning's sake. Lord Thring, in his answer to one of the published letters, also says that he does not think you can get boys to learn for learning's sake, and that you must give a stimulus in the shape of scholarships and prizes, or perhaps, as he says, even a stimulus behind. What he means by that I will not attempt to explain. Then they say in defence of this system that there is no other means of avoiding favouritism in appointments to public offices than by throwing them open to competition. That was the very reason why, as I have told your Lordships, this vicious system was first introduced. This necessity, I grieve to say, is considered to be much greater now under a Government of the democracy than ever it was under a Government conducted by a bloated aristocracy. Let me give the House a very short summary of the view of, I suppose, one of the chief of crammers—Mr. Scoon, a man of extreme ability, who has done good service in getting young men forward for examination. He sends foxes into the Philistines' corn. He does not mince matters in answering his opponents, and he says that the agitation against examination is due to the unendowed coach; that a private tutor is rarely consulted before the University course for better or worse is closed, by which enthusiasm is kindled not so much for the acquisition of knowledge as for the objects of knowledge; that it is the University men and not the coaches who swamp the country with detestable primers, summaries, and digests which supply the place of larger works, and the use of which deprives the candidates of the power of thinking out even the value of an adjective; that injury is done to health by examinations; that the unendowed coach represents the survival of the fittest; and that high-class candidates are successful without the aid of tips. My Lords, I have now stated both the arguments against and those in favour of the present system. There have also appeared in the publications to which I have referred and in the letters of different kinds from which I have quoted, suggestions as to what should be done in the way of remedy for the defects which the writers themselves see. For, mark, in all this correspondence, in all the remarks of those who defend the existing system, they do not defend it exactly as it is. They defend examination, they defend competition; but they do not defend the examinations as they are now conducted, for I think, almost without exception, they say reform of some kind is wanted. The difficulty is for them to find what the change should be; they do not see their way, and meantime they are content to more or less let things alone. Still, if they do not ask for, they are not opposed to the appointment of a Commission of Inquiry, and in that way they hope that some outlet will be found. Of those suggestions I have noted a few. They mainly resolve themselves into qualified selection, limiting and controlling appointments by examination. All educational examinations of pupils, it is again strongly recommended, should be conducted by teachers with an independent assessor. Then grants of money to deserving students are recommended without examination, and on the recommendation of college and school authorities, rather than awards of scholarships and prizes by competitive examination. Others again think that physical tests should be added to examinations, and that marks should be allowed for them. Lord Lytton wishes the Public Service to be supplied by qualification, subject, if possible, to selection, while Lord Derby is of opinion that some substitute for competitive examinations is required which would give equally free opportunities to all. Lord Carnarvon says there is nothing like the old Oxford University honors system; and no man is more entitled to speak of that system than Lord Carnarvon, who under it distinguished himself so much at the University. He also says he would be in favour of nomination with a high qualifying test, as in the Foreign Office. Lord Pembroke says there should be a pass-examination put at whatever height you choose, and then there should be physique tests. In Holland there is a system existing which is said to work extremely well. For public appointments there is a qualifying examination, with a nomination of candidates to the qualifying examination from the universities and schools. When the nominations are vested in the universities and schools, there would be much less chance of jobbery than if they were in the hands of public officials. Now, my Lords, my task is at an end, and, as I have said, it is not a responsibility which I have taken upon myself. I am simply the mouthpiece of others. I will only say I wish that, in addition to what I have been able to state with regard to the views of distinguished persons, I could bring any experience of my own to bear upon this matter of examination; but I recollect hearing, many years ago, that the grandfather of one of your Lordships once said, "He thanked God he was born before that scoundrel Jenner adulterated the race." And I, for my part, thank God that I was born before men were put, as they are now, under this torturing examination harrow. My examinations at Oxford were very much the same, I have no doubt, as those of many of my noble Friends—on entering the University for the Little-Go, and for one's Degree. I am happy to say that is the whole amount of examination to which I have ever been subjected; and my first examination, on entrance into the University, was, I recollect, not very formidable. I was marched up the Hall where all the tutors stood in a row, into the presence of the Dean, and the Dean simply put one very searching question to me—"How is your father?" I supposed I answered that question very satisfactorily, for I was instantly passed and became entitled to all the privileges of the University. I cannot, therefore, my Lords, thank God, speak to the working of these examinations from personal experience; but I think I have said enough, quoting from these authorities, some of them among the most distinguished men in the land, who have expressed their views on this subject. I hope I have convinced your Lordships that this question is a very vital one; that it not only affects the intellectual progress and education of the nation, but that it affects the national health in the present, and possibly that of generations yet unborn. We are told that it is not the best way of obtaining our public servants, and there is no other country in Europe except France in which this system prevails. I hope, therefore, that Her Majesty's Government will take this matter into their serious consideration, not necessarily from anything that I have said, but on account of the interest which is taken in the question at the present time by the public as manifested by the opinions to which I have referred. From what I have been told, I believe that the granting of this Commission is not impossible, and that it is not viewed at all with disfavour by the head of Her Majesty's Government. It is in that hope and in that belief that I have brought the matter forward, not speaking for myself, but for those who have desired that I should bring the subject under your Lordships' consideration. I have, in conclusion, to apologise for taking up so much of your Lordships' time.

Moved,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty praying Her Majesty to be graciously pleased to appoint a Royal Commission to inquire into and report upon the whole subject of official appointments by examination, and to collect information bearing on the matter from other countries."—(The Lord Wemyss, E. Wemyss.)

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE: My Lords, as an old examiner, and not in my episcopal capacity, I should like to say a few words upon this subject. Looking round upon your Lordships' House I can see the face of certainly one noble Lord whom it was my privilege and duty in old times to examine. I daresay there may be others present, for I have examined a good many. With regard to the articles in the Nineteenth Century, to which the noble Earl has referred, I may say that I am not one of those who signed the protest. I was desirous of doing so, but felt myself unable to sign it as I thought it went too far. But I contributed one of the articles which have been referred to, and if I rightly remember it was the last word in the discussion upon the subject. Although unable to sign the protest, I do not rise for the purpose of opposing the Motion of the noble Earl. With the general purpose of that Motion I entirely agree; but, as the noble Earl did not speak as an expert on the subject of examinations, I think it desirable to point out the distinction between examinations as a mode of entrance to the Public Service and of testing capacity for well-paid work, and the use of examinations as a distinct part of education. I maintain, and I think any one with University experience will support me in saying, that examinations are a necessary part of a regular education. With regard to the subject to which I especially devoted my own attention at Cambridge—mathematics—examination was the very backbone of the educational system. It is the best way of first getting knowledge into a man, and then getting it out of him ; seeing whether he is competent to reproduce that knowledge which has been put into him. As to the notion of a man being merely crammed for a time and then having, upon the strength of his memory, to produce a certain amount of knowledge, that is a mere caricature of that which is the real system of teaching and of which examination is the test. A certain amount of knowledge is put into a man, and it is only by examination that you can find out whether he is competent to reproduce the knowledge which has been imparted to him. Examination is the test that a man has understood what he has learnt, and that he is able to reproduce it in a clear and suitable way. But beyond that, I venture to say that it is not the mere reproduction of knowledge that is first put into a man that is required, but both with regard to classics and mathematics the most important portions of them are just those things which a man has to evolve out of his intellect, and which he cannot possibly get from any books beforehand. In the case of classical examinations, every one knows that certainly at Cambridge the chief stress is laid on original composition—it may be verses, or it may be Latin prose or translation ; but it is perfectly impossible, from the nature of things, that that could ever have been crammed into a man. With regard to mathematics, the great object of the examiners is so to frame their questions in reference to book work as that they shall test a man's thorough knowledge of what he has been doing, and make it impossible for him by mere cram to rise to any high place in the tripos. Examination and cram are often taken as if they were correlative terms ; but the great effort of Cambridge examination was, as far as possible, to dissociate those two things. Anything at all in the nature of cram was at once marked in black by the examiners, and every effort was made to throw cram into the background and to give the marks and the honours to those who showed that they had not been crammed, but that they understood what they had learnt, and who showed by the manner in which they worked their problems that they knew what they had been doing. There seems to be a great tendency, because examination seems to have partially failed with regard to certain applications of it, to bar examination altogether. I entirely approve of what has been said by the noble Lord—I believe it was a quotation from Professor Huxley—that examination is a good servant but a bad master. I have no doubt that is so ; but while we disclaim it as a master, let us make it our servant. Let us make it the handmaid of education and the test of knowledge, but let us suppress as strongly as possible the notion of any real connection between examination and cram. The noble Lord has wisely confined himself to one particular portion of the subject ; he has not asked for a Royal Commission to inquire into the question of examinations in general. It seems to me that the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, consisting of men who are experts in this matter, and who are most laboriously and conscientiously devoting themselves to the question how examinations can best be managed and how they can be made best to answer their purposes, might well be let alone. I think they understand their business better than any Royal Commission can teach it to them, and it is much better to allow them to work out their own problem in their own way. With regard, however, to official appointments by examination, that seems to me to be a subject which deserves to be looked into. If one may believe all that one hears about the results of these examinations, I think there is a great deal which may be very properly inquired into ; and, therefore, while I speak strongly of the benefit of examination and the possibility of entirely dissociating it from cram, I am entirely with the noble Lord in the Motion he has made.

*THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Viscount CRANBROOK): My Lords, the noble Lord who has addressed you with so much ability on this subject has in his speech combined a number of subjects which hardly seem to be appropriate to the object of the particular Motion itself. My noble Friend appears to have had a limited experience of examinations, and his experience was a very pleasant one I should imagine, for a young man going up at Oxford simply to be asked about his father's health could not be very trying. I am sure, however, that you could hardly put that forward as a system which could either be preserved in Universities or which, if preserved, would conduce to the advantage of the Universities generally. With reference to the three very distinguished men whose views he has put forward, Mr. Knowles, Mr. Auberon Herbert, and Mr. Frederick Harrison, I think, without any disrespect to them, I may say they are not without what some people call crotchets, or, at all events, hobbies, which they ride with some violence. With regard to the passages which have been quoted by my noble Friend, I regret to say that I am not so extensively read as himself nor have I refreshed my memory as to those passages, but I certainly do remember that there was a long controversy in the Nineteenth Century with regard to this subject of examinations. The right rev. Prelate who has addressed your Lordships' House has, I think, shown you that examinations for prizes, scholarships, and degrees, are absolutely requisite, or else the Universities would become of little or no advantage. Everything that has gone on in this country recently has been in the direction of stimulating education by offering open scholarships, and making prizes more open than they formerly were, so as to bring forward those of special ability for whom the Colleges have almost contested. I am far from saying, nor do I think it necessary to the argument to say, that the number of examinations at the Universities do not strike one with surprise, remembering what formerly took place, and comparing them with the period at which one was studying at a University one's self. At that time there was the "Little-go" or responsions, and there were no doubt what were called College Examinations at the end of the term but no examinations for degrees either when going in for pass or for moderations and then final honours. I think my noble Friend was speaking not of the official examinations to which his Motion is directed, but rather of the examinations within the Universities themselves, which are continually going on. In fact, whenever I have been at Oxford I have found that the new schools in High Street there are pretty well occupied by those who are being examined for something or other in that place, which was certainly not the case before. We are apt to forget the state of things which existed formerly when Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. Trevelyan began their movement, though that was not done by themselves alone, one being a private secretary, the other being employed as everybody knows, in an official capacity. At that time to which my noble Friend has referred, it was not thought that the system in existence was a good one, and I cannot imagine that it was only with the view of getting rid of the responsibility of nomination that Ministers consented to the change which then took place. I do not say that it does not interest myself as a Minister to be free from nominations, which was the system formerly, and I think that many must have the same feeling. The selection of individuals is a very invidious task, particularly for offices, which should be open to all. It seems a hard thing that when five or six boys at a school, all equally capable, all equally educated, and all equally brought up as gentlemen, you should exclude five of them from particular offices because the sixth has influential connections. It seems a hard thing that five of such boys must be excluded from the competition and from the chance of obtaining a particular appointment because they had no connection with the Minister, and no connection with anybody who could give the appointment. This system of open competition, therefore, is not a thing which has come about suddenly, but it has grown. In the first place, there were test examinations, and eventually competition followed, and I think the effect of those examinations, judging from the results, has not been so bad as my noble Friend supposed, for one office after another has come voluntarily under this system, and many offices which are not under the Orders in Council still call upon the Civil Service Commissioners to undertake the examination of their clerks with a view to obtaining efficient Civil servants. Therefore, I say, that this system of open competition has sprung up gradually of itself. In a few moments I will show what Parliament has done, rather differing from the view of my noble Friend, though I quite admit that this question has exercised men's minds very much, and that eminent men have taken different views on the subject. My noble Friend went on to speak of the Scotch Code, and gave all the credit for it to my noble Friend the Secretary for Scotland, and he is entitled to a great deal, but, at the same time, I would point out that we in England have taken the same course, and that I am as responsible for what has been done in Scotland as my noble Friend (Lord Lothian). I do not quite see, however, the bearing of this upon the question before us. I go back to that, and if I thought that this system were destructive of all real education, as my noble Friend says, I should be the last to resist his Motion. I do not say that it may not require great modifications, and indeed constant modifications have been going on. The Departments have been in constant communication with the Civil Service Commissioners not only with the view to render the examinations such as will secure candidates fitted for their particular Departments, but will also ensure that the knowledge possessed is not the result of a system of cram. In fact, the first object put forward was to insist upon a thorough education. The main object of the entrance examination, it is to be borne in mind, is to secure the selections of youths which have had a thoroughly well-grounded liberal education as English gentlemen; and what I want to contend for is that the Civil Service Commissioners secure that end while they do not exclude youths possessing the ordinary education which gentlemen get. For you will find it is a remarkable fact that in a great number of cases in which Universities and schools send up their candidates, they are largely successful, not in consequence of having gone upon a system of cram, but from having adopted a system of what is called a liberal education fitted for gentlemen both at school and in College. I quite agree that the object ought to be that those which have been reading specially for those examinations, should not be taken out of the ordinary course of education which will qualify them for any other position; and the system which the Civil Service Commissioners adopt is, I think, well qualified to attain that end. For instance, in the lower branches of the Civil Service Examinations to which candidates are admitted no one can say that the examinations are of such a character as to induce an education different from that which would qualify a man for any ordinary position as a merchant or shopkeeper or anything else in London or any of our cities. But with regard to the higher class examinations, if my noble friend had looked into the subjects which are examined upon, and the care with which they are selected, I think he would have seen that there was nothing which would tend to encourage cram, but that it was intended and everything was done to encourage the acquirement of a liberal education at universities and schools. There have always been at the universities and outside men with special qualifications, who are able, as it were, to whip up their pupils for examination for good degrees or for positions which they desire to attain. There is no doubt that there are unendowed persons who have adopted their own course in these matters, and have shown themselves specially qualified in that way, but those persons are not the examiners, and therefore no suspicion of favouritism can be attributed to them in regard to those whom they coach, who undergo the same examination, and whose only advantage is that they have received the help and stimulus of the unendowed tutors. I do not think the object of my friend is to interfere with the system of education, and I do not understand him to say that these examinations for special purposes do interfere more with the system of education than the examinations for prizes and certificates, which he seemed to think so injuriously affect the minds and physique of those who are subjected to them. That point has been answered by the Right Rev. Prelate, and I think I need not further dwell upon it. But let me quote from the late Report of the Civil Service Commissioners for the purpose of showing what are their own views upon this question of liberal education. They say that for themselves they are fully sensible of the great responsibility which is imposed upon them, and that they will strive by constant vigilance so to administer the system as to encourage a liberal measure of instruction, in order to ensure that those candidates only shall succeed whose knowledge has been thoroughly and intelligently acquired. And when we consider who the Civil Service Commissioners are, we find among them Sir George Dasent and Mr. Courthope—one of the most distinguished literary men of the day and a man highly qualified for the post he occupies. I know more of him than of Sir G. Dasent, but everyone who knows Mr. Courthope knows that he is singularly qualified for the post he holds, and that he is the last man in the world to allow a system of real education to be eclipsed by a system of cram which should lead to the carrying away of prizes by those who had not received a thorough, true, and liberal education, as he says himself. Then my noble Friend speaks of health, and on that point I am a little surprised. I do not deny for a moment that the great competitive strain to which people are subjected in these days, not only in schools or in official examinations, but in the tremendous struggle for existence and for a competency which is going on in this country, has to some extent increased the prevalence of nervous disorders, and has had in that way an injurious effect upon people's brains. The only question is whether the undisturbed brain is so valuable an article that the risk of disturbing it should not be run for the purpose of arriving at higher qualifications. I do not find from my own experience that people's health and minds are to any large degree affected by these examinations in schools, colleges, and universities. In the Commissioners' Report there is given a summary for the first 30 years of the system. In the first 30 years they state that there were 123,000 entries for examination. My Lords, think of the trouble which Ministers have been saved. There were nominated 26,675, and entries for open competition 291,521. The reason I give the full figures is to show how many were affected in health. Even upon the strict medical examination made of candidates the number was only 2,363, or not 1 per cent. Therefore, your Lordships see that those who had prepared themselves for these examinations or competitions had not absolutely destroyed their health, and one knows that among such large numbers there must be youths who have inherited disorders. That seems to be the effect of these competitive examinations. You will find in the last Report of the Civil Service Commissioners a letter from Sir Andrew Clark with respect to the Indian competitions, for which he had been medical examiner, expressing the opinion that those who passed for the Indian Civil Service did not appear to suffer in their health, though I believe the Indian Civil Service examination is as severe as any. But though he does not find that they suffer in their health, he finds, curiously enough, that there is a particular form of disorder—rather disagreeable to talk of perhaps—albuminuria, which comes on at the critical moment of examination, arising apparently from nervous excitement, and to which those possessing highly nervous constitutions are liable. However, he finds that when the examinations are over that passes off in a few days, and does not materially affect the candidate afterwards. I think, my Lords, we may pass on with the subject as far as the official examinations are concerned. With regard to the general question of health, I would ask have we become a nation so puny and unhealthy that we have no longer either muscles or strength enough for such a strain, as would appear from the statement of my noble Friend? The complaint is generally the other way: the complaint is that we are becoming a nation of athletes, and there never was a time when athleticism was so prevalent as at present in our colleges and schools and among our youth. Those who have been the most celebrated at Cambridge and Oxford as athletes have taken the highest places and honours in the Oxford Classes and the Tripos at Cambridge. And so with regard to the Judges and those who have held high office in this country. My noble Friend says that neither we, as Ministers, nor the Judges are put to examination. The Judges have to go through a long trial; it is true they have not to go through the trial of an examination extending over several days, both oral and written, but they have to make their reputation as men of ability, as lawyers able to state facts and deal with them—certainly they have to show their competency in law. So, again, with regard to those who adorn the Bench on which my right rev. Friend sits, there is not one who rises without examination: they have had to show their qualifications before the period when they were elevated to the Bench. With regard to my own position I will say nothing—or I will only say this, that nothing would be less to my taste than to be put to an examination test by the Civil Service Commissioners. When I was at the Home Office I remember a very curious incident occurring in reference to this subject. I was called upon to appoint an Inspector of Mines, and I wrote to the great College at Newcastle to recommend somebody. They sent me back the name of a man who they said knew everything about mines, who was consulted upon all mining questions throughout the country as an authority, was thoroughly acquainted with everything connected with the ventilation of mines, and whom they said I might safely appoint. Well, I appointed him, and he went before the Civil Service Commissioners for examination. He was plucked because, as he said, he had totally forgotten all the things he knew when he was 22, but that at 42 his mind had been carried far beyond what he knew then, and he said it was unreasonable to call upon a man at his age, and after so long an experience to undergo a Civil Service examination. I agree, but that was at a very early period of this system; things are now conducted in a very different manner; but I know it happened in that particular case that after having appointed two men, both eminent engineers in the North, who were both plucked, the Commissioners at last passed a young man of the greatest distinction, but they again complained that he was not quite 25. I replied—"This will not do, if he is not 25 he is very near it." Then they said they would pass him, but that his pension would only reckon from his 25th year. He was then appointed, and I believe has been acting with great success ever since. I only mention that, my Lords, to show that with regard to examinations they should be adapted in some sense to the kind of men who are called upon to undergo them, and it no doubt requires a great deal of skill to conduct them properly. My noble Friend spoke with some disrespect, I think, of those who had gone to India. I have myself had a little experience with regard to Indian matters, and I never heard complaints made on that subject. On more than one occasion inquiries have been made by Government into the working of the competitive system, with the result of ascertaining that the system has produced men many of whom have acquired a reputation for administrative capacity of a high order. With regard to Indian Civil Servants, I can only say that they are men who are eminently qualified to perform the duties called for from them. I can quote from the Reports of the Director of Military Examinations to the same effect; and, in fact, the Civil Service examinations have been conducted with the view of getting the best men, because it has been found that we have no means of getting them in any other way. I do not wish to be in the least misunderstood in this matter. I can quite understand the arguments of my noble Friend and his supporters with regard to avoiding the responsibility of nomination, but he is mistaken if he supposes that character is not now tested. The subject of character is closely inquired into by the Civil Service Commissioners, and there were over 2,000 rejected on that ground, and not allowed to go in for the examinations, as appears in their Report to which I have adverted. That shows that there is supervision exercised with regard to character. My Lords, after all this, what have we to do with a Royal Commission? I cannot myself understand the arguments for a new inquiry of that kind. There is a perpetual inquiry going on. What good purpose would be served by appointing another Commission? There are no facts with regard to what is done in foreign countries, which cannot readily be procured by the Foreign Office, as to this subject and all matters connected with it. The Army examination of the Belgians is referred to in the Appendix to the last Report of the Civil Service Commission, and anything else of that sort can be readily procured. Have there been no inquiries upon the subject? Has not this subject been inquired into again and again? In 1853 there was Sir Stafford Northcote's Commission; then in 1855 there was an Order in Council which began the system; and in 1856 there was a Resolution of the House of Commons in favour of it. Then in 1859 there was the superannuation measure, that no one who had not a certificate should receive a pension. In 1860 there was a Select Committee of the House of Commons appointed upon these subjects. Then there was another Order in Council in 1870 upon which practically they are now acting. Since that time there has been the Playfair Commission, and now there is the Ridley Commission, which has to consider this question incidentally, and which has found, in fact, that a great many of the pupils are too good for the post for which they go up to be examined; and that really you have put razors to cut blocks. The standard may be altered in order to answer the objection that many of the Lower Division clerks have really higher qualifications than men in the Higher Division. Now, after all these things, what is it my noble Friend wants? He wants a Commission on which we must put, I suppose, representatives of different opinions, who will not report unanimously. Suppose we put on a Commission Mr. Frederick Harrison on the one side, and some person who takes a totally different view on the other, what would be the result? You would have simply no Report whatever, or an imperfect Report, and we should be just where we are. My Lords, I am convinced of this: that with an Executive deeply interested in having the offices well filled, and interested in exercising the vigilant superintendence which it exercises now, I fail to see the need of any inquiry such as is suggested by the noble Earl; and it is a remarkable thing, when you consider how every subject is brought before Parliament, that nothing has been brought forward against the system as one bringing into office persons who are unfitted for their duties. No attack has been made upon the system on the ground of the unfairness in the examinations, or of injustice done to individuals.

Of course, there will always be among great numbers of persons black sheep. Though the majority are white sheep there will always be some black ones, whether the system adopted be nomination or competition. I believe, in the absence of any such charges against the present system, that a new Royal Commission would throw no greater light on the subject. Let us inquire, if you please, into the subject of education, and how we can give a better stimulus to it in regard to those who are to fill official positions. If, on the other hand, there be anything in the system which conduces to ill-health, let us have statistics on the subject, and not act upon suggestions such as that put forward by my noble Friend, whose medical acquaintance got out of his brougham to tell him the interesting fact which he narrated. It did not seem to be of much importance upon this point, because the particular effect to which he had just been referring was the effect upon girls, and therefore a girl was more likely to be subject than a boy to the effects of the system which he so much deploras. My Lords, I believe that without any further Commission you have already full means of arriving at a just conclusion on this subject; and therefore, with great respect to my noble Friend, I must answer that I cannot accede to his request for a Commission.

LORD TEYNHAM: My Lords, I think you will allow that my noble Friend made an exceedingly good point when he referred to the athletic part of the argument of the noble Earl. I wish the noble Viscount had been as successful, as he certainly was eloquent, in attempting to deal with the numerous other points which were put by the noble Earl. It would be a most satisfactory thing to the public could this matter be dealt with successfully once for all, and as I think every great question ought to be dealt with, by an able Minister like the noble Viscount, competent to lead public opinion, and to give to public opinion that guidance which the people of this country expect to receive, not only upon this, but every other important question. My Lords, it is very curious, indeed, to see how many inconsistent opinions there are among eminent men, themselves connected with the work of education, upon this subject. I was very glad to hear from the noble Earl that Dr. Warre had given his views against the present abuse of examinations. The last time I looked at an Eton list, and that is not very long ago, I found that the Rev. Dr. was not only examining in the old-fashioned manner, but was actually examining every boy for every division he had to enter, and if he did not pass affixed the sign of a minus quantity against his name. I hope that has been abolished, and that the opinion of the Rev. Dr. has been changed. Then there is the question of Public Schools. I am acquainted with one which is, perhaps, rather more a proprietary school which is greatly patronised by the upper Middle Class, and I know what happens to the boys who are at a too early age over-educated in that school. They are sent up to the Universities, there to obtain scholarships, and they obtain nothing else because they are worked out; and I am not at all sure that that is not an advantage to them considering the present condition of the Universities. I am not speaking of what they were formerly, but of what they are now, even when the positions of distinction in them have been so very highly filled. My Lords, what are they? Instead of the old educating subjects—the classics and mathematics—we have all kinds of “ologies.” Your Lordships know the term which is applied to these other subjects. They are subjects which are harmless enough; but if they do not precisely educate, they are not of any distinct advantage to the persons who are examined. Subjects like Political Economy and Modern History, with which the Universities have nothing to do, are substituted for real educational work. As for the origin of this system which the noble Lord pointed out, I am not at all surprised to find that Sir Stafford Northcote was in favour of this kind of examination, because it is within my knowledge that Sir Stafford Northcote, in order, I suppose, to assist himself in his Parliamentary work, went to a celebrated Professor of Mnemonics and studied under him, and probably he thought as he had derived benefit from that kind of instruction it would be of advantage for examinees and would assist them in the same manner. Now, the next point is one to which I desire particularly to call your Lordships' attention. The noble Earl, quoting Lord Thring, said that he contended that school examinations were absolutely necessary, simply because a large majority of the boys would not work unless they had a stimulus before them or a stimulus behind. My Lords, I question that, and I think they might be made to work. It might be made a necessity of their school time that they should work—it was so in the time of our grandfathers. The man who I consider injured and ruined more than any other the education of England was the late Dr. Valpy of Reading School. He took it into his head—it was one of the follies of the wise—that grammars ought to be written not in a learned language, but in English. Before his time the old Eton grammar was written in Latin, and not only so, but Latin was the language spoken in every school where a gentleman was educated. A boy never addressed his master except in Latin, nor would any boy even address his schoolfellows except in Latin, and the consequence was that in those days a Lower Fifth Form boy would have a more competent knowledge of that most difficult art, Latin Prose Composition, than anyone now, except perhaps Archdeacon Denison. As to the right rev. Prelate saying that the Universities know their own business best, and do not want to be guided by a Royal Commission, I happen to have seen the actual marks which were given by four examiners to a very eminent man with whom I am acquainted, in giving him a First Class in Classics, and they differed so widely and absurdly in the marks which they gave for exactly the same work that it shook my faith in University examiners, and it shakes my faith now when the right rev. Prelate tells us that the Universities know their own business best.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I do not wish to prolong this discussion further than to express my very great relief at hearing the speech made by my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, for I understood the noble Earl to say that he brought forward this motion with the support of Her Majesty's Government. It is a subject in which I have always taken a great interest. My noble Friend began by an allusion to a cook, but I can assure him that no cook of mine ever presented to me an ox in the shape of a pill; though with great culinary skill he has himself presented to us all the arguments which we have heard during the last 25 years against the admission of Civil servants to appointments by competitive examination. At the end of his long speech he stated his justification in bringing this subject before us was that he had the support of the head of Her Majesty's Government, and I own I trembled when the noble Viscount rose to address your Lordships, because I feared that we might be going back to a system which cannot be restored in place of a system which has answered very well indeed. It has always seemed to me that in order to have a Royal Commission the first thing is to show a necessity for it, and it is for my noble Friend to show that in this case there has been a deterioration in the personnel of Civil servants either in this country or in India. Some proof that that has been the result of the present system ought to have been given, and I believe there is no proof whatever of the sort. The noble Earl has not suggested more than others have done who have attacked this system, though giving us, in a more tangible way, the desires which have been expressed for modification of details. The question is, what is the most certain mode of enabling us to secure the best men, whether by selection, by a competitive examination, or by leaving it entirely in the hands of Departments to fill up vacancies as they arise? The noble Lord made a comparison between Bishops, Judges, and statesmen. I think he might have said a little more about statesmen, for they have a great tussle to go through before they become Cabinet Ministers—a very great tussle indeed. I remember a joke of Lord Palmerston, who was once asked whether a man was fit for an office to which he had been appointed, and he replied, "I have generally found that when a fellow has been clever enough to get a political office he is clever enough to perform the duties of it." There is no doubt that political men have a much better and safer test than any mere literary examination could possibly put them through. Judges and Bishops are appointed, it is true, by selection, but in the case of such appointments the great responsibility rests upon the Prime Minister, or the head of a Department who makes the appointments; and if he makes a bad appointment, he is perfectly sure to hear of it directly through the organs of public opinion; the appointment is criticised, and he has at once to accept the responsibility. Now, what is the position of the political head of a great Department? Has he time himself to really examine into all the qualifications of the numbers of young men of 18 or 19 who are desirous of filling the office? I venture to say that he has not, and if he makes a mistake in making the appointment he has to admit the responsibility, though it may not be brought against him for eight or ten years afterwards. I believe there is no possibility of the head of a Department himself selecting young men, and the result must be, for human nature continues the same, that if you give the power to heads of Departments to make appointments to offices, the power will be exercised almost always at the dictates of political Whips in the House of Commons, or at the request of Peers who discharge similar duties in your Lordships' House; or at the suggestion of political friends. I have no doubt that we should all like to have an easier opportunity of providing for sons who are not quite so intelligent as we should wish them to be, and that may account, perhaps, for some of the attacks which have been made upon the system of competitive examinations. What the right rev. Prelate has said is perfectly true with regard to distinguishing between real and forced education—we ought to make a distinction between cramming and real education. I do not think the word "cram" is a very admirable word. Students may be crammed in such a way as that they learn only the questions which they are likely to be asked, or they may not, and it depends entirely upon the character of these examinations whether they are successful or not in securing the best men. The noble Lord brought forward the instance of Sir Henry Taylor, who declared that he would never have been able to get into the Colonial Office if there had been a competitive examination at the beginning. I entirely agree with the noble Lord that I never knew a better permanent Civil servant than Sir Henry Taylor; but there are other authorities than Sir Henry Taylor, and I am justified, I think, in not taking his authority upon the subject of what he would or could not have done when he was a young man, because I am perfectly certain that if he had known that his admission into the Public Service depended upon his showing that he possessed a certain amount of education, he would have succeeded in satisfying the requirements of the tests. Another thing which your Lordships do not know, but which Lord Kimberley does, with regard to the question of clerks, is that Sir Henry Taylor was not quite so good an authority as will be supposed, for he was in such an exceptional position that he almost to the end of his life continued to do some of the most valuable work in the Colonial Office, but for 15 years of the time he never saw it, living 70 miles away as he did. My Lords, I really am glad that the noble Lord opposite has spoken on behalf of the Government as clearly as he has done, but I think if a case of deterioration had been made out, or if a case had been made out as to the destruction of health, it would have been a very difficult thing; but if no case of that kind does exist, I think it would be perfectly wrong of Her Majesty's Government to give encouragement to the notion that the valuable system now existing, though it may be open to improvement, is likely to be upset by the Report of a Royal Commission.

THE EARL OF DUNDONALD: My Lords, I should like to ask the noble Earl whether, in the event of his succeeding in his Motion, he would include the entrance and other examinations to the Army within the scope of it. I think your Lordships will agree that in no branch of the Public Service is it so necessary to have men of initiative and readiness of resource as in the Army. By the present system of examination, the memory of a candidate is made the most important factor, and we know that many men of small memory, but of great readiness of resource, would under the present system be prevented from entering Her Majesty's Service. I am sure most of your Lordships must have among your acquaintances many men who have failed in passing the preliminary examinations for the Army, but who are, above all, the most fitted to lead troops in action. I do not wish to make a speech on the subject. I came here not knowing that it was to be brought forward, but I desire to call attention to the examinations in regard to men who are entering the Services. The noble Viscount made some remark to the effect that he was not aware that these examinations have a bad effect on men's health, but I know men personally who have told me they have been made ill by having to undergo the examinations. I trust, therefore, that the noble Earl will, if he succeed in his Motion, include the Army examinations in the scope of it. In my own branch of the Service, the Cavalry, there were in former days four or five men deep waiting for commissions, but at the present time, or at all events a short time ago, there was hardly a Cavalry Regiment in the Service which was not short of officers, while hundreds of men who would make most excellent Cavalry officers, second to none in the world, are idle and doing nothing. The object of an examination for the Public Service is to get the very best men possible to serve the country, and even if it be difficult to fill vacancies it is impossible to be too particular as to the men who present themselves and who are passed. In the Army now, according to a recent regulation, reports are made upon subalterns after, I think, three years' service, by the senior officers. I am afraid that any report of that kind will be more or less a dead-letter, because when a subaltern joins a regiment he may, as regards acquirements, stand as fair; he may pass, and may be quite good enough to go on at first; and it is a very difficult position to put senior officers in who are perhaps friends of the young man, who may be quite passable in every way, to say that they shall block him out from the Service. I believe that, as regards the Army, the effect of this provision, under which you can in that way get rid of an officer after three years' service, will be that you will only get rid of the most glaring instances of incompetency. My Lords, I will conclude by again hoping that the noble Lord will proceed with his Motion, and that he will include the Army in it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, before the noble Earl answers, I would like to say a few words. I do not wish to enter into the general discussion, but only to touch upon the subject as far as it bears upon the Indian Civil Service, and to say that I confirm entirely as far as my own experience goes, and it has been considerable, what was said by the noble Viscount, as to the result of the present system in that Service. At the time I had the honour of holding the office of Secretary of State for India, I made repeated enquiries to ascertain whether the complaints sometimes made in the public prints with regard to the results of competitive examinations were well-founded or not, and I and my colleagues convinced ourselves from the reports we received from the various departments, that there was no reason to be dissatisfied with the results of the system of appointing Indian Civil servants by competitive examination. There were of course some failures, as there must always be under any system. Failures had occurred in the case of Civil servants who had shown want of judgment and even common sense, but under no system could that be avoided. You may test a man's intellectual capacity, but you cannot by any means you can devise test his judgment or common sense; his Examiners cannot be certain that he possesses either, and that is therefore an inherent difficulty in any system you may introduce. But I am quite sure there is no reason to be dissatisfied with the results of the system as regards India, and I am glad the noble Viscount quoted from the report upon that service, which gives a perfectly favourable opinion upon those results. I will also add that for many years there have been discussions upon the question, not whether there ought to be competitive examinations, but as to age and other qualifications. Different views have been taken on the subject, and it has been thought that the system might be improved upon. My own opinion is that the changes proposed, particularly with regard to age, were shown to be on the whole not desirable, and I am extremely glad to find that the Secretary of State for India has found it better to go back to the old system. I think it was better to give a trial to the new conditions; but as they were found not to work as well as the old conditions, I am very glad the noble Viscount has found himself able to put those conditions again in force.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, I am glad to hear the expression of opinion which the noble Earl has just given. I can assure him the matter received very careful consideration before any alteration was made. I thought it only right that a fair and full trial should be given to the younger limit of age fixed upon some time ago when my noble Friend was Secretary of State; but the evidence which was produced before the Commission which sat in India, and the Report of the Commissioners themselves, coupled with the strong recommendation I had from the Viceroy, convinced me—having gone thoroughly into the subject upon the Reports which I received from every quarter—that it was wise to increase the limit of age for examination from 19 to 23. I am in hopes that we shall be able to secure the advantage which the Universities have given with regard to the training of young men after they have obtained their degree. Nothing could be better than the behaviour of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge in the matter, and I think the thanks of the country are due to them for the good they have done to the Indian Civil Service. I take this opportunity of publicly thanking them for the manner in which they have received the change of age, and no doubt still hope to render advantages to the Service. I think now that the limit of age has been altered, it is right for me to say that we never got the actual cream of the public school boys because they were taken away to go to the crammers. I hope we shall be able to get them now before they fix definitely their aim in life, and that either before they obtain their degree or afterwards they will find such an opening in the Indian Civil Service as will induce them to come forward for the purpose of filling the appointments, because to my mind there is no higher profession that a man can take up than that of the Indian Civil Service.

THE EARL OF MORLEY: My Lords, I should like to say with regard to what has fallen from my noble and gallant Friend with reference to the Army, that I had myself for some years the honour of being connected with the Army; and though of course I have not the direct knowledge which he as an officer can claim, still I had very ample opportunities of knowing what officers were some years ago. I think it will be admitted by everyone that officers of the present day are in knowledge and ability very superior to what they were 20 years ago. I do not attribute that entirely to the system of examination, but I think the system of examination has done much to improve the education of officers. When the noble Lord says that the examinations depend on memory and on memory alone, I entirely differ from him. The preliminary examination to which he refers is a very easy one, and one which an intelligent lad ought to pass without much difficulty. Then when you talk of physique, I venture to think that the officers of the present time are not inferior in physique to the officers of the British Army during any period of its existence. The noble Lord spoke of the necessity of obtaining men possessing powers of initiation, but how in the world are you to discover whether there exists the initiative power (the importance of which I entirely admit) in a lad of 18 or 19, whatever test you apply? It is impossible to test those powers except by experience. I am not in the least a fanatic for examinations, and I do not see why the system of examinations cannot be improved. I do not deny, as the noble Lord on the Cross Benches said, that your system might exclude some excellent men and some fools, but I would ask under what system can you avoid this? The great point is to admit as few useless men as possible and to get as high an average as you can. I believe that under the present system of examination you exclude those who are absolutely ignorant, and you do not run the risk of excluding more men than under any system which has yet been devised. One's sympathies are often excited at seeing a fine young fellow who has failed to get into the Army, but we must remember that many fine young men who are now officers in the Army would have failed to get in under the old system, and have had the door opened to them under this system of examinations. I do feel very strongly that before we are called upon to abolish or revise this system, which has not been unsuccessful up to the present time, we should ascertain what system is likely to be successful.

*EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I had not intended to trouble you for a moment on this subject, because I understood that the Debate was to have turned entirely on the value of examinations before official appointments are made. My noble Friend the Chairman of Committees has avoided that subject altogether and has dwelt exclusively on the Army Examinations. It may be in the recollection of some of your Lordships that I have ventured to contend that the tests for the Army are incomplete—not that intellectual and educational tests ought not to be applied to the Army or that their application has not been of great value, but the physical strength and proficiency in martial and athletic exercises, though not ignored for what has been called the scientific branches of the Army, the Engineers and the Artillery, are entirely ignored in the rest. Nothing but a pass examination takes place by a medical man with regard to the appointment of officers for the Cavalry and Infantry. An officer of Engineers may, as has occurred in some instances, for years together never have occasion to cross a horse; a cavalry officer, ex hypothesi, is obliged to do so; and yet, in the Woolwich Examination, proficiency and excellence in riding counts for a certain number of marks, but is utterly ignored in examinations for the Cavalry or for the Infantry. Surely, while good health is desirable in fulfilling all duties in life, and in occupying any official position, yet good bodily strength is of most essential value in the case of officers in the Army. I remember an ex-Cabinet Minister once saying to me that an examination which attached any value to riding would give an unfair advantage to men who had had the opportunity over the sons of poor parents. I said:—

“I did not know before that you wished to have a handicap competition for the honour of serving Her Majesty in the Army, that the object was not to get the best possible candidate but to get the best possible race.”

My view, on the other hand, is that if Her Majesty can get an officer who is qualified to ride, so much the better. The better article Her Majesty can obtain at a given price and on given terms, it seems to me the greater the advantage for the country. I must not detain your Lordships longer upon a question which has collaterally arisen in the course of this debate. I can only say with regard to the question which has been raised by my noble Friend, that I have a very lively recollection of the pressure that came from constituents nearly half a century ago in these matters; and one of the Whips long ago confided to me that as a rule Members for small constituencies got a greater number of appointments for their constituents than Members for large constituencies; and for this reason, that it made comparatively little difference in an election in a large constituency to the chances of a candidate's election whether he obtained a particular nomination for some particular friend and supporter or not, whereas in a small constituency it might make the whole difference. A man with two or three brothers and cousins in a small constituency in the old days might decide the election one way or the other, and therefore not only had you a preponderance of nominations in favour of the relatives of the least independent and least high-minded, as a rule, of the constituents, but you had a preponderance of this kind of nomination from the most corrupt and smallest constituencies of the country. Whatever faults may be found with the present system, looking back in my own remembrance—and I had some facilities at one time in my life for seeing how patronage was bestowed—I cannot doubt that the testing of candidates by examination is in its results greatly superior to the old system of nomination. As a noble Lord has very truly observed, the nomination of an incompetent young man is not likely to effect prejudicially at once the efficiency of a public office, but as years pass by, after the patron has gone into Opposition, or has been placed in some other office, or has died, by the process of seniority the inefficient young man rises to a position of some importance and weight in his office, and the office suffers accordingly, but no one remembers after the lapse of so many years who was the Minister originally responsible for the appointment. So that in using his personal influence a Minister used not to be immediately concerned with regard to the fitness or eligibility of the candidate. Nothing is perfect in this world, and I have no doubt that the system of appointment of candidates may be susceptible of further improvement. I am quite satisfied that it is susceptible of a great deal of improvement in the case of candidates for the Army, but I cannot as regards the Civil appointments altogether support the views of my noble Friend.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I have only one word to say, and it is hardly in reply, but rather in explanation. The noble Lord who spoke from the Back Benches asked whether I would enlarge the scope of the motion so as to take in examinations as regards the Army. I shall be perfectly ready to do that if it will make the Motion more acceptable to the noble Lord the President of the Council. Would it?

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: No.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My object is to get this Motion carried, which I believe would greatly benefit the prospects of education in this country, but I suppose, from the reply of the noble Viscount, that that enlargement of the Motion would not make it more acceptable to him. I am bound to say it was with some astonishment that I heard the speech of my noble Friend. That speech was quite the speech of a person in an official position, for he based his answers on the opinions of those under him in the Office.

VISCOUNT CRANBROOK: I beg the noble Lord's pardon; the Civil Service Commissioners have nothing whatever to do with me; they are not under me—they are under the Treasury.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: I thought there was a connection between the Civil Service Commissioners and the Education Department, but apparently there is none. What the public desire to know is whether these official Reports are as absolutely trustworthy as they might be supposed to be as regards the carrying on the affairs of the country. My noble Friend has absolutely ignored the mass of evidence which he knew, or ought to have known, is being got together in the shape of letters from all sorts and conditions of men, peers, heads of colleges, and some of the men best known to science in this country, who all say that the time has come for an inquiry into the matter. I say I am surprised, because I am inclined to believe that if the head of Her Majesty's Government had not been a victim to the prevailing epidemic and had been in the House to-night, we should not have had the speech we have heard from the Treasury Bench. I had hoped the Prime Minister would have been here, and I had reason to believe from what I have been told by those whom I represent in your Lordships' House to-night that he would have acceded to the appointment of this Committee. So that I may say that I am among those who have suffered from the prevailing epidemic. The Chairman of Committees argued as if there was no alternative between the present system and a return to the old system of jobbery and unfairness; but it is in the belief than there is an alternative, and in the hope of putting it forward, that we are moving in this matter. Certainly my object was to show that those who are in favour of this inquiry want a Royal Commission in order to see whether the complaints against the present system are well founded or not, and to see whether you cannot find some middle course which shall be less disadvantageous to the country. That is my answer to the Chairman of Committees. The noble Lord has referred to what has been done in Holland. The whole of the Civil Service is provided for in this way—not by examination, but by the nomination of heads of Department, and then the candidates have to pass an examination. I can only express my disappointment that Her Majesty's Government have thought it right, through my noble Friend the Lord President of the Council, to decline to grant this Commission, but I hope they will see fit to alter their decision.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Does the noble Lord persist in his Motion?

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: No; I shall not press my Motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

DOCK ACCOMMODATION AT GIBRALTAR.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: My Lords, I wish to repeat a question which has now been before us for three Sessions. Three Sessions ago I asked my noble Friend representing the Admiralty whether they hoped to construct a dock at Gibraltar.

The Earl of Wemyss

Some notice was given to my request, but I was told that the Admiralty had not made up their minds upon the subject. Since then, as I understand, a member of the Board has been out to Gibraltar, and in company with scientific engineers has examined the various sites. The Report appears to have been favourable, and we are again told that the Admiralty are considering the question. My Lords, I am afraid the Government have been somewhat deterred by a speech which was made last year by my noble Friend Lord Carnarvon, whose opinion must carry great weight although it is a non-professional opinion. His objection to the dock was based on two grounds. He first stated that the anchorage at Gibraltar was very unsafe, and then he said, what was partially true no doubt, that wherever a dock might be constructed it would be exposed to hostile batteries from the Spanish shore. With regard to the first question, I would merely remark that if there is any one position in which a ship might be safer in harbour than another, it is when she is in dry dock; and if the question of the erection of batteries on the Spanish shore is supposed to be against the construction of a dock at Gibraltar, I can only say that the same objection applies to all docks, arsenals, and works to which we have gone on adding for a series of years. It is very doubtful, from whatever point hostilities might come, whether any batteries could be erected which could not be commanded by the Rock battery; or supposing there should be anything that could harm us, to which we could not speedily reply by armaments sent out from our own arsenals. If it is a question of working batteries it would be probably "para mañana" with the Spaniards (an expression implying delay in Spanish), and I think we could supply heavier guns from England than any hostile Power could place to command the Gibraltar dock. I hope the Government are considering this question, and the reason I bring it forward now is that it may be taken into consideration before the Estimates are passed, and not delayed for another year. I need not remind my noble Friend, who is a naval man himself, how important it is that some means of repairing our ironclads abroad, or in the Mediterranean, should be found in addition to Malta. I venture to point out again that there is at this moment a fleet worth £10,000,000 sterling in the Mediterranean, and that there is no provision made for repairs except at Malta. I think there are three or four large docks at Malta; but suppose you go to war, and any of our large ironclads are disabled, there is really nowhere else to repair those ships unless they are taken away from the Mediterranean to Plymouth, as our nearest dockyard. In the present state of dock accommodation in the East Indies, men-of-war have been actually taken from the East India Stations because they could not be repaired on the East India Stations (I may say that with regard to that I shall have a question to ask by-and-bye), and they have had to be repaired at Malta. If you go to war your ships will be subject to hostile attacks in the East and in the Mediterranean, and very likely on the coasts of Spain. Your docks would be crowded at Malta; you would not be in the position of Lord Collingwood after Trafalgar, when there was no enemy to oppose him, and he could send his ships home to be repaired; but you would have to send your ships home 2,000 or 3,000 miles to your nearest port—Plymouth, in the face of an enemy. I very much fear from what I hear that the Government are grudging the expense of £350,000 which would be necessary for the construction of a dock, and that they are offering some subvention to private companies in the matter. I venture to suggest that if that is so, it is a policy unworthy of this great country to hand over the safeguarding of the vast property which I have mentioned to the enterprise of some private company, and that they should undertake as the only step worthy of this great country to at once commence this dock and pay for it themselves; and that they should lose no time about it, for it is impossible that a dock could be constructed under two or three years, and if any hostile operations take place in the future it may not be constructed in time.

LORD BRASSEY: My Lords, before the noble Lord replies, there are two considerations which I should like to put in the briefest terms with regard to what has fallen from the noble Viscount. First, it is proposed that the dock at Gibraltar should be constructed as a convenience and facility to commerce. That part of the sea is crowded with our shipping, and I can only say, having been frequently at Gibraltar, that I never visited the place without seeing a number of steamers under repair there. It does seem unsatisfactory that in the contingency of war the Mercantile Marine should be entirely dependent for its coal supply afloat on the hulks in the Bay of Gibraltar, every one of which might be sunk by torpedoes on a dark night or in foggy weather. I think that is one very great argument for the construction of a dock.

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: My Lords, no one who has studied the subject, especially with the aid of a map, will be surprised at the interest which has been shown in it on several occasions by the noble Viscount when he has, from time to time, brought the matter before this House. This is not the second, or even the third, time that he has brought it forward. Naval Commanders-in-Chief in the Mediterranean have from time to time pointed out to the Admiralty the advantage we should derive from having a first-class dock at Gibraltar, and the Admiralty fully concur in the view which has been so generally pressed upon them on the subject. The Admiralty fully admit the absolute necessity in time of war of having at that station such a dock as would be capable of accommodating our largest ships. Hitherto there have been difficulties in the way into which I need not enter, but which your Lordships will readily understand. Even now, the Estimates having been framed for this year, it has been thought better that the works should be undertaken by private enterprise rather than by Her Majesty's Government. Various Bodies have approached the Admiralty with the view to undertaking the construction of the dock, and now we are only waiting for some further particulars before deciding upon the details of the matter. The Director of Works was recently out on the spot, and of the various sites suggested he selected one upon the new Mole Parade Ground, in close proximity to the dockyard. The new dock which it has been decided to construct is to be 520ft. long and 100ft. wide, and capable of taking a ship drawing 32ft. of water on the blocks. In the event of a ship being partially damaged, having one of her compartments full and not being on an even keel, we shall be able to dock a ship drawing 35ft. of water without the blocks, and at high tide as much as 37ft. of water. Our longest man-of-war is 410ft. in length, and the greatest draught of water of any of our ships is 28ft., so that we shall have ample space. Another matter which has been considered of the greatest importance is the extension of the Mole, and it has been thought desirable that the work should be undertaken simultaneously with the dock. It is proposed that it should be increased in length by 1,600ft., and it is thought that the excavations of rock to form the dock, which will be 80ft. in depth from the surface, will go a long way, if not completely, towards the formation of the new Mole extension. The advantage of the site chosen for the docks is that it will be protected by rising ground under the lee of which it will be placed from the fire of ships at sea. On that rising ground, there are ramparts already placed. A further advantage will be that the entrance will have the protection of the Mole. It will not interfere in any way with the very limited space which now exists inside the Mole for anchorage. Moreover, the cost of the works on this side will be less than on any other that has been proposed. I will take this opportunity of referring to a matter upon which a good deal has been said. The idea has got abroad that Her Majesty's Government propose to construct docks, or the protection for the docks, on ground belonging to Spain. No such idea has ever entered the heads of Her Majesty's Government. It is true that among the many schemes from time to time suggested to the Admiralty there was one for making a canal along the north side of the Rock, and that scheme proposed that the canal should be used for coaling and docking purposes; but though supported by Sir John Burgoine it was strongly condemned by Lord Napier and especially by Sir J. Adye, the late Governor of Gibraltar, on military grounds. So far as the Admiralty are concerned the scheme has never even been before them officially. The scheme, I can only say, has been condemned, and wherever the idea originated it has never been entertained for a moment by any Department of Her Majesty's Government.

*VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: Then I understand my noble Friend to say that the dock is to be constructed partly by private enterprise?

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: No; entirely.

*VISCOUNT SIDMOUTH: Will that fact occasion any delay?

*LORD ELPHINSTONE: We hope not; we hope to get the specifications in a very few days.

QUESTIONS.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS.

(3.10.) SIR JOHN LUBBOCK (University of London): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether an elementary school which takes English and geography as class subjects can present children for examination in history and elementary science as special subjects?

*THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): There is nothing to prevent to such a plan, as that indicated in the question, being carried out, provided that a graduated scheme of teaching History and Elementary Science, as specific subjects, be submitted to and approved by the Inspector.

THE NEW MAGAZINE RIFLE.

GENERAL SIR WILLIAM CROSSMAN (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he would state to the House who is the inventor of the new Magazine Rifle now being issued to the Army; what reward has he received, or is he to receive; is the invention patented; what is the nature of the cartridge and powder now used with this rifle; who is the inventor; what reward has he received, or is he to receive; and, is the invention patented?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln, Horn-castle): The Magazine Rifle is a composite weapon, portions of which are due to different inventors, and the same remark applies to the cartridge. Patent rights are claimed as regards some of the parts, and they will be fully and carefully investigated before the question of reward is decided. Up to this time no rewards have been paid.

IRELAND—CASE OF MR. J. E. O'MAHONY.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact that Mr. J. E. O'Mahony, editor of the Tipperary Nationalist, now undergoing a sentence of six weeks' imprisonment under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, has been removed to Tullamore Gaol from Clonmel Gaol, where he had been in consultation with his solicitors, Messrs. Burke and Crean, of Clonmel, regarding his defence in cases of libel brought against him by Colonel Caddell, R.M., and R. Power, bailiff, for publications in his paper; whether he is aware that Mr. O'Mahony's removal deprives him of the opportunity of holding necessary consultations with his solicitors; whether he will order Mr. O'Mahony's re-transference to Clonmel Gaol, so as to be near his solicitors; whether he is aware that, although Drs. Crean and Flynn certified that Mr. O'Mahony had been suffering immediately before his imprisonment from a severe attack of influenza, from which he had not fully recovered, he was placed on prison diet in Clonmel Gaol, and that Alderman Cantwell, Visiting Justice, protested against Mr. O'Mahony's treatment; what is Mr. O'Mahony's condition of health at present; and what steps have been taken to give effect to the recommendations of Drs. Crean and Flynn, that Mr. O'Mahony required “very careful treatment and a nourishing régime”?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I have also to ask the Chief Secretary, in reference to this case, whether the General Prisons Board have received any Report as to the condition and treatment of Mr. O'Mahony, editor of the Tipperary Nationalist, in Clonmel Gaol; if he has seen the statement made by Alderman Cantwell, a Visiting Justice, that he found Mr. O'Mahony in a “very weak condition,” and that Mr. O'Mahony, whilst suffering from a bad attack, was left on a plank bed and on prison diet, with nothing to drink but cold water, the result being “complete prostration and utter loss of appetite”; and if he will direct the Prisons Board to order an inquiry into the facts of this case? I also desire to know if it is true that Mr. O'Mahony, editor of the Tipperary Nationalist, has been removed from Clonmel Gaol to Tullamore Gaol; what is the reason for transfer; and what is the approximate cost of the removal?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, Sir; certainly not. When the work is commenced in earnest they will be removed.

LONDON SEWAGE.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, before any scheme for the disposal of London sewage is adopted, a Government Inquiry would be held, at which the inhabitants of South-East Essex would have the opportunity of expressing their views, and giving evidence?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I am informed that the London County Council have no definite scheme for the disposal of London sewage under their consideration; but they have instructed the Main Drainage Committee to secure the services of an eminent civil engineer to join the engineer of the Council in a thorough examination of the whole sewage system of the Metropolis. As no definite scheme is at present before the County Council I am not in a position to say what opportunity can be afforded to the inhabitants of South-East Essex of expressing their views and giving evidence.

MAJOR RASCH: If the London County Council have the disposal of the sewage and decide upon getting rid of it at Candy Island, will the Local Government Board be in a position to protect the inhabitants of Southend from a nuisance?

*MR. RITCHIE: It would not necessarily come before the Local Government Board. It is proposed, I believe, to make some alteration in the existing arrangements in reference to the London County Council finance, and if these proposals are assented to by Parliament the present position might be affected.

CARRIAGE OF RUSSIAN PETROLEUM.

SIR EDWARD REED (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he is aware that British ships trading to the Port of Batoum on the Black Sea, and engaged in the carriage of Russian petroleum to the markets of Europe, are subjected to considerable danger at that port owing to the very contracted limits of the deep water space within the port, and to the unequal depth of water alongside the loading quays; whether he is aware that the danger is increased by the publication of notices in the Russian Press which represent the depth of water in Batoum to be greater than it is; and whether any communication has been, or will be, made to the Russian Government upon this subject?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The attention of the Russian Government has been called by Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg to the difficulties owing to want of space in the harbour of Batoum. Important works have been undertaken there, and are, I believe, still being carried on. Hitherto there have been no loading quays available for foreign vessels to lie alongside, and all discharging of cargo has been done by barges. I believe that a quay will, however, shortly be completed. I have never heard of any notices having been published in the Russian Press concerning the depth of water in Russian harbours.

THE BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if it is to be understood that the British delegates at the Berlin Conference will be debarred from discussing the International limitation of the hours of labour (adult), while the representatives of Foreign Powers will be empowered to do so?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not admit any such understanding as the hon. Member supposes. I stated, in reply to the hon. Member for West Nottingham, the terms in which Her Majesty's Government replied to the preliminary proposal of the German Government. The detailed programme has now been received, and as soon as it has been considered by Her Majesty's Government the whole of the correspondence will be laid upon the Table.

WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS.

MR. HANBURY (Preston): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War whether it is yet the duty of any Government official, of the War Office or otherwise, to see that the Factory Clause, when inserted in War Office contracts, is duly observed; and whether the due observance of that clause, as one security against sweating, is also provided for by pecuniary penalties in all, or in what proportion of cases?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Factories where Army clothing is made are inspected from time to time to ascertain that the Factory Clause is observed, and in a recent instance a penalty was inflicted for its neglect. The insertion of the Factory Clause with penalty is insisted on where practicable, and in the majority of cases.

ARMY MEDICAL STORES.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary for War what is the reason for "the considerable difference in price between the supplies for Army and Navy Services" in the case of medical stores, as commented upon by the Auditor General; and why the Director of Contracts has decided not to adopt the system of competition which prevails in the Navy for similar stores, and to ignore the recommendation of the Auditor General "to take steps for ascertaining by public tender whether the supply of these stores for the use of the Army could not be more economically obtained?"

MR. BRODRICK: The question of obtaining medical stores for the Army by public competition has been very carefully considered, and as the paramount consideration is to obtain medicines of the best quality for the use of the troops the supply has been for some years intrusted to two firms of high standing. As the packing and distribution of the stores is undertaken by the contractors for the Army, which is not the case in the Navy, this must be taken into account in estimating the difference between the price paid by the Army and Navy respectively. My hon. Friend will therefore see that the question cannot be decided solely on the question of the price of the article, and further information will be afforded when the question comes before the Public Accounts Committee. If that Committee is not satisfied with the explanation, the matter will be reconsidered.

IRELAND—PROSECUTIONS UNDER THE STATUTE OF EDWARD III.

MR. WILLIAM CORBET (Wicklow, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he will give as a Return the revised edition of the Statute of 34 Edward III., c. 1, passed in the year 1360-61, for the appointment of Justices of the Peace, and defining their powers and jurisdiction?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I will make inquiry whether it would be in accordance with precedent; but I have no objection to give the Return asked for.

AFFRAY AT KILLALOE.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to a report in the Standard of the 26th instant, that on Sunday last, in Killaloe, County Clare,

"A patrol of police fell in with three men, and that, on their refusing to give their names and declining to be arrested, a constable discharged five shots from his revolver; that a policeman thereupon drew his sword and stabbed one of the persons in question;"

and if he will direct an inquiry into this occurrence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Constabulary Authorities report that the facts are not as stated in the newspaper report mentioned. Two policemen had under arrest a man who had given a false name and address when found upon licensed premises during prohibited hours. His two companions endeavoured to rescue him, and were with difficulty kept back by the second constable. The prisoner subsequently violently assaulted the other constable, knocking him down, and escaped. The constable pursued the prisoner, and, after calling upon him to stand, fired shots into the air to frighten him, but the prisoner got away, and was not re-arrested until the next day. No person was stabbed. The matter is being further looked into.

THE CORK UNION.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has seen the report of a public meeting held in Cork on the 24th instant, on the subject of outdoor relief, in the Cork Union, and which was presided over by the Mayor and attended by the High Sheriff and a large number of prominent citizens, and at which a resolution was passed condemning the practice of compelling old people to go into the workhouse as contrary to the practice which prevails in England; and whether, in view of the strong remonstrance of that meeting, the Local Government Board will direct the Vice Guardians at Cork to treat the question of outdoor relief on a more liberal basis?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that a meeting on the subject mentioned has been held. As, however, I have already stated, the grave abuse which existed in the administration of the outdoor relief rendered it imperative for the Guardians to take action to check it. The Local Government Board have no evidence before them nor reason to suppose that the Vice Guardians have proceeded in a harsh or illiberal manner.

In answer to a further question by Mr. FLYNN,

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said that the statistics he had referred to the other day showed an enormous increase in outdoor relief in the Cork Union between 1879 and 1889. He had not got the figures by him now.

MR. FLYNN: Has not the increase of outdoor relief been accompanied by a diminution of the general expenditure of the Union?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman get the Vice Guardians to consult with the late Board on the matter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no reason to believe that the Vice Guardians are either harsh or indifferent in their administration of the Poor Law.

MR. FLYNN: May I ask the Chief Secretary if he can state what is the cost to the Union per head (including establishment charges) of the pauper inmates of the Cork Workhouse; and what is the saving to the rates which the Vice Guardians hope to effect by forcing James Madden (recently afflicted with blindness), and his family, to enter the Cork Workhouse?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: From the last available accounts of the Cork Union the weekly cost of the maintenance and clothing of a pauper in the workhouse is about 3s. 2½d., and the proportion of the salaries of the staff about 10½d., making a total of about 4s. 0¾d. per week. As regards the case of James Madden, I have already explained that the Vice Guardians did not make the order for his admission into the workhouse with a view to effect a saving to the rates, but in order that he might be taken into the workhouse hospital, as, from information before them, they believed it would be to his advantage to remain in the hospital for some time to have his eye affection suitably treated. It does not appear that the reception of this man into the workhouse would have precluded his family from receiving outdoor relief if they were found to be destitute. It would have been the duty of the relieving officer to see to their condition.

MR. FLYNN: I must press the right hon. Gentleman to make further inquiry. I believe that the amount of outdoor relief comes to 4s. 0¾d. per head, which for a family of six is a little over £1 4s. per week. Is it not more economical in such a case to give outdoor relief than to require these people to enter the workhouse?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no wish to enter into a general discussion of the question of outdoor relief. It has been found wise, in certain circumstances, not to grant outdoor relief.

CHARGE AGAINST AN EMERGENCY MAN, M'KEEVER.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a case heard at Woodford Petty Sessions on the 24th inst. before Messrs. Hickson, R.N., and Burke, J.P., in which an emergency man named M'Keever was summoned by Constable Sheehan on a charge of being "drunk in the streets of Woodford on the 14th inst., and having a loaded revolver in his possession;" if it is true that a few hours after his arrest he was brought before Mr. Burke, J.P., by whom he was discharged, and who added that no further action should be taken; has his attention been called to the report of the trial, from which it appears that it was proved by Constable Sheehan that M'Keever, on being arrested, threatened to shoot him; that Mr. Burke, notwithstanding the protest of the presiding magistrate, persisted in cross-examining the policeman, and finally called him a "blackguard;" and that after M'Keever had been fined £2 and costs, and had paid that sum, Mr. Burke stood up in Court, advised M'Keever to appeal, and ordered the money to be handed back; and if the above facts are correctly stated, whether the Lord Chancellor will make inquiry into the action of this magistrate?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not been able to obtain a Report upon this matter, and I must ask the hon. Member to repeat the question.

MR. JOHN SLATTERY.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland if he has yet received any information as to whether Mr. John Slattery, of Cork, has had an appeal lodged against the sentence of six months' imprisonment, in default of giving bail to be of good behaviour; and if an application to have a case stated is made in the Superior Court, will the Irish Law Officers undertake not to oppose the application?

MR. MADDEN: I have just received information that proceedings in the case referred to are being taken in the shape of an application for habeas corpus.

THE CLONGOREY ARRESTS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the charges of unlawful assembly against a number of Clongorey workmen were yesterday dismissed by the Court at Newbridge on the ground that the precept, disobedience to which was the foundation of the charge, had not been served according to Law; and whether, as Father Kinsella and 17 workmen are now in prison for the same act, in respect to which the charges were yesterday dismissed, their release will be ordered?

MR. CAREW (Kildare, N.): I wish also to ask the Chief Secretary whether he is aware that at Newbridge Petty Sessions yesterday, the cases against the several persons who were charged with disobeying the precept issued by Colonel Forbes, R.M., ordering them to desist from committing waste on Mrs. Kelly's farm at Clongorey, were dismissed by Messrs. Bowlby and McSheehy, on the ground that the precept was not legally served; and whether, as Father Kinsella, and 17 other persons, are now in Kilkenny Gaol for unlawfully assembling to disobey the said precept, which is now found not to have been at any time of valid force, he will at once order their release?

MR. MADDEN: Perhaps I may be allowed to answer these questions. The charges of unlawful assembly were not dismissed; the hearing was commenced yesterday, and is still proceeding. The case against the persons charged with aiding and abetting in the disobedience of the precept was dismissed without prejudice on the ground that the precept was not legally served, on which point, however, the magistrates have agreed to state a case.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask, under these circumstances, as all these men were proceeded against for precisely the same act, and as one body of workmen charged with disobedience to the precept are not to suffer punishment—the magistrates having dismissed the case on the ground that the precept was not legally served, as I contended in this House a few nights ago—whether Father Kinsella and the 17 workmen who are now in gaol will be discharged from custody, as the other two bodies of men apprehended for precisely the same charge have been released?

MR. MADDEN: The question will be carefully considered by the Government; but the incident only occurred this day. It has evidently been communicated to the hon. Member by telegram; it has not yet reached the Irish Office.

MR. SEXTON: But the question is one of the imprisonment of these persons. I will therefore ask the Chief Secretary whether, as the whole of the proceedings against the three bodies of men have been founded on the precept, he will not treat them all alike, and order the third batch of men to be released, or at any rate suspend the imprisonment until the Superior Court before which the case will ultimately come has given a decision?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member will see that a telegraphic communication to him is scarcely a sufficient ground for me to give a pledge to the House on the spur of the moment as to what course the Government will adopt.

MR. SEXTON: Then I beg to give notice that I will call attention to the matter on the Vote on Account, and press the question whether the third body of persons are not entitled to have the punishment suspended until the decision of the Superior Court has been given.

THE CORK POST OFFICE.

MR. LANE (Cork County, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the fact that an inexperienced telegraphist from a country railway station, who is not only unable to manipulate, but has never seen several of the instruments used in the Cork office, has been appointed this week to fill one of the vacancies in Cork, over the heads of skilled learners, who have been waiting over four years for this position; whether others have been recently appointed in a similar manner to the Cork office, who knew nothing whatever of the Wheatstone, quadruplex, or duplex working, and had to learn those instruments after appointment; and will he, in future appointments, consider the claims of learners trained at Cork, who are thoroughly acquainted with the various instruments in use, and with every description of public work?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, Cambridge University): No telegraphist, experienced or otherwise, has this week been appointed to the Cork Office; but a telegraphist has been recommended for transfer from a country railway station to Cork. This telegraphist is an expert manipulator, and, though he is stated to be at present unacquainted with some of the apparatus in use in a large office, would probably soon supply the defect. The same remark applies to other telegraphists who have been recently transferred to Cork. The learners at Cork have no claim to appointment, it being a condition of their becoming learners that they sign an understanding to that effect. I shall, however, in making appointments, always be glad to consider the learners as eligible candidates when they have made satisfactory progress.

WELSH EMIGRANTS.

MR. DAVID THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if in future Emigration Returns he will cause to be stated separately the number and destinations of passengers of Welsh nationality leaving the United Kingdom for places out of Europe in each year, as is at present done in the case of Irish and Scotch emigrants?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): The Acts under which the Returns are obtained do not confer power for effecting the modifications suggested by the hon. Member.

PICKETS IN TRADE DISPUTES.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can define the law as relating to pickets in trade disputes between employers and employed; if men subjected to intimidation, inquiry, or demand, either within or without the dock gates, or other places, as to whether they belong to Unions or not, and refusing to be interrogated, will receive the protection of the police; if the apparent unsatisfactory state of the law relating to combinations, Trade Societies, and Unions, is receiving the attention of the Government with reference to the rights of free labour, so as to ensure and safeguard such legitimate rights; and whether it is proposed to legislate on the matter during the present Session?

MR. C. GRAHAM: May I ask whether such an unsatisfactory state of the law as is alleged in the second paragraph of the question really exists?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I cannot define the law relating to pickets otherwise than by referring my hon. Friend to the third and seventh sections of the Conspiracy and Protection of Property Act, 1875. The police are instructed to give protection to all persons against violence, intimidation, and the other forms of coercion and annoyance which are made punishable offences by Statute, or are punishable by law. The state of the law on the subject referred to has received, and is receiving, the careful attention of the Government. It has not yet been made apparent by judicial decision or otherwise that the Statute and Common Law taken together are insufficient to insure and safeguard the legitimate rights of free labour. Until it has been shown that the law falls short of what is necessary for that purpose the Government think it is premature to consider fresh legislation.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): Has the right hon. Gentleman received information which leads him to the conclusion that the authorities have not yet power enough for dealing with the whole questions arising out of the dock strike?

MR. MATTHEWS: During the dock strike complaints were received from persons who stated that they had been intimidated.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is there not sufficient power under the existing law to deal with undue intimidation?

MR. MATTHEWS: No.

THE DELHI-UMBALLA-KALKA RAILWAY.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he can lay Papers upon the Table showing by whom and on what terms the railway direct from Delhi to Umballa and Kalka, at the foot of the hills, has been taken up; whether the use of any part of the Grand Trunk and Bridges has been conceded to the undertakers; and whether anything has been arranged for carrying the rail on into the hills?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GOSSET, Chatham): Papers containing the contract with the Delhi and Kalka Railway were presented to Parliament on the 28th of May, 1889. I believe that the hon. Member will find the Papers in the Library. As to the second paragraph of the question, no use of any part of the Grand Trunk and Bridges has been conceded to the undertakers, so far as the Secretary of State is informed. In regard to the third paragraph, no arrangement has been made for carrying the rail on into the hills.

THE BUCKINGHAM RURAL SANITARY AUTHORITY.

CAPTAIN VERNEY (Bucks, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Local Government Board whether his attention has been drawn to the Report presented this month to the Buckingham Rural Sanitary Authority by their Medical Officer of Health, Dr. George H. De Ath, in which he states that a cottage at Charndon, which about 18 months ago was condemned as unfit for human habitation, is still occupied by the same family, namely, man and wife and four children, one over 20 years of age; that this cottage has only one sleeping room, which is in the roof, and has no closet and no drains; that the defective water supply and drainage of Water Stratford has been frequently brought before the authority, and nothing has been done, although in heavy rains the water runs in at the back doors and out of the front doors of some of the cottages; that a new public house called the "Crown" has been built at Twyford, and occupied under "The Public Health Act, 1878," notwithstanding that the nearest supply of water is a quarter of a mile away; that the Inspector of Nuisances has reported of Padbury, the scene lately of diarrhoea epidemic, that the general drainage is bad and the water supply unsatisfactory, and that no steps are being taken to deal with these grievous defects; and whether the Local Government Board propose to take any, and, if so, what steps to compel the authority to deal with these cases?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. LONG, Wilts, Devizes): The Local Government Board have within the last few days received a copy of the Annual Report for 1889 made to the Rural Sanitary Authority of the Buckingham Union by their Medical Officer of Health, and it contains statements to the effect of those mentioned in the question. As regards some of these matters the Board have no control over the Sanitary Authority; but with respect to sewerage and water supply, I may refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave to the question which he put to me yesterday, and I may repeat that if a complaint were made to the Board under Section 299 of the Public Health Act that the Sanitary Authority had made default in these matters, it would receive prompt attention.

SUCCESSION DUTY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the case that personalty (including heritable bonds and sums secured over realty by bond or mortgage) pay a Probate Duty of 3 per cent., one-half whereof goes to the relief of local taxation ; whether feu duties and ground annuals pay no local taxes, and pay only a Succession Duty of $1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., no part of which goes to the relief of local taxation ; whether any, and what, good reason exists why feu duties and ground annuals should not contribute towards local taxation ; whether personality (including as aforesaid) pays the full Probate Duty (3 per cent.) on the capital value, cash down, whilst feu duties and ground annuals pay the Succession Duty ($1\frac{1}{2}$ per cent.) only on the life interest of the party succeeding, and that by eight half-yearly instalments, the undue instalments being cancelled in the event of the predecease of the successor ; and whether any, and what, good reason exists for this exceptional treatment of feu duties and ground annuals as compared with personality ?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): It is impossible to deal with all the points raised by the hon. Member within the limit of an answer. His question opens up the whole relation between personality and reality, between Imperial Taxation and Local Taxation, and between taxes on the living and taxes on the dead. The hon. Member's question is further complicated by a point in connection with permanent ground rents, which I believe to be the same as ground annuals in the phraseology of Scotch Law. But this is a subject which will possibly come within the proper investigations of the Select Committee on Town Holdings.

THE TURKISH COURTS AT ALEPPO.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will lay upon the Table a Copy of the Correspondence that has taken place with regard to the case of Mrs. Barker ; and, if he is unable to do this, whether he will cause a Copy of the Correspondence, and especially of the Report and Letters of Consul Henderson, to be placed in the Library of the House of Commons ?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I do not think that it would be justifiable to print this voluminous correspondence which relates solely to the legal proceedings of a single British subject in a foreign country. We have had no discussion in regard to it with the Turkish Government, and we have no ground beyond Mrs. Barker's assertions for believing that there has been any failure of justice in the tribunals. If the hon. Member desires to peruse the correspondence I shall be happy to enable him to do so at the Foreign Office.

H.M.S. VICTORIA—THE 110-TON GUNS.

MR. HANBURY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the contracts for the two 110-ton guns for H.M.S. Victoria were entered into by the War Office ; whether in the case of one, at least, the form of contract was that generally used for the purchase of ordinary stores ; whether it did, in fact, contain provisions quite inapplicable for the supply of such an article as a 110-ton gun ; whether, on the other hand, neither the contract itself, nor the schedule attached to it, contained any provisions as to the materials to be used in the construction of the gun ; whether it contained no details as to the proof the gun was to undergo before its final acceptance by Her Majesty's Government ; whether he will lay a copy of this contract (omitting, if necessary, the cost) upon the Table of the House ; and by whom, when, and how, was each of these guns tested ; upon whose certificate were they passed ; and when, in each case, was payment for them made to the contractors ?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The contracts for the two 110-ton guns for Her Majesty's ship Victoria were entered into by the War Office in 1886. The same form of contract was used for both ; in fact, we have only one form of contract for all store and clothing contracts, and the general provisions are applicable to guns, but any special provisions should appear in the schedule. The Audit Office has raised the point that the form of contract is not applicable to guns, because of the provision in Clause 2 that a contractor should replace rejections in 10 days, altogether ignoring the proviso "after he is required by notice to do so." The contract did not specify the material to be used, or the tests to be applied, as there was a resident Inspector at Elswick, and there were authorised tests for steel in which the Elswick Company had already concurred. A representative of the Elswick Company is summoned on important occasions to sit with the Ordnance Committee. The contract did provide for proof and also for rejection of inferior supplies, but gave no details as to proof. Since that time provision has been made for inserting in the schedule to the contract full details as to all these matters. The question now raised refers to a contract made four years ago. For the examination and proof of these and all other guns the Director of Artillery is responsible. One of these guns was paid for in 1888-9; the other is not yet finally paid for.

MR. HANBURY: What I want to know from my right hon. Friend is, whether in regard to the guns the test they were to undergo was merely the result of a verbal understanding between the War Office and the contractors, or was there any contract in existence requiring the contractors to accept the test?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It was certainly not a verbal understanding. It was, however, a deliberate understanding entered into with the contractors at the sitting of the Ordnance Committee.

MR. HANBURY: Did it in any way constitute a contract between the War Office and the contractors?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Most undoubtedly; and the Elswick Company knew that if they broke their faith they would never be employed by the War Office again.

EXPLOSION OF TORPEDOES IN THE RIVER MEDWAY.

MR. EDWARD KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Rochester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if his attention has been called to the fact that, by reason of frequent explosions of torpedoes in the River Medway, the fish are destroyed in large quantities, and that the results of the trade of the freemen fishermen, secured to them by Act of Parliament, are seriously damaged; and if steps can be taken to remedy this?

MR. STANHOPE (who replied) said: The attention of the First Lord of the Admiralty had not been drawn to any extensive destruction of fish by torpedo explosions in the Medway.

DISTRICT COUNCILS.

MR. TOLLEMACHE (Cheshire, Edisbury): I beg to ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the Local Government Board whether the statement in his speech, on Thursday 20th instant, as to the "Inconvenience which resulted in many cases from the want of District Councils to relieve County Councils of the care of the highways," is to be taken as indicating an intention on the part of the Government, in any future legislation, to place main roads under the control of District Councils?

*MR. LONG: No, Sir; certainly not. The words quoted by my hon. Friend referred merely to the difficulties under which County Councils labour in reference to the maintenance of highways, not main roads.

BISLEY COMMON.

MR. HANKEY (Surrey, Chertsey): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is the case that during several months past troops have been brought from Portsmouth and Aldershot to Bisley Common, to work there for the National Rifle Association; whether he will state the amount of the daily wage paid to each man for the work thus done; and whether in view of the hardship which the use of military labour, as above-mentioned, has entailed upon the local labouring population, by depriving them of the employment which they would otherwise have obtained, he will forthwith direct that such a diminution in the number of soldiers now daily sent to Bisley Common should be made as will admit of employment being found at once for the local labouring population?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The first paragraph of my hon. Friend's question must be answered in the affirmative. The endeavour is always made to carry out military works by military labour; and during the winter months, when drill is largely suspended, such labour is found to be of great physical benefit to the soldier. Having this in view, soldiers have been employed at Bisley in preparing butts which will not merely supply the needs of the National Rifle Association, but will also be of great use for the shooting of the Army and, under regulations, for the Volunteers of the Metropolis and the Southern Counties. We have always rendered assistance of a similar character at Wimbledon. The working pay of the men is 9d. a day, and the National Rifle Association has benefited by the cheapness of the labour. But it is only fair to remember that, on the other hand, the establishment of the camp at Bisley will hereafter be a source of considerable financial advantage to the neighbourhood.

LETTERS TO THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

SIR GEORGE BADEN-POWELL (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state what quantities of letters were received from and despatched to the Australian Colonies during the year 1889 respectively by the direct sea route at the rate of 4d. per letter, and by the overland route (via Brindisi and Naples) at the rate of 6d. per letter?

*MR. RAIKES: The answer to my hon. Friend's question is as follows:

—Weight of letters via Brindisi or Naples, postage 6d. — despatched to Australasia, 59,000 lb.; received from Australasia, 52,000 lb. Weight of letters sent by all sea route, postage 4d.—despatched to Australasia, 3,900 lb.; received from Australasia, 3,800 lb.

POST OFFICE AUXILIARY SORTERS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether auxiliary sorters employed in the Post Office are paid as low as 1s. 6d. for from four to four and a half hours' work; and, if so, how many such sorters are employed in London at that wage; and whether any increased rate of pay is allowed to auxiliaries for night duty?

*MR. RAIKES: I am not aware that there are any auxiliary sorters paid as low as 1s. 6d. for from four to four and a half hours' work. When such temporary assistance becomes necessary in times of pressure the rule is to offer 2s. for the job, with a higher rate per hour for night duty.

POSTAL EMPLOYÉS.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in cases where deductions are made from the wages of postal employés, they are nevertheless compelled to sign a receipt for the full wage; and whether this is the general practice; and, if not, whether any cases have come under his notice of Postmasters compelling men to sign a receipt for more money than they actually received?

*MR. RAIKES: The practice, the invariable practice of the Post Office is to require its servants to sign for the amount of salary or wages which is actually chargeable to the Vote, the deductions, where deductions are made—as, for instance, for Income Tax—being shown in the form of receipt. But perhaps the hon. Member is referring to payments made by local Postmasters to those who are their own servants, and not the servants of the Department. Here a certain laxity of practice has, in some comparatively few instances, been found to prevail. Postmasters not infrequently receive a specific allowance for a specific purpose, and it has occasionally happened that from such purpose a part of the allowance has been diverted. Wherever this has been found to be so the Department has adopted very stringent measures.

COUNTY COURTS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Attorney General, with reference to the Amendments which were proposed to the County Courts Consolidation Bill to secure that appeals from the County Courts in equity matters should be heard in the Chancery Division, and withdrawn on the understanding that the end would be secured by rules of Court, whether the Judges have framed such rules; and, if not, will he press the matter on their attention?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, I stated when before the Grand Committee, as is the fact, that arrangements for providing that appeals from County Courts in equity matters should be heard in the Chancery Division could be made by rules of the High Court of Justice. The Judges, have, I believe, not at present framed such rules; and having regard to the condition of business in the Chancery Division, I think that any change of the kind might tend to delay and embarrassment. I will, however, bring the matter to the attention of the Rule Committee.

MISAPPROPRIATION OF TRUST MONEY.

MR. H. S. WRIGHT (Nottingham, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been directed to the bankruptcy of Messrs. Towle and Gilbert, Solicitors, Nottingham, and to the misappropriation by them to their own use of considerable trust moneys, and of large sums of money belonging to and received from or on behalf of clients chiefly for investment on mortgage, thus causing serious loss and deprivation to numbers of persons; whether it is the intention of the Treasury to prosecute the delinquents; and if the present Law does not meet the case of such delinquencies, whether the Government will consider the desirability of introducing some amendment of the Law?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: My attention has been called to this matter. I am aware great injury was inflicted on many poor persons. I am in hopes that evidence will be forthcoming to enable proceedings to be taken to bring the parties to justice. It is not, I think, desirable that I should say more upon this subject. The law does not, in my opinion, require amendment. The question is one of obtaining the necessary evidence.

INCOMPETENT CLERGYMEN.

MR. DAVID THOMAS: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it is the intention of the Government to introduce this Session any measure providing for the exercise of more effective disciplinary power over clergymen who are unfit occupants of their livings, having regard to the statements made by the Prime Minister two years ago that some such measure ought to be passed by Parliament without loss of time; that it was a matter of much interest in Wales; and that the cost of putting the present Law into operation was "practically prohibitive?"

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): A Bill dealing with Church discipline was passed through the House of Lords in the Session of 1888; but it was not proceeded with in this House, as there appeared to be little probability that it could be passed into law without an amount of time which was not then at the disposal of the Government; but if I am to understand from the hon. Gentleman's question that there would be a disposition on the part of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite to assist in passing such a measure, I will communicate with my friends in another place, and I have no doubt the desired opportunity will be afforded.

CARDIFF TELEGRAPH CLERKS.

SIR EDWARD REED: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that certain telegraph clerks of Cardiff, who were interrogated as to certain newspaper letters, and called upon to find out who had written them, were, failing to do this, summarily ordered away, at a few hours' notice, to other towns as a punishment; whether his attention has been called to a speech of the Postmaster General, reported in the newspapers of 14th February, in which he said that—

"If his conduct in connection with this matter was questioned in Parliament, he should be quite prepared to justify it:"

and whether, in view of these facts, he will afford facilities for this subject, which is greatly disturbing the members of the Telegraph Service throughout the country, being brought promptly under the consideration of the House of Commons?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am informed by my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General that the question of the hon. Member does not accurately represent the facts of the case; but I would suggest that there will be a better opportunity of raising the question when the Telegraph Vote comes up for consideration, and I do not think the delay will injuriously affect the Telegraph Service.

TERRITORIAL STANDING COMMITTEES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he yet intends to propose any Territorial Standing Committees, and especially one to deal with such Bills as may be referred to it regarding that northern part of Britain which has such distinctive institutions, laws, and nomenclature as are not understood by the more southern branches of the Anglian and Celtic races?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is not the intention of the Government to establish Territorial Standing Committees, and I can hardly think that the hon. Member can seriously propose such a course.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I beg to give notice that I shall take a further opportunity of proposing to the House that there shall be a Standing Committee for dealing with that part of the country commonly, but erroneously, called Scotland.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the last competitive examination was held for admission to Class I. of the Home Civil Service; how many vacancies in the Home Civil Service were filled up by open competitive examination during the years 1880 to 1886, inclusive, and how many candidates submitted themselves for examination; whether he can state about the percentage of those in the Civil Service who are entitled to retire upon pensions, but who continue to draw full salaries, without doing the full work; whether, since the discontinuance of these examinations, Treasury clerks have been selected for lucrative appointments in other offices, so that there has been unusual rapidity of promotion at the Treasury, and a block of promotion at other offices, and that clerks have been transferred from one office to another in which the work is totally different; can he state in approximately how many cases, public servants who obtained their appointments by competitive examination have had "selected" men from other offices, who have not been examined, put over their heads; whether he is aware that many parents with small incomes have spent substantial amounts upon a special education, with a view to their children entering for the competitive examination, and that in many cases, in consequence of a system of patronage being substituted for examination, they have been obliged, at a critical time of life, to change their plans; and whether it is intended to return to the system of open competitive examinations; and, if so, when?

Sir George Campbell

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question of the hon. Gentleman having only been put down last night did not come to my knowledge until this morning, and I am unable to give all the details for which he asks. The last open competition for Class I. of the Upper Division was held in December, 1886. During the time that the present Government have been in office they have been reducing the number of the higher and more largely-paid Establishments, and they have been able to supply vacancies by transfer thereto of redundant clerks, and in this way several vacancies at the Treasury, among other offices, have been filled up. This reduction of the Higher Establishment is fully endorsed by the Royal Commission on Civil Establishments. We are not, therefore, able to agree with the hon. Member, who would urge us to hold competitive examinations for posts that are not required in order to provide for youths who would, no doubt, for sufficient reason, prefer the Public Service to open professions, and it is not our intention to hold open competitive examinations for Class I. as long as it is practicable to fill vacancies by transfers. As far as I am aware, three appointments have been made from the Treasury to Staff posts. In the filling of such posts we are responsible, and are ready, when necessary, to explain our acts.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS COMMITTEE.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when the Government will be prepared to re-appoint the Small Holdings Committee?

*MR. COBB: Before the right hon. Gentleman replies to the question may I ask him whether, if the Committee are able to make an early Report, there is any chance of legislation on the subject this Session?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the hon. Member for Rugby (Mr. Cobb) will be able to form his own judgment upon that matter, having regard to the various measures which are to be brought before the House. In reply to the question of the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Collings), I have to say when I have ascertained that it is the general wish of Members of this House I will be prepared to take the necessary steps.

GRANTS TO SCOTCH SCHOOLS.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General, in the accounts for the year ended 31st March, 1889, Class IV., Vote 10, that—

“ During the year 1888-9 Grants amounting altogether to £2,876 5s. were paid to Hillhead, Hamilton Crescent, and Bellahouston Schools, Govan, and to Harris Academy, Dundee, although the average fee from each scholar exceeded 9d. per week. Similar payments were reported last year, the Department pleading in justification the terms of the Code of 1887. The Code, however, in that respect was admittedly in opposition to the terms of section 3 of the Elementary Education Act of 1870, and, consequently, inoperative; but, under the circumstances, the Treasury sanctioned the payments, on the understanding that they were not to be continued beyond the year 1887-8. As stated in my last Report, the payments have been continued in the year 1888-9, in opposition both to the Act and to the Amended Code of 1888 ;”

whether these schools are still on the list of State-aided schools entitled to Government grant; and whether the Treasury intend taking any steps in the matter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The question raised in the Report of the Comptroller and Auditor General turns upon certain differences in the interpretation placed upon the latter of the Treasury. The Comptroller and Auditor General refers to the explanation given by the Accounting Officer, but states that he is unable to accept the responsibility of passing the grants without noticing them in his Report. The question will now come under the review of the Committee on Public Accounts, and the Treasury will await the judgment of that Committee. The schools referred to have not been removed from the list of schools conditionally entitled to State aid, but they will not continue to receive Government grants should the average fee be found to exceed 9d a week.

CONDUCT OF BUSINESS—THE ESTIMATES—ARRANGEMENT OF THE VOTES.

MR. CAMPBELL - BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether there is any precedent for asking a Vote from the House on account of Estimates not yet in the hands of Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think the right hon. Gentleman will find that in 1869-70 the Estimates were delivered on April 13, the first Vote on Account having been taken on April 9. There are other precedents for Votes on Account being taken practically simultaneously with the delivery of the Estimates. I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that passing a Vote on Account does not bind the House to the approval of any new expenditure, and I would refer him to the statement on this point made by the right hon. Member for South Edinburgh in 1866. The course taken by the Government is in order to suit the convenience of the House, as next week, when the time would have been available for Supply, has been devoted to other purposes.

MR. JOHN MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Estimates in the Vote on Account are not presented in a new form, reducing the number of Votes from 137 to 106; whether this change has been approved by the Public Accounts Committee; and whether the House will have an opportunity of examining any scheme for the re-arrangement of the Estimates, and pronouncing upon it, in conformity with the recommendations of the Select Committee on Estimates Procedure in 1888, and of the Public Accounts Committee of the same year?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Yes, Sir; the Estimates covered by the Vote on Account have been presented in a form showing a reduction in the number of separate Votes to 106. The change has not yet been approved by the Public Accounts Committee, but it is proposed to invite the assistance of that Committee and to ask them to consider, and, I hope, to approve of the change. Any suggestions or alterations which that Committee may recommend will, I am sure, receive the careful consideration of the House and of the Government, with a view to giving effect to them; and it is clearly understood that in giving the Vote on Account the House does not commit itself to approval of the new form of the Estimates. In 1860-61 the Civil Service Votes numbered 198; in 1861-62 they were reduced to 183; in 1865-66 they were 182; in 1866-67 they were 169; in 1867-68 they were 168; and in 1868-69 they were 146. In reducing the number of Votes we are only, therefore, following precedent. The Government were so impressed with the necessity of making some change in the form of the Estimates which would reduce the number of Votes and insure their being better grouped that they did not like to delay making their proposals for another year. Accordingly, we determined that the Estimates should be prepared and presented in the new form, and in so doing we believed that the House and the Committee of Public Accounts would, without committing themselves to accepting the form for more than one year, be better able to judge of the change with a view to its future adoption. The Estimates when in the hands of Members will show that the means of comparison are preserved.

MR. J. MORLEY: May I ask whether it is true that the Government first of all adopted the change in the form of the Estimates, and then, last night at a late hour put on the Paper the proposal to refer the matter to the Public Accounts Committee. I would further ask whether, in the case of all the precedents the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned, the change had not been first submitted to the Public Accounts Committee, and whether that Committee had not in 1888 almost ordered that before any change was made in the form of the Estimates they, as well as the House, should first have an opportunity of considering the matter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: In answer to the first question of the right hon. Gentleman, I may say that I am under the impression that the Committee could not deal with the question unless it was referred to them by the House. With regard to the second question, the right hon. Gentleman will find that none of the changes to which I have referred had been submitted to the previous approval of the Committee of Public Accounts. In answer to the third question, I admit that the Committee did express a desire that changes generally should be submitted to them for approval.

MR. J. MORLEY: I only want to know whether we are to-night going to consider a Vote on Account, cast in a form which has never been approved by, or submitted to, the Committee of Public Accounts?

Mr. W. H. Smith

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The House will not in the slightest degree commit itself to the form in which the demand is submitted. There is no change in the method of accounts, and there is no change whatever in the services to be provided for. The fact is, that certain Votes have been put together.

MR. J. MORLEY: Is it not the case that the Civil Service Estimates have been printed in a changed form, which has afterwards to be approved of?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I have stated that they are undoubtedly presented in a changed form; as they were presented in a changed form in 1860, 1861, 1865, and 1866-7-8.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): Is it not a fact that the Estimates Procedure Committee of 1888 reported that a scheme of grouping should receive the attention of the Treasury and be submitted to the House. Was not this Resolution substantially adopted by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on behalf of the Government, when he said that no large alteration would be made of so serious a character as to need the approval of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: It is perfectly true that the Committee did desire and did instruct the Treasury to group the Estimates more carefully together, and the Treasury, having followed their instructions, have only been wanting in one thing—namely, that they have not submitted a scheme to the House for consideration in any other form than in the concentrated form of the Estimates themselves. The only way in which the Instruction of the Committee of 1888 could be carried out was in the way now submitted to the House in the Estimates of the year.

MR. JENNINGS (Stockport): May I ask whether, by this new system of classifying Votes, it is no longer the case that there will be a separate Vote for the maintenance of the Houses of Parliament, the maintenance of the British Museum, and the Metropolitan Police Courts; and whether these changes are not calculated to lessen the power of criticism possessed by the House over these Estimates?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Even if these Votes were not submitted as separate and substantive Votes, they would all appear as so many sub-heads, and the House would possess the same control.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, Clitheroe): The right hon Gentleman referred to the precedent of 1867, and said that changes were in that year made in the Civil Service Estimates without submitting them first to the Public Accounts Committee. But is it not the fact that the changes were submitted to, and approved by, the Public Accounts Committee in that year and also in 1881?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I will make inquiry.

*MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether, if we pass this Vote on Account, it will not commit us to the change proposed, or, at any rate, preclude us from re-opening the question this Session?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is for the House to judge whether it will preclude any question from being raised again; it is not a question of order.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the putting of one question from the Chair for a number of Services will not place at the disposal of the Government the balances unexpended on all those separate Services as if it were one Vote, instead of two or three?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: If the House attaches any importance to the point which has been raised, there will be no hesitation on the part of Her Majesty's Government in giving an assurance that the surplus under one sub-head shall not be expended in the Services under another sub-head.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would inform the House whether the assurance he has just given applies to the sub-heads generally, or whether it is only intended to apply to those which it is suggested to alter?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That, I think, is a question rather for the Public Accounts Committee to consider, and I may say that any suggestions which may be made in this Committee will certainly receive the most careful and respectful consideration of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg, Sir, to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of calling attention to a matter of urgent public importance, namely, to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in introducing large alterations in the mode of submitting the Estimates to this House without having previously submitted them to the approval of the House.

*MR. SPEAKER: I would point out to the hon. Member that that is a question which would come better at a subsequent period on Committee of Supply.

MR. BUCHANAN: Am I to understand, Sir, that I should be in order in moving to report Progress on a Vote of Account in order to call attention to this subject in Committee?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman's Motion could be made when the House is in Committee. The hon. Member would then be in order in raising the question as to the form in which the Votes are to be taken in this House.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I wish, Sir, to ask a question on a point of order. The Government have intimated that they propose to have the subject of the new form of taking the Estimates referred to the Public Accounts Committee. The functions of the Committee are laid down on the Standing Orders, and they are not concerned in any way with the mode of putting the Votes from the Chair in this House, or, indeed, with the question of procedure in this House. The reference of such a question as is now suggested to the Public Accounts Committee would be really an extension of the province and powers of that Committee. I therefore ask you, Sir, as a point of order, whether such a proposal can be adopted without the passing of a Standing Order upon the subject.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think that if the existing powers of the Committee should be exceeded then an instruction would be required to enable the Committee to consider the special question to be referred to it.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the last paragraph of the Report of the Public Accounts Committee which has just been made, and which has reference to the point now raised. The Committee state that they do not desire to deal with any question relating to the voting of the Estimates in Committee of Supply. I would point out that the Public Accounts Committee is an exceptional Committee acting under a Standing Order of this House, and it would be highly inconvenient to submit to them such a question as has now been raised. [Cries of "Order, order!"] I am only elucidating the question I desire to put to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, as I think it would be highly inconvenient to mix up these technical matters, as to the accounts and control over moneys that have been voted, with the question of procedure in the voting of the Estimates in this House.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: My attention has been called to the paragraph referred to by the hon. Gentleman, which seems to negative the power of the Public Accounts Committee to entertain the question as to the form in which the Votes are to be submitted to the House, and to suggest that the responsibility should rest upon the Government themselves. The Government has accepted that responsibility; but they desire to obtain the assistance of the Committee on Public Accounts in order that that Committee may satisfy themselves that the form in which the Votes are submitted to the House is satisfactory.

*MR. H. J. WILSON (Holmfirth): Did I understand you, Mr. Speaker, to rule that the question submitted by my hon. Friend (Mr. Buchanan) was not a matter of urgent public importance?

*MR. SPEAKER: No; I suggested that it would more properly arise at a later stage, when the House is in Committee.

*(4.40.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I desire, Sir, to raise the question which I attempted to bring before the House before the Speaker left the Chair. I should like to state very shortly what has actually taken place with regard to this matter, and what the proposals of the Government, and the action they desire to take, really amount to. The whole subject originated in the Estimates Procedure Committee, 1888, which considered the possibility of grouping the Votes in Supply, and a scheme was submitted to them, which was by no means identical in essence or detail with the scheme or which the Estimates now before the Committee is based. The recommendation of the Procedure Committee is that the scheme should be submitted to the consideration of the Treasury with a view to a scheme being submitted to the House. In the autumn of 1888 a different scheme was sent to the Public Accounts Committee, and the scheme upon which the arrangement of the present Estimates is based is a modification of the scheme of the Public Accounts Committee. That scheme should have received the approval of the House before being applied to the Estimates. On April 30, 1889, the Chancellor of the Exchequer said it could only be with the full assent of the House that the Government would take any steps to limit discussion on the Votes. The subject is not merely a technical or financial one. It is closely connected with the efficient conduct of the business of the House. The discussions in Committee of Supply are upon questions of administration, and as such they are highly valued by hon. Members on both sides of the House. No doubt questions of administration are sometimes discussed in Committee at undue length; but that is comparatively a small evil, for it is by the discussion of those questions that the way is paved for substantial reforms. Discussions in Supply are very highly valued by hon. Members on both sides of this House save, perhaps, those who sit on the two Front Benches. The financial value of the discussion, of course, has often been considered and often minimised. Discussions on questions of administration are often doubtless continued at very great length and go into minute details; but, taking them all round, they are essentially of very great value for legislation and the effective discharge of their duties by Members of this House. Speaking particularly on behalf of Scotland and a body of Members who form a small minority in this House, I may say that these discussions in Committee of Supply afford us practically the only opportunity we have of bringing forward subjects in which we are interested and which cannot otherwise gain the general attention of the House. I urge upon independent Members of this House not to allow any substantial limitations of their opportunities for discussion until they have a fuller knowledge of what the limitations are and have had the chance of debating the proposals in detail before agreeing to them. We are practically, however, excluded from a due consideration of them—at any rate, for this Session—and we are required to act upon the proposals and vote estimates in accordance with them. In the short time that has been at disposal it is very difficult for a Member of this House to gather the extent of the alteration which has been made by the scheme now submitted. First of all, large and important Votes on which discussions took place in former years are being put together. The Diplomatic and Consular Votes are no longer taken separately—Votes which last Session formed almost the only opportunity we had of discussing Foreign Affairs. The Colonial and South African

Votes, too, are no longer capable of being discussed as separate Votes; they are to be taken as a single Vote. Undoubtedly, we have hitherto debated these Votes separately, not as to financial detail, but in regard to our colonial administration, which is interesting not merely to Members of this House, but to the public. Then the Votes of the Chief Secretary and of the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland are taken as a single Vote. Everyone is aware that these two Votes form the subject of discussions in this House. Similarly, with regard to subordinate Departments, large numbers of which, hitherto separate, have been put together. Take the Scottish Votes. This scheme does not include under one Vote all discussion of Scotch matters as did the scheme submitted to the Public Accounts Committee, but it considerably minimises our opportunities. The Vote for the Registrar General for Scotland and another Vote under Class II. have disappeared from the list. Then the Exchequer Vote for Scotland; that has also disappeared, and I think it has been distributed among several Votes. I cannot find it, but amongst the payments connected with the Treasury under the new scheme is the "Exchequer (Scotland)—Salaries only." The Exchequer (Scotland) Vote has disappeared.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. W. L. JACKSON, Leeds): It is in Class VII.

*MR. BUCHANAN: That makes it still more confusing than I imagined it to be, and it only illustrates the very great difficulty we shall have in the future in knowing exactly what we are voting. Take, for example, the Diplomatic and Consular Buildings Vote. We spent £26,000 last year (the estimate for this year is £40,000), and a Vote of £7,000 on account is asked for to-night. I am quite at a loss to understand this Vote, and we are left perfectly in the dark by the Government as to whether this is a large and substantial increase in the expenses, or whether it is due to the new scheme now being adopted. No doubt when we have the Memorandum of the changes submitted to us, we will be able to understand it. It is essentially the duty of Her Majesty's Government, before they insert in the Estimates alterations of this sort, to lay a statement before the House and Committee that we may see with what we are dealing. The Public Accounts Committee had a scheme submitted to them in 1888, and they reported. According to two letters addressed to the Chairman of the Committee by the Secretary to the Treasury—the Treasury, not the Government—found it desirable, comparing the Estimates of 1890-91, to effect some rearrangement of the Votes, the result being a reduction of the number of Votes. As I understand, a statement explanatory of that was not submitted at the same time.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: A statement was submitted at the time. Unfortunately, it has not been printed.

MR. BUCHANAN: Of course it is not printed. I am sorry I fell into the error. But it was only laid on the Table last night without notice being put upon the Paper. Had proper notice been given, probably it would have saved a great deal of discussion. I understand that part of the scheme before the Procedure Committee, but not included here, was that the Votes should go before a Select Committee, who should make certain of the Votes the subject of several large Resolutions. That has all fallen out. I think such a substantial alteration in the financial procedure of the country as that now proposed ought certainly to be considered by the Government before submitting it to the House. I earnestly call the attention of hon. Members to the subject as one which vitally affects their interests not only in respect of their financial control, but as regards the effective discharge of their duty in discussing the conduct of the Administration. Though no doubt a little of the diminution of the number of Votes is due to the Local Government Act and other causes, yet this is an alteration of a very different character, and one of such importance that it ought to have been submitted to this House. I beg, Sir, to move to report Progress, and that you ask leave to sit again.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. Buchanan).

(5.2.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am sorry that the hon. Member takes so serious a view of the situation. The Government believe that, in submitting the accounts in the present form, they are carrying out the recommendation of the Committee which sat on the question. If the method of presenting the accounts had been brought before the House endless debate would have arisen almost on every group of Votes. The hon. Member, and perhaps some others, have somewhat magnified the importance of the changes which have been made. It is said that Votes have been grouped together, each of which deserve the fullest discussion. But I can assure the Committee that there is no single Vote or sub-head of a Vote which, under the new system, cannot be discussed as amply as under the old, though fewer Votes will be presented. I may appeal to the Members of the Committee on Public Accounts, certainly to those who were on the previous Committee whether they do not think the system of grouping advantageous. The hon. Member himself doubted the value of a system of grouping, and opposed that system on the Committee. But it was distinctly recommended by the Committee, who said that some convenience and probably some economy of time would result from the adoption of a system of grouping two or more Votes which were now separately submitted to the Committee of Supply. It will be remembered that it was the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) who started the idea, that the proceedings of Supply might be simplified by grouping and presenting fewer Votes to the House. It may be that though each Vote may be discussed as amply as before, there will be less temptation, if I may say so, to frequent discussion. The grouping system has commended itself to the majority of the House. It might have been better to have referred the matter to the Committee on Public Accounts, rather than to put the Votes in the amended form at once before the House, but I shall be surprised if any Member of that Committee objects to the scheme of the Government as a whole.

An hon. MEMBER: It should have been referred to the House.

*MR. GOSCHEN: I thought the complaint was that we had not referred it to the Committee on Public Accounts.

*(5.5) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: To make it clear, I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the complaint of the Public Accounts Committee is that, instead of submitting a scheme of the proposed changes first to the House, and through the House to the Committee, the Government first made the changes in the mode of submitting the Estimates, and then came to the Public Accounts Committee with the changes already adopted, and asked them to criticise or adopt those changes. The changes were already made before the Committee were consulted. That is not the plan which the Procedure Committee recommended. The Government have not consulted either the House or the Public Accounts Committee.

*(5.7.) MR. GOSCHEN: I thought the complaint was that we had not submitted the changes to the Public Accounts Committee, but I now find that the Committee do not make a complaint.

*(5.7.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: I am afraid the right hon. Gentleman does not understand me. It is, in one sense, a complaint because the change has been made before either the House or the Public Accounts Committee had an opportunity of considering the scheme. The Committee do complain of the way in which they have been treated.

*(5.8.) MR. GOSCHEN: The right hon. Member interrupted me too soon. If the House had been consulted, the reform proposed would have been delayed for another Session. If the House studies the accounts in this new form, as it cannot fail to do in the practical working of the scheme, they will find it more convenient than the old. As to the complaint that we are only referring the change to the Public Accounts Committee after it has been effected, I can assure the hon. Member that we only propose to refer the matter to the Committee, because, from what we have learnt, we believe it to be their desire to have the matter before them. But I am quite willing even now to adopt any course which the right hon. Gentleman, on consultation with the Government, may desire for bringing the matter before the Public Accounts Committee. Although there will be undoubtedly some economy of time, I think the importance of the change has been unduly magnified.

*(5.10.) SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: The right hon. Gentleman has disarmed criticism by the extremely courteous way in which he expresses it to be his desire to treat the Committee over which I have the honour to preside, and in which he endeavours to make amends for any mistake he may have made. I understand the right hon. Gentleman to admit that a different course should have been pursued, and to say that he regrets what has been done. Speaking as a Member of the Public Accounts Committee, and not as belonging to either Party in the House, I desire to say that the Committee on Public Accounts are always unanimous, and by an old and invariable tradition are absolutely free from Party influences. And I hope that so long as I am connected with the Committee it will always be free from Party influences. What was done last Wednesday—and the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Jackson) will bear me out in this—was done with perfect unanimity, and no one objected to a word in the Report we presented to the House. There was a word which fell from the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury to which I wish to draw attention for a moment. He said that, in introducing these changes on the responsibility of the Government, he was acting according to the principle laid down in the Report of the Public Accounts Committee. That is not the view of the Committee, because they think it is too great a power to leave in the hands of Departments for them to present their accounts in any form they please—for instance, to reduce considerably the number of the Votes. From the public accounts point of view, we do not enter into the question of the effect the changes may have upon the mode in which money is voted in Parliament. We look to the clearness and continuity of the accounts and the efficiency of Parliamentary control over the money voted. If the number of Votes is diminished, it will be easier to transfer money voted for one service to the use of another. For example, in one Vote for Public Buildings in Great Britain money is to be voted for the Office of Works, and in place of the three existing familiar Votes there are three heads of the Vote—one for the Houses of Parliament, another for other public buildings, and a third for furniture for public offices. The Office of Works may spend money voted for one of these purposes on another. Under the present system of three separate Votes that could not be done, because it is impossible to transfer money voted, say, for the Houses of Parliament to other public buildings without a Resolution of the House; but, supposing this change is adopted without such a safeguard as that to-day suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, the money could be transferred, and there would be no sufficient Parliamentary control over the expenditure. The object of Parliamentary control would be defeated.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It would be stated in the Appropriation Account.

*SIR U. KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH: Yes, but it would not be necessary to come to the House to sanction the transfer from one Vote to another. This, I think, shows the danger of the change, and this is the justification of the view which has been repeatedly taken by the Public Accounts Committee, and which was stated in 1888—that important changes in the Estimates should not be effected at the sweet will of any Department of the Government, but should be submitted first for consideration to this House and the Public Accounts Committee. I have no doubt, on mature consideration, the Members of the Government will take exactly the same view as the Parliamentary Accounts Committee. All that I wish and claim is this: that we shall be perfectly free to consider this change as if it had not been made—as if all that had been done had been to submit a scheme for the re-arrangement of the Estimates, applying not only to these, but to the Army and Navy Estimates also. We should be in no way committed by the unfortunate fact that the Estimates have been re-cast in this form without consultation with the House and the Public Accounts Committee. As to the point I alluded to some time ago in putting a question, I hope I may be allowed to say that as to the matter of voting money in Committee of Supply, to which the hon. Member for Edinburgh alluded, I think it would be a very proper subject for the consideration of a Special Committee. I would deprecate the throwing of that matter on to the Public Accounts Committee, as it is not at all germane to their functions.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.20.) Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I rise, Sir, to move the reduction of the Vote, and I base the Motion upon the fact that certain official persons, whose salaries are included in it, have conspired together to defeat the course of justice.

MR. MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): I rise to a point of order. I wish to call attention to the fact that strangers are present.

Notice taken, that strangers were present.

Whereupon Question, "That Strangers be ordered to withdraw," put, and negatived.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I was saying that practically my charge is that certain official persons confederated together to defeat the course of justice by interfering to prevent their friends being put on trial for a crime in regard to which two persons were tried and convicted. Before stating the facts, I wish to call attention to the present position of the law in these matters. There is no doubt that of late years a certain offence—I will not give it a name—has become more rife than it ever was before. Before 1885 the law was insufficient to deal with it, because the offence had to be proved by an accessory, and many other offences very much of the same nature were not regarded as crimes at all. In 1885, when the Criminal Law Amendment Bill was before a Committee of the House, Mr. Stead—who, it will be remembered, took a very active part in urging that Bill on the attention of the House—sent me a report with reference to this offence, giving particulars and evidence which went to show the extent of its prevalence. I was requested to read this report to the House, but I did not think it desirable to do so, although I thought the case was pretty well proved. I proposed the addition to the Bill of a special clause which I took from the French Code, and this clause was submitted to the Attorney General and Lord Cross, and, with some verbal alterations, accepted and incorporated in the Bill, and is now the law of the land. Therefore, in 1885, Parliament armed the guardians of public morality with full powers to deal with this offence. In doing so, they recognised that the offence was on the increase, and they expressed their desire that it should be stamped out, and, presumably, it was intended that the law should be used equally against high and low. I will now state the facts of this case. It is very likely that I may fall into slight errors of detail, but I think I shall be able to submit enough to establish a prima facie case that there has been a gross scandal, and that there is ground for investigation into the conduct of those who are responsible for it. In the beginning of last July a boy in the Post Office was found to be in possession of much larger sums of money than it was likely he would have obtained in a legitimate way. On the 4th of July the boy was sent for by Mr. Phillips, an official of the Post Office, and Constable Hanks, attached to the Post Office, and the boy confessed that he had received the money for a certain offence committed in a house in Cleveland Street, occupied by one Hammond, and that other boys in the Post Office were equally guilty. These other boys were examined, and they also confessed, all stating that they had been induced to go to the house by a certain Newlove, a clerk in the Post Office. Newlove was interrogated and confessed to the charge. Newlove was arrested on the 7th of July, taken before the magistrate on the 8th, and by successive remands detained until the 20th of August. On that day a man named Veck was arrested. He was associated with Hammond in this house. Newlove and Veck were charged together; on the 11th of September they were committed for trial; and on the 18th were tried at the Old Bailey. Veck was indicted for felony and for misdemeanour, and Newlove was indicted alone for misdemeanour. Both pleaded guilty to misdemeanour and were sentenced, Veck to nine months' and Newlove to four months' imprisonment.

Mr Labouchere

The sentence on Veck was scandalously inadequate. Veck, who was called "The Rev. something—Veck"—I do not know whether he was in holy orders, but he went about dressed as a clergyman, had not only committed these offences himself with the boys, but was the associate and partner of Hammond, and induced boys to go to Cleveland Street for money, and in order to serve his private ends. If ever a man deserved the full sentence of the law this man Veck did. The Committee will remember how if a poor man, urged by primary necessity steals some small thing, he is sent to prison often for more than nine months, and how in Ireland men are sent to prison for longer periods for offences which assuredly even no Gentleman on the opposite side of the House will assert are in the least to be compared with that of this man Veck. Whether this inadequate sentence was a condition of these men pleading guilty, or whether, as they did plead guilty, it happened that the depositions at the Police Court were not shown to the Recorder, and he did not know how monstrous the case was, I do not know. But I think it is pretty clear that the real object was to stop all further disclosures, hush the matter up, and get these men out of the way. I believe that Newlove and Veck would never have been prosecuted had it not been for the action of the Postmaster General and the secretary of the Post Office. The matter occurred in the Post Office, and they—I honour and respect them for it—insisted that action should be taken in the matter. The Solicitor to the Treasury, who is, I believe, under the orders of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, and the Treasury, and I dare say the Home Secretary also—know perfectly well by this time that certain persons had frequented this house in Cleveland Street; they knew that the police had got certain clues; they knew certain names had been mentioned; and they determined, so far as they were concerned, that if they were obliged to prosecute these two men the case should go no farther if they could prevent it. Having thus arranged matters in regard to these two men, what, the House will wonder, had become of Hammond, the proprietor of the house? If Hammond had been arrested, he would no doubt have been able to make revelations. These wretches live not only by this particular offence, but by a system of levying blackmail; and it is incredible to suppose that Hammond did not himself know the names of many of the persons who had frequented the house. I stated that on the 4th of July these matters were investigated at the Post Office by Mr. Phillips, with Constable Hanks, and that Newlove and the other boys told what they knew about Hammond. Hammond was not watched on the 4th of July; far from it. It may be reasonably supposed that information of what was passing was conveyed by Newlove to Hammond, who, not being watched, fled the country. When he had got well away, on the 6th of July, a warrant was obtained against him. The Treasury were informed by Mr. Monro that Hammond was not present, but the police, unlike the Treasury, were perfectly in earnest in this matter. The Postal Authorities wrote at the same time to ask that, if possible, Hammond should be secured and brought back to England. On the 25th of July the Treasury forwarded to the police a letter from Lord Salisbury saying that the Government could not ask that Hammond should be extradited from France. By this time the Post Office, who were still anxious to pursue Hammond, had sent Mr. Phillips over to Paris, and on the 7th of August a telegram was received from him asking that someone should be sent over to complete arrangements for the expulsion of Hammond from France. On the 8th of August Inspector Abberline was sent over; but he did not stay long, and he was succeeded by Inspector Lowe. I do not know exactly what was being done with the French Government, but nothing came of it, and Hammond remained in France for about a month. On the 12th of September Hammond, whether expelled or not, went over the Belgian frontier, and Inspector Lowe followed him and reported to Scotland Yard that Hammond was at a town in Belgium. Mr. Phillips also went to Belgium on the 12th of September, and it appears that on the 14th he was already in communication with the Belgian police, for he telegraphed that the moment an assurance could be given that demand for extradition would be made, the Belgian police would arrest Hammond. On this the English police applied to the Treasury. The reply was that an answer should be sent as soon as possible, but that the question was not free from difficulty. On September 16, the secretary to the Post Office, who was also in earnest, wrote to the police urging that immediate steps should be taken to secure Hammond's arrest. On September 17, Inspector Greenham was sent to Belgium and reported himself at Brussels. On the same day the Treasury wrote to the police that there was no evidence before them of an extraditable offence, and therefore they could not ask for Hammond's extradition. On October 6 a strong letter was written by Mr. Monro to the Treasury, drawing attention to the stigma which would rest on the English police if Hammond were allowed to escape. On that day he did escape. Remember, this man was surrounded by English police. He was being watched by the Belgian police, but he went to Antwerp and embarked on board a ship called The Pennland, which was bound for the United States. During the time Hammond had been in Belgium, the Belgian police reported that he was accompanied by an English boy. This boy had been abstracted from his parents presumably for vile purposes. Now, whilst Hammond was in Belgium, whilst the English and Belgian police were surrounding him, Mr. Newton was with the solicitor to Lord Arthur Somerset and also to Veck and Newlove, either went to Belgium himself or sent someone there. This Mr. Newton, or this other person, gave Hammond a large sum of money, and also paid for the ticket not only of Hammond, but also of the boy who had fallen into such a terrible position. Any one can find that out by going to Cook's office.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Who obtained the tickets?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Newton or his representative. I cannot help thinking that if the Government had been in earnest, they might have obtained the extradition of Hammond, because our Extradition Treaties, both with France and Belgium, cover such charges as those of indecent assault, either by the principal or by accessories. It was put in evidence before the magistrate, and I do not think it was questioned, that Hammond induced boys to come to his house, that he took them into a room and handed them over to the creature who was going to assault them. I should say that that was being an accessory to an indecent assault, but I admit the point admits of a good deal of discussion. As this, however, was not a political offence, and as both the French Government and the Belgian Government and everybody in either country would have been glad to have had the men turned out of their country, I think they would in all probability have stretched a point if the matter had been fairly put before them. But there is another course. There is such a thing as expelling men from a country. I remember when I was in the Diplomatic Service being engaged in a case of expulsion. You can always get a Government, when it is going to expel, to expel on the frontier nearest to your own frontier, and I have no doubt we could have induced the French or the Belgian Government to have expelled Hammond by putting him on a British ship which would have brought him to this country. Certainly, in the opinion of the police and the Postal Authorities, something might have been done, but nothing was done by the Treasury or the Foreign Office; or, if anything was done, it was done in a perfunctory manner, so that no result should be achieved. If it had not been intended to extradite Hammond, if the Government had no plan by which they intended to get hold of him, what was their object in hunting this man from France to Belgium and from Belgium to America, and then leaving him alone? I think the object is pretty obvious. They wanted to send him away as far as possible from this country. Their object, in fact, was much the same as that of Mr. Newton, who gave him money and paid his passage, and also that of the boy with him, to America. Both of them, each for different reasons, wanted him not to turn up in England. The Government did not wish for revelations; they wished to hush up the matter. Now, Cleveland Street was frequented by a considerable number of persons. They were persons who used these boys, and most unquestionably it was desirable to get at them. I shall not trouble the Committee with more than one extract. I am going to read an extract which I think will surprise the Members of the Committee. It is from the evidence given by a constable named Sladden, who was put to watch the house to see who came to the house after Hammond had fled. This is his evidence:—

“I have been engaged in watching the house No. 19, Cleveland Street. I commenced on July 9th. On that day I saw at 5.10 p.m.—”

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Will the hon. Gentleman say from what he is reading?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Depositions.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There are no depositions of Sladden as far as I know.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I think I can convince the hon. and learned Gentleman. They may not have been published, and perhaps I am wrong in using the word depositions.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Gentleman says he is reading from depositions; I accept his word.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am reading the evidence of Constable Sladden at the Marlborough Police Court. I will produce the official copy. Sladden said, “I commenced on July 9th—” I can understand why the hon. Gentleman does not want this evidence read.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not rise for my own personal protection; but I venture to submit, for the honour of this House, it is not right that such observations should be made respecting one who, in the discharge of his public duties, is watching to see what is being put before the House.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton must see that that observation is a most offensive one, which ought not to be made across the floor of this House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will withdraw it, but perhaps I may be allowed to explain that my case is that the Government wish to hush this matter up. I put the matter in a general way and not in reference to the hon. and learned Gentleman in particular. Sladden said—

“I commenced on July 9th. On that day I saw at 5.10 p.m. a corporal of the 2nd Life Guards arrive at the house. A gentleman arrived at 4.50 p.m. knocked at the door, and was answered from the door. He and the corporal shook hands, talked for about five minutes, and walked away without entering the house. On July 13th I saw the same men call again. The house was empty, and they went away. On that same day a great many gentlemen called at the house. On July 14th a gentleman and a Royal Artilleryman called. On July 30th I saw other gentlemen come, and finding the house empty went away."

Now, I think I have proved my case. The house is in no obscure thoroughfare, but nearly opposite the Middlesex Hospital. Surely it must have been known to the police, and if it was not known to them it ought to have been. In no other city in the world are such abominations openly carried on. Parliament has done its best to put down houses of ill-fame, but compared with this place a house of ill-fame is respectable. If it were desired to make an example of the offenders, why was not a policeman stationed at the house to follow the persons who came there? The obvious answer is that it was not desired to follow them up and punish them. One person guessed the police were on his track. I do not wish to mention any names except those which have already been made public, but I will give the name of this person because a warrant is out for his arrest. It is Lord Arthur Somerset. A warrant is out for his arrest and he has fled. I am not certain whether the police got on his track by seeing him come to the house or whether his name was given by one of the boys, or by Veck or Newlove, but in any case on the 23rd of July several of the boys were taken to Knightsbridge Barracks, where Lord Arthur Somerset was quartered, and the boys identified him as a person who had been with them in the house. I know that evidence of informers is generally tainted, but the evidence of the boys is not near so tainted as would have been the evidence of one of these professional wretches. These boys were employed at the Post Office. They have been more sinned against than sinning, and it is not likely that they would have identified Lord Arthur Somerset unless they honestly believed he was the man who tempted them. On the 23rd of August, further evidence was obtained against Lord Arthur Somerset. A boy named Allies said he had received money from him in post-office orders. The boy lived at Sudbury, and on going to the post office there, the police found two post-office orders signed by Allies. The orders had also come from the Knightsbridge District Office. This, at least, was confirmatory of the statement of Allies. On the 24th of July, these boys were taken to identify Lord Arthur Somerset, and on the 27th of July Mr. Monro reported to the Treasury the evidence of the boys. On the 24th of August he further reported the evidence of Allies. The Treasury gave no sort of instructions, but after these Reports were made, the police were enjoined to take no further action until they heard again from the Treasury. The object of the Treasury was to hush up the matter, not to have prosecutions. The matter was referred to the Law Officers of the Crown. The Law Officers of the Crown, I need not say—

*SIR R. WEBSTER: What date is the hon. Gentleman referring to?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not know at what date, but I need not say the Law Officers did not advise a prosecution. Let me ask the Attorney General whether all the evidence was before the Law Officers? [Sir R. WEBSTER assented.] May I ask whether the questions that were put to the boys at Marlborough-street were arranged, in any sort of way, by the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, or by any of his subordinates? [The ATTORNEY GENERAL made no reply.] The hon. and learned Gentleman will not answer that.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Gentleman must not say that. I prefer to answer when I make my statement.

MR LABOUCHERE: I know that the cross-examination was so conducted as not to bring in Lord Arthur Somerset or others, because Mr. Newton was solicitor to Lord Arthur Somerset, and also solicitor to the prisoners Veck and Newlove. I have the evidence that was submitted at Marlborough Street, and not one-half of the statements of the boys to the police were brought out, and it was only stated in cross-examination that they had made statements at the Treasury, the obvious intention being to limit the prosecutions to Veck and Newlove. On August 3rd the police were watching Lord Arthur Somerset. Two constables saw him at the Knightsbridge barracks when he was on his way to take part in the review on the 7th of August, on the occasion of the German Emperor's visit to this country. On the 22nd of August a constable again saw him at the barracks. On the 11th of September he called at the barracks and was informed that Lord Arthur Somerset had obtained four months' leave of absence and had gone abroad. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL: That is not quite correct.] Anyhow he did go abroad; I do not know when. On the 8th of October the funeral of the Dowager Duchess of Beaufort took place at Badminton. A constable was sent down by Mr. Monro because it was thought Lord Arthur Somerset would come there. I suppose it was thought desirable to give the Treasury one more opportunity of acting. ["Oh!"] An hon. Gentleman seems to question my facts. The constable reported

"I beg to report that, in accordance with instructions, I attended the funeral of the late Dowager Duchess of Beaufort, and saw Lord Arthur Somerset was present at the obsequies."

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Will the hon. Gentleman give the name of the constable?

MR LABOUCHERE: Luke Hanks, of the General Post Office. The Report Hanks made was sent to the Treasury, and no doubt the Home Secretary has a copy of it. I believe that a suggestion was made that action should be taken. The reply of the Treasury took the form of a direction to at once withdraw the constable. Finding no action was taken, Lord Arthur Somerset remained in England, and went to his clubs as if nothing had occurred. During this time inquiries had been made of the police and the Treasury by the commanding officer of Lord Arthur Somerset's regiment, and by a gentleman connected with the Household of the Prince of Wales, Lord Arthur Somerset himself being a member of that Household. The police refused to give any information in the matter, and about the middle of October the gentleman representing the Household of the Prince of Wales telegraphed to Lord Salisbury, asking for an interview with him.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Will the hon. Member give the gentleman's name?

MR LABOUCHERE: Sir Dighton Probyn. On the 18th of October this gentleman had an interview with Lord Salisbury. At the end of the conversation, Lord Salisbury said—I am not perfectly certain of the words—that a warrant would be obtained to-morrow or a warrant should be obtained immediately.

Mr. Labouchere

I think this fact was communicated to the commanding officer of Lord Arthur Somerset's regiment, and Lord Arthur Somerset then fled the country. I am not in the least complaining of the gentleman connected with the Household of the Prince of Wales nor of the commanding officer of Lord Arthur Somerset's regiment. In view of their position I can well understand the course they adopted. Probably they know the family of Lord A. Somerset, and they can hardly be blamed for desiring that his lordship should get out of the country to avoid a trial. I am not quite certain that if I had been in the same position as they were I should not have done as they did; but their position is very different from that of Lord Salisbury. The importance of the point here is why did Lord Salisbury interfere in the matter? What right had he to interfere? Was it the business of a Prime Minister and Foreign Secretary to mix himself up in such matters? But if he did intend, or know that a warrant was about to be issued, surely the last thing a man in his official position should have done was to communicate the fact to a friend of Lord A. Somerset's. The object, however, is perfectly clear. Lord Salisbury had had his hands forced. Public attention had been drawn to the matter; it became necessary to issue a warrant, and it was intended that a hint should be conveyed to Lord A. Somerset to get out of the jurisdiction of the law before the warrant could be served on him. But this is not all. Let us admit this to have been a mere indiscretion on the part of Lord Salisbury; but was any time lost in the issue of the writ? Was it issued immediately? No; the conversation with Lord Salisbury took place on the 18th of October, and the warrant was not issued until the 12th of November, in order that it might be absolutely certain that Lord A. Somerset had received the information that a warrant was going to be issued and to give him time to get out of the country. So palpable was this that when the warrant was issued it was perfectly well-known that he was out of the country. It was a mere brutum fulmen, and the police so regarded it. They took no trouble to look after Lord A. Somerset, because they knew he was out of England. I would ask in regard to the warrant what further evidence there was on the 18th October than there was when Lord A. Somerset was in England? What further evidence was there on the 12th November than was known on October 18? We know there was no further evidence. Why was not the warrant issued as soon as Lord Salisbury stated it was to be issued on October 18, and when Lord A. Somerset was in the country? Why was it put off until November 12? Perhaps the Attorney General when he speaks will tell us that. For my part, I think the reason is pretty clear. If the Committee are somewhat surprised at these transactions in which Lord Salisbury is concerned, they will be still more surprised when they learn what occurred. Lord A. Somerset was a major in one of her Majesty's regiments of Guards, and on the 9th of November it was announced in the Gazette that his resignation had been accepted. Now, this form of resignation is an honourable discharge. If an officer in the Army is not considered worthy of an honourable discharge, it is inserted in the Gazette that his services are dispensed with. Can anyone think that, if the man had been a mere Lieutenant Jones or a Captain Smith, this would have occurred? It is an insult to every officer in the Army and to every man in the country who is anxious that the Army should remain an honoured and an honourable profession. This is not all. It will be found on investigation that Lord A. Somerset, who is a fugitive from justice, is still a magistrate for two counties. He went to Constantinople, and showing, as he was able to do, that he had been allowed to honourably resign his position in the Army, and that he was a magistrate for two counties in England, he asked for some official position in the Court of the Sultan. By this time, public attention had been drawn to a certain extent to what was going on, and Ministers began to think they were getting into a mess. They were a little frightened at what might happen, and so they looked around for a Jonah, and they found him in the person of Mr. Newton, solicitor to Lord A. Somerset, and they prosecuted him for getting witnesses out of the way. I do not blame Mr. Newton; so far as I know, he only aided Lord Salisbury in defeating justice, but it seems to me that if Mr. Newton is prosecuted, Lord

Salisbury and several other gentlemen ought also to be prosecuted and charged under the same indictment. I can well understand that there might be an indisposition to bring scandals of this kind before the public, but it must be borne in mind that Ministers have no dispensing powers with regard to the English law, and I hold that they were utterly false to duty when they did not make every effort to bring to justice a man whom they had reasonable ground to believe was guilty of such an offence. It must not be forgotten what has taken place in regard to this case. Two men have been sent to prison, but they are poor. Their confidant was left alone. Their confidant had Attorney General, Solicitor General, and Heaven knows what at his back to take his part and to give him information and advice to get away as fast as he could. Hon. Members may remember that one of the charges brought against my hon. Friend the Member for Cork before the Special Commission was that he gave money to Byrne to aid him to escape from justice, and I should like to ask what difference there is between giving money to a man to escape and giving him information which enabled him to do so. But entirely apart from what I hold to be the criminality of Lord Salisbury there can be no doubt that Lord Salisbury at least acted very foolishly in the matter. He aggravated the scandal. Foreign newspapers took notice of the case, and they have represented this country as a nation of hypocrites, and made very strong and, I believe, in many cases unjust reflections on persons in high stations. It is the common talk in the workshops of this country respecting the case that the law is not fairly administered as between the rich man and the poor man, that justice is not fairly meted out between man and man, regardless of rank and social position, and thus great harm has been done by the course which has been adopted. We have heard a good deal lately about criminal conspiracy. What is this case but a criminal conspiracy by the very guardians of public morality and law, with the Prime Minister at their head, to defeat the ends of justice? Neither the upper classes nor the Treasury have any reason to thank Lord Salisbury for his action in the matter, for both have been considerable sufferers by it. Is it not a fact that during the time the matter was before the public the name of many a gentleman was insidiously and unjustly whispered about as being concerned in the scandals? I myself heard the names of several persons in high position hinted at and whispered about in connection with the case, and after what has occurred I feel it my duty to say that, so far as I know—and as the result of close inquiry I know as much about the case as any man—not one of those gentlemen whose names have been mentioned abroad and at the clubs was directly or indirectly in any sort of way connected with the scandals. In short, no name was spared, however high the position of the man who held it. I have seen the name of a gentleman of very high position mentioned in foreign newspapers in connection with the case, but having, as I have just said, looked very narrowly into the whole matter, I am absolutely certain that there is no justification for the calumny. In connection with this I may add that I know that a still more eminent gentleman, closely connected with the gentleman to whom I have alluded, has used all his efforts to have the fullest publicity given. I think that it is due to that eminent gentleman that the Government have at last been forced into the qualified action which has been taken against Lord A. Somerset. I think that this ought to be known. As I think all know, I myself took strong views upon the matter of Royal Grants, but I expressed my views openly, and I protest against the good name of any man, be he prince or peasant, being whispered and hinted away. I honour and respect the eminent gentleman to whom I have alluded for his action in this matter. I consider it wise and noble, and worthy of the great position he holds. However, I only allude to this in order to show how incalculable are the evils that might have arisen from this system which the Government has adopted of hushing up these matters. But the action of the Government, the guardians of public morality, does not affect individuals alone; it encourages persons of any social station to think that they may commit this sort of offence with absolute impunity. The statement of Constable Sladden is perfectly astounding, but I do not think it can be contradicted.

Mr. Labouchere

I think the Home Secretary can bear me out. A considerable number of years ago Sir E. Henderson sent a Report complaining of inaction, and no action was taken because the law made it almost impossible to convict. The Home Secretary will bear me out when I say that this offence has been on the increase of late, but every constable or inspector takes care not to arrest any cognate person, because they believe that by doing so they would make themselves marked men and be sent out to the suburbs. In the streets, in the music halls, you have these wretched creatures openly pursuing their avocation. They are known to the police, yet the police do nothing to stop this sort of thing. It is scandalous that such a state of things should exist in London. There is no capital where it exists more openly. This was not the case 10 years ago, and I ascribe the increase entirely to the immunity granted to the criminals. I quite agree that it is most undesirable on many accounts to parade these scandals in the public Press, but I maintain that it is far more undesirable that poor persons should be prosecuted, and cognate persons allowed impunity when they happen to be wealthy. These poor and wretched creatures live to minister to the vices of those in a superior station. Is there any man who will not feel indignant that boys employed in one of our public offices should be tempted into indecencies more gross than were ever committed under Louis XV.? Instead of making every effort to punish offences, as far as I can see every effort has been made to hush up the matter. I do not know what the defence of the Government may be, but I venture to advise them not to put up any lawyer with a brief in his hand, who will by special pleading and evasive chicanery defend this charge. [Cries of "Order!" and "Withdraw!"] Very well, then, I will say not by the same tactics as those pursued with regard to the Special Commission—that means the same thing to us on this side of the House. My first charge is that Lord Salisbury and others entered into a criminal conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice. I ask for a Committee to investigate this charge and allegation, and if it is granted I am perfectly willing to withdraw my Amendment, but I will not, and I do not think that many in this House will, be satisfied with a mere ex parte denial on behalf of the incriminated persons. If the Committee is not granted Lord Salisbury and the others stand condemned by their own Code of ethics. The hon. Member for Cork was charged with writing certain letters, and again and again hon. Gentlemen opposite said that he must be guilty because he had not courted an investigation. Mr. Walter was not a member of this House; I am. Mr. Walter had certain proofs, but he did not submit them; I have submitted my proofs. For my own part, I think I have already shown more of a prima facie case for an inquiry than there was simply because Pigott sold forged letters to the Times. If the Government refuse this investigation, either they admit their guilt or they have two Codes of ethics—one for an Irish leader and another for a Conservative leader. If the Government plead guilty I shall deem it my duty to divide the House, because I think that this House ought to disconnect itself from any condoning of abominable offences of this kind, and ought to stand up for the principle of equal justice between man and man. If they do not admit their guilt I shall divide, because a man cannot be Judge, jury, and defendant in his own case. If these charges, openly made in this House, are not in some way investigated a heavier blow will be dealt to the good name of the country and to the cause of law and order than anything that has been done for many and many a year. I appeal to the whole House, to hon. Members sitting on both sides, to support me in the action I have taken. I appeal to them, not as followers of this Ministry or of that, but on the broad ground that they are English gentlemen. I appeal to them because I know that they loathe these offences as much as I do, and I hope that they will stand by me in the only course that ought to be pursued in this matter, and the only course which will lead to the thorough and efficient prevention of such crimes.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,725,003, be granted for the said Services."—(Mr. Henry Labouchere.)

*(6.25.) SIR R. WEBSTER: Of all the occasions on which I have spoken in the House and of all the questions

I have heard raised since I have had the honour of being a Member of the House, nothing in my opinion has approached the importance of the occasion on the charge made by the hon. Member for Northampton to-night. He has charged the Prime Minister with being party to a criminal conspiracy to defeat the ends of justice, and that subordinate officials, whom he said must have known what was being done, were also parties to that conspiracy. The hon. Member has said that deliberate notice was given to enable an accused man to escape from justice, and said that it was the wish of those whom he charged that that person should not be brought to justice; and he has alleged that certain criminal proceedings were arranged by a corrupt bargain with the view of minor punishments being inflicted in order that other persons who might be implicated might escape. I think that the Committee will agree with me that these are charges of most disgraceful conduct if they are true, and more disgraceful charges if false, and it is strange that, with that semblance of fair play which the hon. Member has pretended to assume, though he knew that the person who now addresses the House must be one of the persons implicated in the so-called conspiracy, the hon. Member has endeavoured to discount what I may be going to say by describing it as only the chicanery of a lawyer. I do not think that my hon. and learned Friends the Members for South Hackney and Stockton will acquiesce in that view. The main sting of this charge is that Lord Salisbury on a given night in October, with the purpose of allowing Lord A. Somerset to escape, made a communication which was intended to be conveyed to him, and that on receiving that communication Lord A. Somerset fled. Before I sit down I shall demonstrate that there is not a shadow of foundation for that charge. But if the charge is true, is it just or is it right that it should be made in the presence of the man who can answer it, or behind his back?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I am not a peer.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: If the hon. Member has any prima facie case, any of the peers who are opposed to Lord Salisbury could ask the question in the House of Lords. Does the hon. Member mean to suggest that Lord Herschell, if he believed in such facts as the hon. Member for Northampton asserts that he believes, would not have thought it his duty to have brought them forward and enable Lord Salisbury to give an answer across the floor of the House of Lords? I am going to accept the responsibility for my own acts and state exactly what I have done. If there be anything in that spirit of fair play to which the hon. Member thought fit to refer at the conclusion of his remarks, it should have prompted those who appreciate a sense of justice to have made this charge where the answer could have been directly given by the person particularly affected by it. I hope the House will bear with me, for it may be that I shall have to address it at some length. It is absolutely essential I should deal with all the points raised one by one, and I am sure the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would rather I should trespass upon the time of the house too much than too little. We are dealing with infamous charges, and I will undertake to demonstrate that they are not true. The House must remember that these infamous charges are levelled against myself, the Treasury Solicitor, and possibly the Chief Commissioner of Police, though he seems for some reason or other to have been exculpated. But what is to me much more important is, it is suggested that members of my own profession, who have practised for years and whose names are well known, have also been mixed up in that foul conspiracy with their knowledge. It is not very easy for me to take this story exactly in the order I should like to take it, because the hon. Member has thought fit to break it up into a number of different cases, and has put before the House what he asserts about each of those cases. Perhaps the better course, therefore, for me to take will be to follow the order the hon. Member has found it convenient to adopt. If I were to do otherwise, I might possibly overlook some of the hon. Gentleman's statement. But first I wish to make one or two preliminary observations. At a date which does not substantially differ from that given by the hon. Member, and which we may take roughly to be about July 25—I do not say that is absolutely the earliest date, but some time in the middle of July, and certainly before July 25—the case was put in the hands of the Treasury Solicitor. From that time down to the present every step in the proceedings has been taken under my direction, and the hon. Member knows it, and therefore the House will appreciate what the hon. Member means by suggesting that no lawyer was to get up with a brief. That is the spirit of chivalry and fair play which animates the hon. Member. The first three cases are the Veck and Newlove case, the Hammond case, and the Somerset case, and, less important, the Newton case. It is, I must say, strange to my mind that the hon. Member for Northampton should have thought fit to introduce the Newton case into the discussion, seeing it is my unfortunate duty to have to represent the Crown in that prosecution, in which the defendant Newton is to be defended by the hon. and learned Member for South Hackney, I venture to think that knowing that, as he undoubtedly did from his speech, and as I shall show from other sources—

MR. LABOUCHERE: I did know it.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is somewhat strange he should have thought fit to express the opinion he did about that case. I pass from that. When I deal with the matter I shall contradict every statement the hon. Member made; now I want the House to follow me and appreciate what the Veck and Newlove charge is. The charge against Her Majesty's Government is that these cases were intended to be punished by light sentences; that it was arranged between the prosecuting and defending counsel, with the knowledge of the Treasury Solicitor, that the accused should have those light sentences as the price of silence; and that that corrupt bargain was made with the knowledge of those in authority. I think the House will agree that, if true, more infamous conduct was never charged against persons in authority. I am fortunately able to speak more than once in this debate, and if, by inadvertence, I omit to deal with any point, I hope I shall be reminded of it. The first information given by the Post Office was on the evening of July 5; that was the same day as that on which Hammond bolted. Certain statements respecting Veck in connection with the boys were placed before me some time in the month of July. The hon. Member has suggested that I either had instructions from some higher authority or gave instructions that no prosecution should take place.

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, I did not.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: In connection with the Somerset case the hon. Member said that most distinctly, but I desire to say that whatever case the statement may be intended to apply to there is not the slightest shadow of foundation for the suggestion. My sole wish has been that when the evidence was sufficient to put a man on his trial he should at once be brought before a Court of justice, and there has been no distinction or difference whatever between one person and another. I will state exactly what did happen. Up to the middle of August, the evidence against Veck was not complete. I think the House will agree that anybody who puts forward these charges ought to be practically certain he can prove them, I cannot imagine anything worse than that a man should be put on his trial on such a charge on the mere chance of getting a conviction on some slight evidence. For it is perfectly well known that if these charges are once made, however much a man may clear himself, there are people foolish and wicked enough still to believe there is some truth in them. I do not hesitate to say that the sole consideration operating on my mind was whether there was or was not sufficient corroborative testimony. Up to the middle of August there was not sufficient evidence to put process in force against Veck. I may say, by the way, there was amply sufficient evidence against Newlove and Hammond, and the warrants were issued on the 7th.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I never raised this point. I simply stated as a hard matter of fact that Veck was arrested on the 20th August.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is absolutely necessary the whole story should be told, for the hon. Member has said that when these men were put on their trial on the 18th September they were lightly sentenced in consideration of pleading guilty and disclosing no other person's name. The warrant was issued as soon as the evidence in our hands was, in my opinion, sufficient. There was some difficulty in finding Veck, but he was arrested on August 20th, committed for trial on September 11th, and pleaded guilty on the 18th. Now I come to the gravamen of the charge. Every particle of evidence against Veck came under my immediate notice, and I was represented by Mr. Poland, Q.C., and Mr. Ivory. I do hope the hon. and learned Member for Hackney will speak in this debate. No? I hope some hon. and learned Member of this House will bear me out in what I am saying with regard to these gentlemen. I want to know by whom this accusation is going to be supported. If any hon. Members opposite, who belong to my profession, speaks in this debate I do hope they will express their opinion of one—I may say both—of those gentlemen who represented the Crown in that prosecution, and say what they think of Mr. Poland, who has lived all his life at the Bar, and is perfectly well-known for his high honour and standing in the profession. The prisoners were defended by Mr. Gill and Mr. C. W. Mathews. The house has heard something about whispers. Perhaps the hon. Member for Northampton has had something to do with some whispers circulated in connection with this case. Whether he has or not, the knowledge that the hon. Member was going to bring this charge has enabled me to obtain from Mr. Poland and from Mr. Ivory a written statement with regard to this particular matter. I do not believe there is a Member of this House who will suggest that what I am about to read, signed by Mr. Poland, is other than the strict and literal truth in the matter. The learned counsel says this:—

“Mr. Ivory, my junior, was informed by Mr. Gill, who defended Newlove, or by Mr. Mathews, who defended Veck, that the prisoners intended to plead guilty, and that the case would be disposed of in the course of the day. I went to the Old Bailey between 3 and 4 o'clock and went into Court shortly before 4, that being the time when pleas of guilty are taken, when convenient. I addressed the Recorder, and Mr. Gill and Mr. Mathews addressed him also. I wish to say that I neither directly nor indirectly made any arrangement with the prisoners' counsel as to what counts the prisoners should plead guilty to, and that there was no undertaking of any kind, either expressed or implied, as to what should be done by me or by the prisoners' counsel.”

That is, I think, sufficiently categorical. I have here also the shorthand note of what Mr. Poland said before the Recorder. If there had been any such arrangement as was suggested by the hon. Member I must have known of it. Does he still insist that there was an arrangement?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I still state, Sir, that there was an understanding beforehand as to the pleas of guilty. I have never stated that it was agreed that the prisoners should plead guilty and get short sentences provided that they did not mention any names. That is not how things are done. One counsel says to the other, "Don't you think the prisoners had better plead guilty?" and the other replies, "Well, what do you think?" And then the first says, "Well, we will see what we can do," and so on. The Attorney General has appealed to the lawyers on this side. I also will make an appeal to them. Will any lawyer who has practised get up and tell me that arrangements are not frequently made by which it is agreed that if the accused pleads guilty the prosecuting counsel will try and get him a light sentence?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Now, I understood the hon. Member to say that he had it from a credible informant that the arrangement which he described was come to between the prosecuting counsel and the counsel for the prisoners. Will the hon. Member now say who his credible informant is?

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, Sir, I will not—for the same reason which the Chief Secretary for Ireland so often gives us—he would be a marked man.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am surprised that the hon. Member, having now heard me state on behalf of the counsel engaged in the case that this wicked and corrupt bargain was not made by them, withholds the name of his credible informant. But I feel as certain as I am of the fact of my standing here that it is impossible for the hon. Member to give the name of any credible person who will come forward and state that this wicked arrangement was made. The next allegation made by the hon. Member was that the case was called on at a late and inconvenient hour when the reporters were not present.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I was informed of that fact by a learned counsel who was present.

Sir R. Webster

*SIR R. WEBSTER: At the Old Bailey pleas are always taken either at 4 o'clock or at the beginning of the day's work. Mr. Poland is of opinion, an opinion which I entirely share, that no good is done by reporting cases of this description, and it is greatly to the credit of the reporters of the Press that they almost invariably refrain from reporting them. But I have Mr. Poland's assurance in writing that he took no steps to have the Court cleared or to prevent the proceedings from being reported in the newspapers. When he began his speech there happened to be a woman in Court, and the Recorder of his own motion ordered her to leave. Mr. Poland says, "I was specially careful to do nothing in this case out of the usual and ordinary course." Now I come to the hon. Member's charges, based on the allegation that the sentence was light. Veck pleaded guilty to 13 counts of the indictment. There was no evidence of felony in the case at all, and Veck was prosecuted for misdemeanour under the section of the Criminal Law Amendment Act. Newlove was indicted for assault with intent to commit sodomy, as well as for offences against the Act. He did not plead guilty to the graver charge, and I was satisfied that there was no evidence to go to the jury on the grave charge, and it was on my responsibility, and mine alone, that the count against Newlove for the more serious offence was not pressed. The House must bear in mind that by pleading guilty these prisoners rendered themselves liable to more than two years' imprisonment. Cumulative sentences can be inflicted under the Act and the Recorder could have passed a much higher sentence if he had thought fit to do so. I say distinctly that neither directly nor indirectly was there any communication with the Recorder on behalf of the Government, or, as far as I know, by any living person with reference to the sentence passed upon these men. It is not my business to justify that sentence. It may not have been sufficient; I think myself that it might have been severer; but the question of insufficiency is a matter affecting the Recorder only. Does the hon. Member for Northampton intend to charge a Judge like the Recorder of London with being a party to this criminal conspiracy? Unless the hon. Member admits that the sentence was a sentence passed by the Recorder in the exercise of his discretion, he must contend that the Recorder also was a party to the conspiracy, and for some motive was willing to inflict a lighter sentence than should have been passed. The hon. Member affirms that the real object of the conspiracy which he alleges existed was to hush the matter up. Well, I have answered the hon. Member by meeting every assertion which the hon. Member has made respecting Veck and Newlove.

MR. LABOUCHERE: There is one point which the hon. and learned Member has not dealt with. I said that I did not know whether it was suggested to the Recorder that he should pass a light sentence, or whether the depositions showing the gross iniquity of Veck and Newlove were not submitted to the learned Judge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: All the depositions went before the learned Recorder as a matter of course. There is not a shadow of foundation for saying that anything but the ordinary course of justice was pursued in this case. The hon. Member has suggested that the real object of passing these sentences was to hush the matter up, and that these prosecutions would not have taken place but for the action of the Postmaster General. All I can say is that when the statement respecting Veck and Newlove came before me, I, and I alone, exercised my judgment, taking counsel, however, with those whose opinion in criminal matters is of the highest value. I think, Sir, I have proved to the House how unfounded the hon. Member's charges are, and now I come to the allegation respecting Hammond. It is an allegation which I confess has filled me with astonishment. The hon. Member says that Hammond ought to have been watched by the police, and that the Postmaster General, or the Secretary to the Post Office, desired that he should be prosecuted, but that the police and the Treasury Solicitor and others desired that he should escape. As a matter of fact no information of any kind was given to the police until the afternoon of July 5, and Hammond left the country on the morning of that day. I lay no blame upon the Post Office for not taking steps. We know perfectly well that by the Criminal Law we are not entitled to arrest a man without a warrant unless he is caught in the commission of crime.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): How about the Statute of Edward III.? [Laughter.]

*SIR R. WEBSTER: This case is far too serious to be made the subject of laughter, and I do not know whether right hon. Gentlemen opposite think I ought to be interrupted in this manner. Hammond left on the morning of the 5th of July; and, notwithstanding the insinuations and statements of the hon. Member, from that moment Hammond was beyond the reach of the law. The hon. Gentleman has suggested that Hammond could have been extradited if the Foreign Office had wished it to be done. He had also suggested that arrangements could have been made whereby Hammond might have been put aboard an English steamer and so arrested. All I can say, and I carefully confine myself to what I know, and the Postmaster General can confirm me, is that every step was taken to bring the arrest about. From the beginning we have been extremely anxious to get hold of Hammond; indeed, ever since the issue of the warrant in July, 1889. As far as I know, no single act was done, directly or indirectly, to prevent Hammond from being brought to justice as quickly as possible. The hon. Member for Northampton has said that a letter came on the 25th of July from Lord Salisbury at the Foreign Office saying that Hammond could not be extradited. Will the hon. Gentleman give his authority for that statement? [Mr. LABOUCHERE shook his head.] Then, has it come to this, that without any warrant at all such charges can be made across the floor of this House? As a matter of fact, the reply came from one of the Official Secretaries of the Foreign Office, who wrote the letter, it being a matter of regular routine business, and nothing being known about the case except that there was no evidence of any crime on which Hammond could have been extradited. I will not go into the strictly legal aspect of the question, as the authorities did not regard it in that light. They were all extremely anxious to obtain the extradition. The only ground on which it could have been demanded was aggravated or indecent assault; and, unfortunately, in the case of Hammond all the boys consented and were above the protected age. I again distinctly repeat that, with reference to extra-legal extradition, a step was taken to bring Hammond to justice. Hammond fled to Belgium. I understood the hon. Member for Northampton to suggest that it was with the cognisance of the Government.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Oh, no.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am glad to have that withdrawal. Certainly an expression fell from the hon. Gentleman which made me come to the conclusion that the Government was distinctly charged with getting Hammond away, first to Paris and then to Belgium. If the charge be withdrawn, the House will draw its conclusions with reference to some of the other charges. I took down the hon. Member's words, which were to the effect that the Government could have induced the French Government to expel Hammond to an English ship; and that they hunted the man from France to Belgium, and the Government wanted to send the man away. I would ask the hon. Member, if he is bringing forward his accusation from a sense of justice, and desires to make this indictment because the interests of public justice require it, whether he will tell the House whose authority he had for saying that the Government wished to send Hammond away? There is not one scrap of evidence before me that the Government, directly or indirectly, took any step to prevent Hammond from being brought to justice. On the contrary, every act is in the other direction. But the hon. Gentleman said that, owing to the action of the police—and supposedly he meant the action of the police under directions—and the action of the Government, a poor, miserable boy was abstracted from his parents and sent away to America. What did the hon. Gentleman mean by suggesting that this was done by the action of the Government? Are such charges to be bandied about on the mere ipse dixit of any hon. Gentleman who chooses to believe any clap-trap he may hear? If there were the slightest warrant for this charge the hon. Gentleman would be amply protected for any statement made in the House. I challenge the hon. Gentleman to give the name of his informant. As to the circumstances under which Hammond did go to America my own mouth is closed. I should be perfectly willing, and some day I shall be allowed, to state them. The hon. and learned Gentleman, the Member for South Hackney knows them as well as I do.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I know nothing at all about them.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. and learned Gentleman's memory misleads him. He appeared for Newton on the application to remove the case into the Queen's Bench; and on that occasion all the depositions and statements of Newton were brought up, and Newton's affidavit, in which he stated that he had been a party to getting Hammond to go away on account of the blackmail he was levying on people in England.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: I am sorry that my name is being brought into the matter in this way, especially as I intimated to the hon. and learned Gentleman early in the debate that I should take no part in it, for reasons which it is unnecessary to state to the House. I can assure the Attorney General that, although I may have seen some general statements, I had no connection with the case which required me in any way to examine them.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Of course, I accept the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman, and withdraw my remark. I would say, however, that I am precluded from stating the facts of the case, because it is sub judice, and I have to be the prosecuting counsel against Newton. On the Hammond case I think I have dealt with every fact mentioned by the hon. Gentleman; but if he will repeat any charge that has been overlooked, I will meet it subsequently. Then, as to what must be supposed to be the main charge against Lord Salisbury—the charge that Lord Salisbury connived at Lord Arthur Somerset getting away. This case stands on a different footing. I have had for many months upon my mind the necessity of considering, with the greatest anxiety, whether there was sufficient corroborative evidence against Lord A. Somerset or not. It was not until the 5th or 6th of November that I gave directions, after careful consideration, that the warrant should be issued. It is stated that this was done in consequence of some higher power preventing, for fear of revelations, a proceeding which was right, and amply justified. It is quite true that about the 25th July statements had been made respecting Lord A. Somerset, an attempt at identification was made, and I say so advisedly. But it was not at Knightsbridge, but in Piccadilly. I cannot give further facts, because the case may be further tried. On what grounds can it be suggested that, when Lord A. Somerset may come back and take his trial, the House is to prejudice the case? I should be guilty of a gross breach of duty if I were to suppose the information correct before there has been any cross-examination. The evidence of identification was unsatisfactory. The two witnesses did not agree, and there was some doubt whether they had not by conversation afterwards come to some agreement. The person who conducted the investigation moreover did not know Lord A. Somerset. I will now make a statement of which I am not ashamed, and for which I do not think the House will condemn me. I did not altogether act upon my own judgment in such a matter. I have permission to say that in the month of August, before Veck was arrested, I consulted the Lord Chancellor. I will not appeal any more to lawyers; but will state that there was no man whose career at the Bar has been more honourable than that of the present Lord Chancellor. There is no man of whom it can be said with less justice that he has ever interfered with the course of justice, and there is no greater criminal lawyer living. After the most careful consideration and examination of the whole case, the Lord Chancellor came distinctly to the conclusion that there was not such corroboration as would justify any man being put upon his trial. The same course exactly was pursued in the cases of Veck and Lord A. Somerset, both cases being submitted to the Lord Chancellor. Subsequently further evidence came up about Veck, and he was placed upon his trial. When Veck was arrested some documents were found upon him, and some of them led the authorities, about the 24th of August, to find out the boy Allies at Sudbury. The boy Allies made a statement which may be said to have given corroboration of the evidence against Lord A. Somerset. But we were in this difficult position. Some communication, which, as far as we could trace, did not come from Lord Arthur Somerset, was made to this boy the night before he was seen and the document was destroyed. The hon. Member suggests that the postal orders coming from Knightsbridge must be presumed to have come from Lord Arthur Somerset; but we were not able to identify them as having come from Lord Arthur Somerset. This was about the middle of September, and during the trial of Newlove. All the statements were presented to me; and knowing that I had previously had the benefit of the advice of the Lord Chancellor, I took upon myself the responsibility of sending the whole of the statements and of asking his advice. I thought that the matter was so serious that I took a step of which I am not ashamed. I asked Mr. Poland, who had been in the case of Newlove and Veck, to write a letter to the Lord Chancellor stating what his views were on the evidence. I did not see that letter until after it had been sent, nor had I any part in the preparation of it. It was a letter covering more than a sheet of foolscap, containing a most careful analysis of the evidence, and examining the considerations which bore on the duty of prosecuting or not. I received a communication by telegraph, and subsequently a letter from the Lord Chancellor, saying that, having gone carefully through the matter, he was of opinion that the corroborative evidence was wholly insufficient. These are facts which can be tested by any hon. Member, and can anyone suggest that such conduct could have been pursued by men in league with a criminal conspiracy? Can anyone suggest that I, not acting upon my own opinion and taking the opinion of wiser men than myself, ought to be ashamed of having taken the course which I did? If it had been a criminal conspiracy should I have taken Mr. Poland into my confidence and have asked him to write independently a letter to the Lord Chancellor? I am aware that acts of mine have been severely criticised in this House; but I did not think that any opponent of mine opposite was so hostile as to believe that I was being party to a criminal conspiracy, or had any lot or part in such matter. Now, Mr. Courtney, so the matter rested until the end of September; and now I come to the extraordinary allegations made by the hon. Member respecting Lord Salisbury in October. The hon. Member stated categorically that the Law Officers did not advise a prosecution. If by that the hon. Gentleman means that I, as Attorney General, did not direct a prosecution, he is perfectly right; but if the hon. Gentleman means that I corruptly and improperly declined to order a prosecution because of an arrangement that Lord Arthur Somerset should not be brought to justice, then I have to say that it is absolutely wrong, and there is no shadow of foundation for the statement. Then the hon. Gentleman put this extraordinary question to me—

“I wish to ask whether the questions that were put to the witnesses at the Treasury were arranged by the Attorney General?”

What is the insinuation contained in that? The hon. Member asserts that those questions were not intended to elicit the real facts; the insinuation is that in the case of certain persons giving information to the Treasury I, as Attorney General, suggested that certain questions should be put to them, and certain others not be put to them in order not to elicit the facts. There is not a shadow of foundation for the statement.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I was speaking of the questions in the Court of the police magistrate.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The questions asked before the police magistrate only relate to Veck and Newlove. Does the hon. Member suggest that, on the case against Newlove, and I being of opinion that there was no sufficient ground for criminating other persons, questions ought to have been asked by means of a side-wind, so to speak, in order to elicit a charge against other persons? It would have been most discreditable conduct on the part of the person charged with the prosecution of Newlove and Veck to have put questions so as to bring out evidence against Lord Arthur Somerset or any other person. Questions were put by Mr. Avory in order to establish the guilt of Veck and Newlove; but I understand the hon. Gentleman to make a much more serious allegation, that the Attorney General arranged the questions which were to be put either by Mr. Avory or by the Treasury solicitor. Not one word ever passed between me and

Sir R. Webster

Mr. Avory and the Treasury solicitor as to the questions to be put. The statements were taken and examined in the ordinary way. Then the hon. Member said that Hanks went down to Badminton and received directions to withdraw. Will the hon. Gentleman tell the House his authority for that? As far as I know, there is not the slightest foundation for the statement; because I myself gave personally directions to the Chief Commissioner of Police, among others, that an inquiry should be prosecuted, in order to bring all the parties who were really implicated to justice. I, therefore, ask again who was the person who informed the hon. Member that Hanks was directed to withdraw? Now, I come to the very grave charge which the hon. Member makes respecting the supposed communication between Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn, and the allegations founded thereon. Now, the hon. Member was very careful, for I watched him most closely, in making this charge. Does the hon. Member suggest that Sir Dighton Probyn has given him a version of the conversation? From whom did the hon. Member get that statement? Was it the gossip of the clubs?

MR. LABOUCHERE: The hon. Gentleman asks me a question, and I will offer him this. I will write down the name of the person from whom I received it, and then I will leave it to the hon. Gentleman to read it out to the House or not.

MR. MAC NEILL: Accept the challenge.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member may or may not write the name down; but my question is “Yes” or “No;” did the hon. Gentleman get the statement from Sir Dighton Probyn? There are two parties to this interview. I have been able to communicate directly with one of them; but I have not been able to communicate with the other. But I am able to state exactly what did happen at the supposed interview. The statement is this: that, at a place not named, Sir Dighton Probyn, having telegraphed to see the Prime Minister, had a conversation with him, the exact purport of which is not stated. But at that interview Sir Dighton Probyn was told by the Prime Minister that he would issue the warrant “to-morrow or immediately," and that that communication was intended to be delivered by Sir Dighton Probyn to Lord Arthur Somerset. Mr. Courtney, the best answer to that is to give the simple statement of Lord Salisbury, which cannot be made otherwise than through me, in consequence of the course which the hon. Member has thought fit to pursue. The statement was very simple and straightforward, and I think the House will be able to judge whether, after a fair recital of the words, the story is likely to be true. Sir Dighton Probyn did see Lord Salisbury on a date, which I cannot fix, but it was the date upon which Lord Arthur Somerset fled from London. It was the evening of the day on which Lord Arthur Somerset disappeared. Sir Dighton Probyn saw Lord Salisbury, and asked him whether there was any truth in the imputations made in certain newspapers against certain persons whom he named. Lord Salisbury said that, as far as he knew, there was not a vestige of evidence against any of those persons except one, and in his case the evidence of identity was not he believed. in the judgment of the Law Advisers of the Crown, sufficient. Whether Lord Salisbury said that or not, hon. Members can, of course, form their own opinion; but it is much more probable that Lord Salisbury would have said something which was in accordance with truth than that which was contrary to the fact. The statement made by the hon. Member is that some person told him that Lord Salisbury said the warrant would be issued "to-morrow or immediately." As a matter of fact, I can state, from my own personal knowledge, that it was not determined to issue the warrant, and my directions were not given until the 7th or 8th of November. I cannot fix the exact date, because I cannot remember how long it took to prepare the depositions. But now I am glad to be able—for I believe the House want to know the facts—to negative the other statement, though I have not been able to check the statement as to the supposed conversation. I cannot imagine a more simple and straightforward story than that which I am enabled to make. Sir Dighton Probyn came back from the interview with Lord Salisbury; he never saw Lord Arthur Somerset again, and he never, directly or indirectly, communicated with him through any person. Nobody was more surprised than Sir Dighton Probyn that Lord Arthur Somerset had gone, for up to that moment he believed emphatically in the innocence of Lord Arthur Somerset. I assert that there is no foundation whatever for the statement that Lord Salisbury stated that a warrant was going to be issued "to-morrow or immediately."

MR. LABOUCHERE: Does he deny it?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The hon. Member says "does he deny it?" Never until to-night has he stated what the words were. But I ask whether it is possible to reconcile the alleged story with the statement I have read in Lord Salisbury's own words?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then he does not deny it?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I would not notice such an unjust observation and criticism upon the simple story I have told of this matter. The hon. Member knows that Lord Salisbury has denied it in the most straightforward manner by stating what actually did take place. If this kind of argument is to be used, why has not the hon. Member in common fairness allowed the question to be put across the floor of the House of Lords "Did that conversation take place?"

MR. LABOUCHERE: I will tell the hon. and learned Gentleman. I have not got Lords in my pocket.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No; the hon. Member has not got Lords in his pocket to do such dirty work as that. The hon. Member might have put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury. Over and over again questions have been asked in this House as to whether Lord Salisbury has made such and such a statement. The hon. Member comes down to the House and makes an allegation without taking the slightest means of verifying it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: How do you know that?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Because if he had a scrap of evidence he would be only too glad to produce it. Mr. Courtney, the statement is so absurd that—

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not want to interrupt the hon. and learned Gentleman, but he said he would take this piece of paper from me with the name on it. I will leave him to read it out to the House or not, as he likes. Will the hon. and learned Gentleman take it. [Here the hon. Member held out a small piece of paper.]

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I insist upon putting the question which I am entitled to put. Does the hon. Gentleman say he got the statement from Sir Dighton Probyn? Will he answer that question or not?

MR. LABOUCHERE: Look at the paper.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am entitled to continue my speech. Nobody is entitled to make such a charge as this on hearsay evidence.

MR. LABOUCHERE: It is not hearsay evidence.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: This I assert, that Lord Salisbury does distinctly deny that he ever said one single word about a warrant being issued, or directly or indirectly, conveyed anything of the kind. In this particular matter, I have only one more fact to discuss. The matter was most carefully considered, and I again saw the Lord Chancellor, and, not being convinced altogether, the Lord Chancellor told me I should act in the matter on my own responsibility.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): Which matter?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The matter I am dealing with—that of Lord Arthur Somerset. That was about the 1st or 2nd of November. I then gave directions that the warrant should be issued. I have been occupied with this matter for a long time, and I say that a more infamous charge than that made by the hon. Member was never brought, without a shadow of foundation. I hope and believe there are many on the other side of the House, who, however bitter their Party feeling, will not by their vote support such an accusation as that which has been levelled by the hon. Member for Northampton. The hon. Member has said that when Lord A. Somerset went to Constantinople he applied to the Sultan for an appointment. I know absolutely nothing about it. I do not suppose the hon. Member can know anything except some newspaper rumour that has come home, but in any event, it has nothing to do with the case, and was only introduced, I suppose, as a matter of prejudice. The last charge made is that Newton was made a scapegoat. I am not sure that I am justified in saying what I am about to say; but I suppose I must do so in consequence of the suggestion that has been made. The suggestion of prosecuting Newton was started as early as September or October, when we had reason to believe that he was doing that which was subsequently stated on oath. So far from making the man a scapegoat, I considered whether the evidence was sufficient, and I came to the conclusion that it was not sufficient to sustain the charge. I may be right or wrong, but nobody in my position can approach such questions otherwise than with a great feeling of responsibility; and I have been actuated throughout the whole affair by the determination, from which I never swerved, that, be he high or low, if there was evidence, the man should be prosecuted; but that I would not subject a man to these horrible accusations on the whispers which come from clubs or the paragraphs which are inserted in newspapers. I believe I have now referred to all the allegations made by the hon. Member. I thought the hon. Member would have given some authority for the statement that the policy of Her Majesty's Government has been that distinguished persons are allowed to go about committing these crimes with impunity, but that poor persons are hauled up. If there were any justification for such an allegation, why, in the name of every instinct of fair-play, did not the hon. Member give us the time at which he says some Minister has directly or indirectly controlled the action of the Criminal Law? It is a mistake to suppose that the Director of Public Prosecutions acts under the direction of the Home Secretary. The rule is that the action of the Public Prosecutor should in all matters, including the instruction of counsel, be subject to the Attorney General, and during the time I have had the honour of holding my present office I have had, practically speaking, in all such cases the evidence before me. If there were any attempt to prevent justice being done it must have been known to me; and I repeat that there is not a shadow of foundation for the charge which the hon. Member has thought fit to bring. This is not an occasion on which, if I were capable of doing so, I should indulge in eloquent denunciation of the hon. Member's conduct. I leave it to those who have heard the hon. Member's accusation and to those who have heard my statement and know his reputation to judge on which side truth lies. I can well understand that hon. Members, who, I am aware, regard my conduct in other respects in an unfriendly manner, have thought fit to suggest that my statement is unworthy of credit. [Home Rule Cheers.] I am quite willing to submit that to the judgment of the House. This I will say: examination was conducted step by step into the conduct of the persons in this matter; and though it may be easy to say that in the possible knowledge of guilt other steps might have been taken, yet in regard to the accusation made against Lord Salisbury and those connected with him that they have interfered with the course of justice, there is not the slightest foundation in any way for the allegations which the hon. Member has put forward.

(7.45.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I will deal first with Lord Salisbury. The hon. and learned Gentleman says that Lord Salisbury did not say anything about a warrant, because he told him he said something about something else.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: Will the hon. Member pardon me? I stated distinctly that Lord Salisbury denied the allegation about the warrant. I had not his words at that moment before me. They are distinct. Lord Salisbury says:—"I said nothing whatever about the date of the issue of the warrant."

MR. LABOUCHERE: I was not certain as to the exact word—whether it was "soon" or "next day." The hon. Gentleman thought he had proved his case by asking, from whom did you get this information? What did I offer? I offered to write down the name of the gentleman, and to submit it to the hon. and learned Gentleman, and if he, having seen the name, liked to read it to the House he was at full liberty to do so. [Ministerial cries of "Read it yourself."] I leave it to the hon. and learned Gentleman. The hon. and learned Gentleman at first appeared to accept the proposal, but he thought better of it afterwards. I can perfectly well understand why the hon. and learned Gentleman did not accept the proposal. I am obliged to speak frankly and truly in this matter. I assert, if I am obliged to do it, that I do not believe Lord Salisbury.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is aware that there is a certain courtesy due from Members of this House to the Members of the other House. It would be intolerable for an hon. Member to use that language of a Member of this House, and he cannot be permitted to use it of a Member of the other House.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Sir, I repeat it.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call on the hon. Member to withdraw the expression.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I decline, Sir, to withdraw. [Cries of "Name."]

THE CHAIRMAN: I shall have to exercise the authority vested in me if the hon. Member declines to obey my ruling. Does the hon. Member withdraw?

MR. LABOUCHERE: No, Sir.

(7.48.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: As a matter of order, Sir, I wish to ask whether there is any precedent for a Member of this House being called upon to withdraw a statement he had made with regard to a Member of the other House; and if there be any precedent—in the case of an hon. Member of this House refusing to withdraw such a statement—for the Presiding Officer resorting to the pains and penalties which he is authorised to enforce. I will call your attention to the fact that on one occasion a statement was made by the Marquess of Salisbury, after the departure and suicide of Pigott, that certain letters, which are now acknowledged to be forgeries, attributed to the hon. Member for Cork, were really not forgeries. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland happened to make some allusion which enabled me to say something with regard to both him and the Marquess of Salisbury. You, Sir, called upon me to withdraw the observation, which was practically similar, as to the Chief Secretary, because he was a Member of this House. I repeated the observation with regard to the Marquess of Salisbury, and you did not call upon me to withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: There is nothing in the objection of the hon. Member. I again ask the hon. Member for Northampton whether he is about to obey the direction I have given him to withdraw?

MR. LABOUCHERE: With all due respect to you, Sir, I must decline to withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: Then I name you, Mr. Henry Labouchere.

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): It is my duty to move that Mr. Henry Labouchere be suspended from the service of the House.

Mr. HENRY LABOUCHERE, Member for Northampton, having been named by the Chairman as disregarding the authority of the Chair:—

(7.50.) Motion made, and Question put, "That Mr. Henry Labouchere be suspended from the service of the House:—The Committee divided:—Ayes 177; Noes 96.—(Div. List, No. 15.)

Whereupon Mr. Chairman left the Chair in order to report the said Resolution to the House.

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. COURTNEY reported that Mr. Henry Labouchere had been named by him to the Committee as disregarding the authority of the Chair, and that the Committee had resolved that Mr. Henry Labouchere be suspended from the service of the House.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I rise to order. I wish to ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether it is possible to obtain your ruling now with reference to a certain ruling of the Chairman from the Chair, in consequence of which ruling the Motion now reported to you was carried?

*MR. SPEAKER: That is not in order now.

Question put, "That Mr. Henry Labouchere be suspended from the service of this House."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I understand, Mr. Speaker, that a division has not been challenged, you having declared that "the Noes have it."

*MR. SPEAKER: A division was challenged, and I ordered strangers to withdraw.

(8.0.) The House divided:—Ayes 178; Noes 97.—(Div. List, No. 16.)

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman will withdraw.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg, Sir, to withdraw, expressing at the same time my regret that my conscience would not allow me to say I believed Lord Salisbury.

The hon. Member withdrew accordingly.

SUPPLY again considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Question again proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,725,003, be granted for the said Services."

(8.10.) MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I am sure you will not misunderstand me, Mr. Courtney, when I say I feel bound at once to rise in consequence of what has happened, and to move to report Progress. I understand I am at liberty to speak only to the matter of such Motion, and if I inadvertently do more I shall be glad to be called to order. I make this Motion specifically on the ground that there has been an infringement of the liberty of debate. An ancient privilege of this House, liberty of debate, has been infringed, when an hon. Member of this House has been expelled for declaring that he did not believe the word of an individual who happened to be a Member of the other House of Parliament. The word so challenged by my hon. Friend was not uttered in that House; was not uttered in his character of a Member of that House; was not uttered even in his character of an official of this country; but it was communicated to this House by a Member of the Government as a statement made by a private person, and it was communicated to him and communicated to the House in a matter affecting his official conduct. I understand that the rule of courtesy and comity which prevails between the two Houses extends to individual Members of either House in their capacity as such Members. But I do not understand that the Rules of this House require us to observe the rule of courtesy where the action concerned is the action of a private Member of the other House, not as a Member of that House, but as a private individual. Incidentally and collaterally to that, I beg the Committee to observe that at this moment, in consequence of what has taken place, we are deprived of our leader in this debate, and to allow the debate to go on under these circumstances would manifestly be futile. Our liberties have been invaded by your ruling, Mr. Courtney. On that general ground, Sir, which I allege with the most perfect respect for yourself in your capacity as Chairman of Committee, and also on the particular ground that the continuance of this debate has become an impossibility, I beg now to move that you do report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. E. Robertson.)

(8.14.) THE CHAIRMAN: I did not interrupt the hon. Member in his speech; but I must point out that to discuss my ruling on the Motion to report Progress is irregular. If the hon. Member wishes to challenge or arraign my ruling the proper way to do so is by Motion with the Speaker in the Chair. The second contention of the hon. Gentleman is, of course, perfectly relevant to the Motion.

(8.15.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 97; Noes 168.—(Div. List, No. 17.)

(8.37.) MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-on-Tyne): Mr. Courtney, my hon. Friend the Member for Dundee, who made the Motion upon which we have just divided, gave two reasons for that Motion. You then, Sir, from the Chair told us that, so far as one of those reasons was concerned—namely, that on the questioning of your ruling—the proper course was to arraign that ruling when the Speaker was in the Chair to take a division in a full House upon that subject. I understand, Mr. Courtney, that it is the intention of some of my hon. Friends behind me to raise the question of your ruling, and on the proper occasion I shall support them. So far as the second ground is concerned, I think it is felt that the absence of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton is a good reason why we should not continue a debate in which he has not completed his answer. I therefore would suggest to my hon. Friends that we should now leave the hon. Member for Northampton's proposal, and resume the discussion on some occasion when he shall be present, and that we should proceed with the other business before the Committee. So far as the debate has gone, it seems to me that my hon. Friend has done a good service in raising a subject around which a great cloud of rumour and mystery has gathered; and I think I am bound to say that the speech of the hon. and learned Attorney General, although there were in it some gaps which may, on some future occasion, be criticised—I think the effect of that speech will, undoubtedly, be to dissipate most of those rumours. I do not know what happens to the Motion of my hon. Friend; but, at all events, I think the Committee will be well advised if this particular discussion is allowed for the present to drop, to be resumed at some time when the Mover is present.

*(8.40.) MR. W. H. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has only done what we should have expected from him when he said the speech of the Attorney General had dispelled those mists that had gathered round this painful question; but I must remind him and the Committee that it will be impossible for us to allow the question to drop without a division on the proposal which the hon. Member for Northampton has raised. The Government cannot allow a charge of this kind to hang round the Prime Minister for an indefinite period, until the hon. Member for Northampton is able to return to his place. The Motion is in charge of the Committee, and must be disposed of by the Committee. If the hon. Gentleman is so ill-advised as to return to the charge at a future period he may do so; but we must challenge a decision from the Committee now that we have had the charges, and that which we claim to be a complete and absolute refutation from the Attorney General of one of the most odious charges that could, by any possibility, be brought against a Minister of the Crown.

(8.42.) MR. E. ROBERTSON: Without making any admission whatever as to the effect of the speech of the Attorney General, I refuse to accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman to take a division now. A division now, without further debate, would be a mere farce, and can have no effect whatever on the character of Lord Salisbury, or as indicating the feeling of the House in regard to his action. We have not the materials for a decision; many matters have been left unexplained. If a division is forced, I shall take no part in it.

*(8.43.) MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): The Debate upon which we are now engaged, if ended by a division under present circumstances, will compel an expression of opinion inside and outside the House which I think would be much to be regretted. A statement has been made by the Attorney General contradicting several allegations made by my hon. Colleague, one of them especially dependent on a matter of fact upon which a Member of the other House has also made a statement. I take it, Sir, that in accordance with your ruling it is not possible, within the bounds of Parliamentary usage, for one Member of this House to express his disbelief of a statement made by another Member of this House. Your ruling must go to that extent, otherwise it would seek to enforce stricter rules as applied to language used as against Members of the other House than as to language used in relation to Members of this House. I did not understand my Colleague to use the kind of language which I have over and over again heard checked as disorderly in this House, and as implying wilful mis-statement to the person against whom such language was directed; I understood it to be his expression of his belief in the matter. And there is this difficulty: that if two statements are made, one by a Member of this House, and one by a Member of the other House, which conflict, and upon which this Committee is asked to express its judgment—presumably my Colleague would have gone on to give the reasons for his disbelief.

THE CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member; but he is now entering upon a matter which is not pertinent to the Vote before the Committee.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I will not press that line of observations, which seems to be out of order. I only intended to show how extremely unsatisfactory any Division must be, when, to my mind, and possibly to the minds of many others, the debate or issue before us has been abridged at a point where proof or disproof of denial might have been given.

Mr. E. Robertson

I can only say that I shall be driven to vote for a reduction of the Vote if the Division is forced upon the Committee now, because my Colleague, in the middle of his statement, was prevented from concluding it. I am bound to say that, clear as was the statement of the Attorney General on some points, there was one point upon which it was considering lacking in clearness. A charge made by my hon. Colleague was that at a particular time in November Lord Arthur Somerset learned from somebody—I do not know from whom—that proceedings were likely to be taken criminally against him, and thereupon he fled to escape these proceedings. I gather from the statement of the Attorney General that early in July a case, full of suspicion at any rate, against Lord Arthur Somerset was then submitted to him. I gather from the statement of the Attorney General that on three occasions he consulted the Lord Chancellor on the subject, a course he will agree with me in saying which is not usual in criminal matters—a course which it may be presumed was pursued because of the very high position of one of the persons implicated.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I distinctly stated that I also consulted the Lord Chancellor in reference to others. I made no distinction whatever in respect to persons.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: But I gather from the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman that at that time evidence implicating Veck was before him, and that there were statements which—whether or not they were sufficient as evidence—did cast suspicion on other persons. I think that appears to be on this agreement, and perhaps the only common ground at the beginning between my Colleague and the Attorney General. Afterwards further evidence came in, upon which the Attorney General again consulted the Lord Chancellor; and yet further evidence, upon which he for the third time consulted the Lord Chancellor. The date of the resignation of his commission by Lord Arthur Somerset, and the acceptance of that resignation between October 18 and the date of the issue of the warrant, is certainly a most important matter, especially as in the more complete statement from the noble Marquess read to the House, to which I listened very attentively, it was stated that he said nothing whatever as to the date of the issue of the warrant. That is perfectly consistent with my Colleague's statement that something was said about the issue of the warrant. Ambiguous language has been used, and I am not expressing an opinion on matters of fact that are not within my own knowledge. I should be loth to uphold the contention of my Colleague against the denial of the noble Marquess except upon the statement of the Attorney-General himself who read to the Committee a statement as coming from Lord Salisbury, from which it appears that the noble Marquess had an interview with Sir Dighton Probyn on this matter, and which does not positively deny that anything was said about a warrant. The words read from the paper returned to the first Lord of the Treasury, and which I presume was some communication from Lord Salisbury himself, the words were that the noble Marquess said nothing whatever about the date of the issue of the warrant. I submit to the Committee, although to me a discussion of this kind is painful, from inception to end, I submit to the Committee that however my Colleague may have been held to have broken the rules of Parliamentary debate, at any rate there is more in the allegation made by my hon. Colleague, and the arguments he used than may have seemed to many Members opposite. I should be unworthy of association with my Colleague in the representation of the borough for which we sit, if, though I have no knowledge of the actual facts, I did not take the opportunity of putting this before the Committee.

(8.50.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I greatly regret that the leader of the House does not see his way to accept the hint of the right hon Gentleman the Member for Newcastle. It must be allowed that the Front Opposition Bench has up to now given the Government much assistance in the conduct of business, and now the first time the Government are asked to make some little allowance for circumstances in the interest of fair discussion, the right hon. Gentleman puts down his foot and positively declares he will have a Vote. The Committee is perfectly familiar with the practice of postponing contested Votes and taking other Votes, and in another week or fortnight we can resume this discussion in cooler, calmer minds, and decide the matter on its merits. I will not go so far as to say I am the most impartial man in the House, but I do say I have given proof of my impartiality in reference to the matter before the Committee to-night. For this reason I missed the first Division on the Suspension, because I thought it was a Division on a question in which I did not wish to interfere in any way. Being very impartial in that respect, still I think it is only fair that the hon. Member for Northampton should be allowed to return to his seat before the discussion is proceeded with and a decision arrived at. I, myself, heard the Attorney General distinctly challenge the hon. Member for Northampton to get up and indicate any point in which his rep'y was not complete, and but for that challenge I hardly think the hon. Member for Northampton would have got up again. In the course of his speech the hon. Member strayed into some expressions which did not find favour at your hands, Mr. Courtney, but I no more dreamed that the right hon. Gentleman would have moved the suspension of the hon. Member for Northampton, than that he would move the suspension of the First Lord of the Treasury. I think, Sir, under the circumstances we cannot now come to any fair determination. I do not pretend to have any knowledge of the main question, but if the question is put while the hon. Member for Northampton is absent, I must vote in what I suppose will be the minority, though if the hon. Member is here again I shall probably do as I intended to do when I absented myself from the first Division. To give the First Lord every opportunity to recede from the position he has taken, and accept the moderate proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, I beg to move that you now leave the chair.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Colonel Nolan.)

*(8.52.) MR. W. H. SMITH: Of course, Sir, it is impossible for us to accept the Motion just made. The hon. and gallant Gentleman professes an impartial mind on the subject we have been discussing, and I am sure I should be glad to listen to expressions of impartial opinion. He expressed some surprise that I should have found it necessary to move the suspension of the hon. Member for Northampton. In making the motion for the suspension of the hon. Member, I was simply acting in a Ministerial capacity. You, Sir, in the exercise of the authority which rests with you in the Chair, had named the hon. Member, and I had no discretion in the matter, but to give expression to your ruling, and to make the Motion which I placed before the House. The most grave charges are made which could be made against any public man—[A Voice : "Murder"]—well, I am not sure that this is not worse than murder, which might possibly be committed under provocation ; but we are charged with deliberately hindering the course of justice. The hon. Member for Northampton had laid his case before the House, and he had abundant opportunity of making a reply to the speech in which that statement was answered ; but he was called to order, and refused to obey your ruling. I may say, parenthetically, that no hon. Member should consider himself as subjected to any inconvenience, or that there is anything personally derogatory to himself in obeying the ruling of the Chair. It was the refusal to obey your ruling, Sir, that led to your reprimand of the hon. Member. We cannot permit ourselves or our Colleagues to remain under this charge or to leave it hanging round our necks for an absolutely unlimited period, and we must ask the Committee to decide whether they believe these statements to be true or false. That is the issue. Deeply as I regret that the hon. Member for Northampton has excluded himself from the House, I say it is only a matter of common fairness between gentlemen and Members of this House that this discussion shall be concluded this evening, and that the Committee shall say whether they believe Her Majesty's servants to be guilty of this great enormity, this frightful crime charged against them, or whether they do not.

(9.20.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present ; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(9.22.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR : I had no intention of taking part in the debate initiated by my hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton, but I am forced to do so by the fact that we have not now the benefit of the assistance of the hon. Member who is most intimately acquainted with the facts. I must congratulate the Attorney General on the success of his tactics, for in the most provoking manner he invited my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton to give his opinion with regard to a certain statement by the Marquess of Salisbury, and in that way provoked my hon. Friend into an assertion as to his credence or want of credence regarding that statesman's utterance. He has thus gained the marvellous advantage of securing that his speech shall not be replied to. There is not a single one of us who would not have assented to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, which offered the Government a means of escape from the unfortunate position in which they are placed by the absence of the hon. Member for Northampton. But such is their gratitude for this kind and generous offer, that the First Lord of the Treasury challenged us to keep on the discussion, although one of the parties most concerned in it is present. We are, therefore, compelled to go on to state our views regarding the statements which have been made. Now, what is our position ? The Member for Northampton has made a statement, and the Attorney General has also made a statement. These two hon. Members are the sole depositories of the facts, and yet the First Lord of the Treasury thinks it fair to call upon us to give a vote aye or no, when only one of the disputants present, and he a Member of the political party opposite. I do not wish to embitter this controversy by any allusions that may be disagreeable to the Attorney General, but I think he must allow me to say that we have had previous experience of the learned Gentleman with regard to the question of foul and calumnious and odious charges, and he cannot be surprised if we adopt an attitude of reserve and scepticism with respect to the statements he has made. I think I have put that as gently and as courteously as any man could do. I feel inclined to be rather gentle with the hon. and learned Member, because I see his experience has not altogether been lost on him, for there was nothing more edifying in his singularly lofty address—lofty I mean in manner, and gesture, and acclamation—the horror he expressed for charges which were lightly made. There is unalloyed joy on these Benches at the somewhat tardy repentance of the hon. Gentleman. Now we are asked to give a vote in the absence of the hon. Member who initiated the discussion, and we are asked to give a vote on the uncontradicted speech of the Attorney General relating to a long series of facts which I, for one, found it very difficult to follow. We think that the Government should postpone this discussion until my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton is in his place. But the Attorney General and the First Lord of the Treasury object to postpone the discussion of these grave and odious charges for so long a period. Again I must congratulate the hon. Gentleman the Attorney General on his newly-awakened faith in the desirability of prompt means being given to answer such charges. But let me point out that we do not ask that the discussion be postponed for an indefinite period. My hon. Friend will be in his place in a week's time. My hon. Friend has not lightly taken up this question; he has done so because he considers it his duty as a public man, and I tell the Attorney General he will hear more of this question from my hon. Friend. If the Government insist on our going to a Division, I will be no party to it, because such a Division would be taken under circumstances of disadvantage to the cause of the hon. Member for Northampton. I have said that this case travels over a large number of complicated events on various dates, and the hon. and learned Member cannot expect us to be able to decide immediately after hearing his speech—which is the speech of a trained lawyer and advocate, part of whose professional duty is—and I do not say this in any bad sense—to mystify those whom he addresses with regard to awkward facts. I am quite prepared, although at a disadvantage, to dissect some of the statements that have been made by the Attorney General, and I must say the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) put it very fairly when he stated that there are gaps in the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman. Now, what is the first gap?

THE CHAIRMAN: I must call the hon. Gentleman's attention to the Motion before the Chair. It is simply that I do leave the Chair. The hon. Member is travelling very wide of that question.

(9.33.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I did not happen to be in the House when this question was first raised, and therefore I may be excused for having somewhat diverged from the proposal before the Committee. My attention having now been called to it, I shall not be guilty of so flagrant a breach of order as to attempt to enter upon the general question. I am sure I express the feelings of my hon. Friends on this side of the House when I say that we should not go to a Division, under existing circumstances, if we did not feel justified in so doing. We accept the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle, and I would urge upon the Government the desirability of affording an opportunity for continuing this discussion when the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is in the House. If, however, the Government are desirous of snatching a verdict under the circumstances, let them do so, but they will have to face the verdict that will be given outside this House. It will be for the country to judge of the action of Her Majesty's Government in forcing this question to a premature Vote when the House has before it only an imperfect statement of the real facts. I would therefore urge upon the House not only in its own interests, but in the interests of fair-play, and in the general interests of the public as well as of those who are suffering under most unjust imputations with regard to the offences that have been brought before the House, to postpone this Vote until my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) can be again in his place, and we shall have a fair opportunity of full and free discussion.

(9.35.) DR. TANNER (Cork, Mid): I have not had the opportunity of hearing this matter discussed; but I must say that I felt very much astonished to hear that an English Member trying to do his duty in this House had been absolutely sat upon in a way with which the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General is so familiar. Practically speaking, the hon. Member was led into a trap, with the result that he has been suspended from the service of this House. Of course, it is not for me at this moment to enter into detailed comment on the subject of the hon. Member's suspension, but, at the same time, it is a very serious matter; and having noticed the aspect of the Attorney General since I came into the House, I can understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman is sorry for what has happened. The question that has been under discussion is not a very pleasant one for Members of this House to discuss; but when the senior Member for Northampton has taken the question up and endeavoured to prove the case he has submitted, the dirt and filth lie with hon. Members on the opposite side of the House who refuse to take action on the subject. There ought to be no dilly-dallying with this sort of business.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I would point out to the hon. Member that the Question before the Committee is that I leave the Chair.

DR. TANNER: Certainly, Sir. [Laughter.] Hon. Members should bear in mind that this is no laughing matter. Mr. Courtney, I always bow to your ruling, and accept it in a most thorough manner; but I repeat that this is no laughing matter, especially to Members of the Government who sit there and are absolutely dumb. They have listened to the remarks which fell from my hon. Friend and Colleague the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) and they will give him no answer. What are Her Majesty's Government paid for except to answer? Why does not some right hon. Gentleman get up and reply? Why is there any hesitation on the part of the Government? The suspension of one of the senior and most intelligent Members of this House—a gentleman who never gets up to speak without being attentively listened to by the most intelligent portion of the House—is a very serious matter. Of course, I do not allude to the “deadheads,” and I repeat that we ought to have a reply from some spokesman of the Government, if, indeed, they have anything to say on the subject. Their conduct is really stupid. [Cries of “Order.”] If that remark is not Parliamentary I withdraw it. But I certainly think it is stupid on the part of the salaried Officers of the Crown to succeed in suspending an hon. Member of this House, and when their conduct has been challenged from this side refuse to give an answer. Now, Mr. Courtney, I do not desire to continue this debate. I only got up for the simple purpose of trying, if possible, to spur on, to egg on, to compulse, to coerce, and to exercise some pressure on the Attorney General, who seems content to sit dumb under the charge which has been brought against the Government from this side of the House. It is disgusting.

(9.40.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 80; Noes 163.—(Div. List, No. 18.)

Question again proposed, “That a sum, not exceeding £3,725,003, be granted for the said Services.”

(9.51.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: In view of the vote just given by the majority of the House, we are compelled, in the absence of my hon. Friend, to go on discussing this case. The general effect of the Attorney General's speech has been, in my opinion, which perhaps may be considered due to partisanship, that, while it has corrected some statements, and thrown doubt on others, to convince us of the general truth of the case. [Ministerial laughter.] I have no doubt that what the Attorney General said has carried conviction to hon. Gentlemen opposite. But what the hon. and learned Gentleman said with regard to the Pigott forgeries had exactly the same effect upon them. As the hon. Member who has brought forward the question is absent, all that can be done is to dissect the case of the Government as presented by themselves. The statement of the Attorney General has been charitably described by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle as having certain gaps; it is more accurate to say that it was all gaps. The great fact left unexplained is that a house admittedly used for vile purposes was for months under the supervision of the police, and the net result, even after the action of the Attorney General, the Lord Chancellor, and the Prime Minister, is that two of the most obscure criminals have been imprisoned for ludicrously short terms. The common sense of the country will not regard the sophistries of the Attorney General as any explanation of this fact. Again, why is it necessary to call into the discussion of the case the Attorney General, the Lord Chancellor, and the Prime Minister? These crimes are, unfortunately, of not uncommon occurrence; and any frequenter of an Assize Court must have seen many poor and wretched agricultural labourers brought up on such charges.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Newport, Shropshire): No, no.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I congratulate the hon. Member on his ignorance; it is an ignorance which I do not at all find fault with. But the hon. Gentleman is wrong in his statement. It is a fact well-known to those who attend Assizes, that labourers and poor people are frequently brought up charged with these offences. [Colonel KENYON-SLANEY: No, no.] If the hon. Gentleman wishes to interrupt me, of course he can do so.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. Member, but I object to the character which he gives the agricultural labourer. I do not think it fair because of this particular controversy to brand the whole class of agricultural labourers, who, at all events in my particular county, do not bear that character.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I must say that I do not see the relevancy of the interruption. I do not brand the whole peasantry of the country because certain of them are sometimes charged with these odious offences, any more than I brand the whole nobility because one member of it flies from justice. I cannot really give way to the hon. Gentleman, whose remarks are irrelevant and do not enlighten the House with regard to any statement I have made. What I want to ask the Attorney General is this: When a humble person is charged with such an offence, does the Attorney General consult the Lord Chancellor and the Prime Minister? There is no answer to the fact that the titled position of suspected persons induced consultation with Ministers of the Crown who would not otherwise have been consulted. Is that equality before the law? Is the prosecution of a crime like this, because a man happens to bear a title, to be made a Cabinet question? That is a point upon which the public mind will eagerly ask for information. I have asked a question of the Attorney General, and he has not answered me. His attention was called to the fact that he consulted the Lord Chancellor as to the case of that unhappy nobleman whose name I do not wish to mention, because I desire to spare his friends any pain in the matter. He denies it. What I complain of is that he makes the denial with such—I would not like to say affectation, but such an appearance of almost celestial virtue that we must have time to consider his answer before we are able to see what it really amounts to. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he did not consult him with regard to the case of the nobleman, but with regard to the case of Veck. One would really have thought from his gestures and his manner that he supposed we would be superficial and shallow enough to take that as an answer. Why did he consult the Lord Chancellor with regard to Veck? Because of all that Veck knew of this particular nobleman and other titled persons. I do not understand that the hon. and learned Gentleman has any answer to that. A gesture even so eloquent as those the Attorney General can use will not satisfy me. The hon. and learned Gentleman asked that his attention might be called to any point he might have omitted. I have called his attention to this point, and I will not be put off with a gesture; he will keep his word. If he breaks it the country will be left to judge. There is another point to which I wish to call attention. The Attorney General says Hammond left on the morning of the 5th of July. I want to ask whether the Government or any Member of the Government knew the facts before the 5th of July?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I beg to state at once that the boys made a statement on July 4, and were immediately suspended, and were able to go away from their work. It is supposed that Newlove communicated with Hammond that night, and on the following morning Hammond went away.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: That is exactly my case. Why were not both Newlove and Hammond watched? The Government can find detectives enough to dog the footsteps of the Irish Members; they cannot find a detective to dog the footsteps of a ruffian who, for upwards of a year, has kept a house in this City which has brought disgrace on the character of the City. They let Hammond go to France. They ought to have watched him within an hour of Newlove's confession, if they were serious in the business. If the Attorney General had got up and said he had thought it better that these matters should not be made public, and that the sacred ignorance of thousands of persons in this country should be preserved even though a few miscreants should escape, that would have sealed my lips to-night. He takes up, however, an entirely different position. I come now to the sentences passed on Newlove and Veck. The Attorney General assumes an air of the most virtuous indignation because my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) spoke of an arrangement between the counsel for the prosecution and the defence in this case. The Attorney General is an experienced lawyer of many years' practice, and he knows that arrangements of this kind are common; that they take place almost every day, and that there is no dishonour on one side or the other. Take the case of Father M'Fadden and the other Gweedore prisoners. Everyone knows that light sentences were passed because a number of the prisoners, in obedience to the advice given by counsel after consultation with counsel on the other side, pleaded guilty. Some of them, no doubt, got long sentences; but, still, these arrangements between one side and the other are as common almost as criminal trials. In spite of all the Attorney General says, I maintain that there was such an arrangement here, and the object and meaning of it was to close the mouths of the persons in gaol, and in that way save the criminals whom their confessions might have exposed. I must now call attention to the Attorney General's conduct with regard to Lord Salisbury. Knowing very well that the hon. Member for Northampton was about to make an attack on the Government and Lord Salisbury, the Attorney General had ample means of getting from Lord Salisbury a statement in reply to the hon. Member for Northampton. He had, he says, formal notice, and no one can say that my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) has acted at all unfairly in the matter. He has for months given notice of his intention in a public journal with which he is notoriously associated. What does the Attorney General do? He produces a letter from the Marquess of Salisbury denying a statement which my hon. Friend never made, but not denying the statement my hon. Friend did make. My hon. Friend's statement was that the Marquess of Salisbury spoke of a warrant being out against this nobleman. The Attorney General, as a contradiction of that statement, says that the Marquess of Salisbury was asked whom he thought to be guilty and whom innocent, and that the Marquess replied that except in the case of one person, against whom the evidence was not quite complete, he thought the evidence broke down. How did the Prime Minister of this country become so intimately acquainted with the details of the whole case? Why was it not left to the authorities at Scotland Yard? I think the country will learn with something like stunning bewilderment that the Prime Minister, who is also our Foreign Secretary, is actually diverted from the enormous and momentous duties he has to perform in our relations with foreign countries to the discussion of the hideous, and loathsome, and horrible details of a case like this. Sir, there was no small cause for bringing the Prime Minister so deeply into the knowledge of this case. The Attorney General says Lord Salisbury stated his opinion that the evidence was strong against one individual, and insufficient against the others.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I must say, Sir, that is not in the least what I stated. I stated that Sir Dighton Probyn had asked Lord Salisbury whether there was any truth in the rumours about certain persons whom he named. Lord Salisbury replied that as far as he knew there was no evidence against any of those persons except one, whom he named, and that in his case the evidence was not, in the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown, sufficient.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Of course I accept what the hon. and learned Gentleman says, which is in correspondence with my own recollection. But my hon. Friend asked not as to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the evidence against this person or that, but whether Lord Salisbury did or did not communicate the information with regard to the warrant. The Attorney General had no answer ready to that question. He said that the statement he made implied a contradiction of the statement of my hon. Friend. Then, by some means which I do not wish to inquire into, another statement of the Prime Minister was brought in.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I should like to put the hon. Gentleman in possession of the accurate facts. The letter from which I quoted is entirely in Lord Salisbury's handwriting, but I had copied in my own handwriting as much of it as Lord Salisbury actually said—the affirmative part. I did not copy out—I did not think it was part of the story of what he said—the denial. The letter was in the keeping of the First Lord of the Treasury, to whom it was sent, and when the question was put to me again by the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), I got up and read the denial. I have not the smallest objection to read the whole reply again to the hon. Member, so that he may see it bears out what I have said.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I have no objection. I only ask the hon. and learned Gentleman not to read it, because I do not wish him to think, as he appears inclined to do, that I am making a charge against him. I am doing no such thing.

*(10.15.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I understood the hon. Gentleman to suggest that I had not read a denial, and that some other paper was produced—as if I had produced something to which I had not referred before. I explained that I read only the affirmative part and not the negative part. This is the letter—

“Sir Dighton Probyn, I believe on October 15, asked me whether there was any truth in the imputations which had been made in certain newspapers against persons whom he named. I said that as far as I knew there was not a vestige of evidence against any of those persons except one, and in his case the evidence of identity was not, I believed, in the judgment of the Law Advisers of the Crown, sufficient. I said nothing whatever about the date of the issue of the warrant.”

(10.17.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am dissecting the Attorney General's speech, and I hope fairly. I did not charge him with concealing any part of the letter. What I said was that the Attorney General seemed to have received two statements, whereas I find he received only one. I will deal with the letter the hon. and learned Gentleman has read. Now, the Marquess of Salisbury is accustomed to writing letters of great importance, and he is a man who knows as well as anybody the significance and importance of words. What is the meaning of the mysterious reserve Lord Salisbury makes in saying not that he did not mention a warrant, but that he did not mention the date of the warrant?

*(10.18.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I think it only right I should read the only document sent to Lord Salisbury with reference to this matter. This is the letter, dated February 26, of the hon. Member for Northampton:—

“Dear Akers-Douglas,—I think it only right that I should tell you when the Cleveland Street matter comes on I mean to refer to Lord Salisbury's interview with Sir Dighton Probyn on October”

—it may be the 16th or the 18th; I cannot pledge myself, for the hon. Member's writing is indistinct—

“and to show that the statement of Lord Salisbury on that occasion that a warrant against Lord Arthur Somerset would be issued next day was conveyed to him and was the direct cause of his flight. The warrant was issued on November 9.—Yours truly, H. LABOUCHERE.”

That letter was sent to Lord Salisbury, and I have read his reply in his own words.

(10.20.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I am glad the letter has been read, because it shows how base and without foundation is the charge that adequate notice was not given by the hon. Member for Northampton to the persons he intended to attack. The whole burden of the Attorney General's speech was the unfairness of the attack which, by some miraculous intervention, —in spite of the tactics of my hon. Friend—he was yet in a position to meet. Still, the fact remains, that the Marquess of Salisbury did not deny the mention of a warrant; he said he denied the mention of the date of a warrant. Does the Chancellor of the Exchequer see no difference between the two?

*(10.22.) MR. GOSCHEN: As the hon. Member appeals to me, I say the charge was that Lord Salisbury said a warrant “would be issued to-morrow;” and he denied that in the most absolute terms.

(10.23.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The Chancellor of the Exchequer has not answered my question. I quite agree that the terms of the hon. Member's letter might have suggested the terms of the reply; but the Marquess of Salisbury did not deny that he had mentioned a warrant. The Attorney General also contradicted a statement my hon. Friend did not make. My hon. Friend did not say that Sir D. Probyn had seen Lord A. Somerset; there was no necessity that Sir D. Probyn should see him; the suggestion is that Sir D. Probyn communicated the knowledge he had obtained from Lord Salisbury by some other person to Lord A. Somerset, the result being that he left the country.

*(10.25.) SIR R. WEBSTER: There is no doubt about my words. I said that on that night Sir D. Probyn neither saw Lord A. Somerset nor had any communication, direct or indirect, with him, and no one was more surprised than Sir D. Probyn that he had left, as he firmly believed Lord Arthur was innocent.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The hon. and learned Gentleman knows well the authority on which my hon. Friend made the statement, or if he does not, it is because he has wilfully refused to secure the knowledge. My hon. Friend was challenged to produce his authority, and offered to write down the name, thus exercising what I, knowing the facts, deem to have been a wise and honourable discretion—a discretion which every hon. Member would respect if he knew the name. Declining the responsibility of divulging the name, the hon. Member challenged the Attorney General to mention it. Why did he not? If the Attorney General does not know, at any rate he suspects whence the information came.

*(10.26.) SIR R. WEBSTER: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I must crave the indulgence of the House. I had not the slightest idea as to the name the hon. Member referred to; I considered, and I consider, the responsibility of bringing in the names of these persons other than that of Sir D. Probyn should rest with the hon. Member for Northampton.

(10.27.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: That is a question the hon. Member must decide for himself. I maintain that the Attorney General, who may be right or wrong, is at any rate no longer in a position to say that my hon. Friend refused to give the name of his informant. Sir, I, myself, know the name, but it was given to me in confidence, and I would not accept the responsibility of mentioning it; but I say the name of the informant makes it a matter of absolute conviction that the hon. Member stated the facts when he said that Lord A. Somerset knew the result of the interview between Sir D. Probyn and Lord Salisbury. It certainly seems a singular coincidence that the flight of Lord Arthur Somerset should occur on the day of that interview. I am precluded from casting doubt on the accuracy or veracity of Lord Salisbury. I will not commit myself in face of your ruling, Sir. Indeed, I do not know that I should desire to question anyone's veracity even if you had not given a ruling. I cannot say that Lord Salisbury wilfully said what was untrue; but I can say that his recollection was imperfect, and that Sir Dighton Probyn's recollection is imperfect also. And I say that the public will ask with some curiosity how it came to pass that the date of this interview and the date of Lord A. Somerset's flight were the same? A further question is this. On the 12th of November there was a warrant issued against Lord Arthur Somerset, but the police knew that he was then out of the country. Why were there no proceedings to extradite him?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It was not an extraditable offence, unfortunately.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Of course not, if the offence was reduced by the Government from felony to misdemeanour.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I say distinctly there was not the slightest evidence against the unfortunate man to whom the hon. Member refers of anything exceeding misdemeanour. There is no offence for which he could be extradited.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I, of course, accept the statement, and I am relieved to hear that so much can be said in extenuation. But I am not dealing with the offence of this unfortunate gentleman—he will suffer for it to the end of his days. I am dealing with the action of the Government, who took the course of issuing a warrant for the arrest of a man who had been out of the country a fortnight or three weeks—a farcical afterthought to make up for their remissness or laxity in allowing the man to escape.

It was not on the 18th November that the Government knew for the first time of the charges against Lord Arthur Somerset. He had been watched. Why was not some effort made to arrest him? How was it that he fled the country on the very day the conversation took place between Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn? The common sense of the country will be able to judge of these facts. No amount of argument on the part of the Attorney General can explain the coincidences in connection with the conversations and the escape of these men. Now, Sir, what is the justification for raising this question at all? I admit that if I were left to my free choice I would never have mentioned a word of the case. But the solid ground on which my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton stands is this: that whereas these odious and horrible offences are punished here in the case of poor men, all the resources and counsels of the Government are exhausted to save rich men who are charged with them. [Ministerial cries of "No."] Hon. Gentlemen opposite contradict me. Well, I have stated one side of the case; the Attorney General has stated the other, and I leave the public to decide between us. The public will not stand inequality in the treatment of anyone. It will not stand a number of unfortunate wretches being sent year after year to long sentences of penal servitude for these offences when in the midst of our city a house is allowed to exist where titled people commit these offences, and when they are allowed to escape in the end.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Now, Sir, I ask the hon. Gentleman to state to the House the name of the person on whose authority the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) made his allegations. The hon. Gentleman says he knows it. I claim, in the interests of justice, that he should state it to the House. I ask an answer from the hon. Member.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Of course I must answer the direct appeal of the right hon. Gentleman. He knows that the name is not in my custody. My hon. Friend mentioned the name to me in confidence. [Cries of "Oh, oh!" and ironical cheers.] Does any hon. Gentleman doubt my word?

An hon. MEMBER: Yes.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not know from what hon. Member that cry came.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I see the gentleman, Sir—the fourth from the Gangway on the second Bench opposite.

THE CHAIRMAN: It is most un-Parliamentary, and I ask him to disavow it.

MR. T. FIELDEN (Lancashire, S.E., Middleton): If I said anything un-Parliamentary, of course I withdraw it.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I would not take any notice of the hon. Member's observations under ordinary circumstances; but after what has taken place I feel called upon to say that the hon. Gentleman opposite did say "Yes" when I asked if anyone doubted my word. I call on you, Sir, to compel him to withdraw.

THE CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. Member to withdraw it; but if there is any doubt about it I will again require him to withdraw it.

MR. T. FIELDEN: I withdraw.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman asks me to reveal a name given to me in confidence. I cannot do it in honour. The hon. and learned Attorney General had the opportunity of revealing the name, because my hon. Friend (Mr. Labouchere) when in the House wrote it down and offered it to him.

(10.35.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I do not think, Sir, that any complaint can be made after what has happened to-night that it should be found necessary to discuss this question at some little length. I am afraid that neither the Ministry nor hon. Members on the opposite side of the House understand the gravity of the issues in this case. An impression has been created, and is likely to be extended, that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor. I am afraid that the natural heat of the discussion has led occasionally to some little misapprehension. I should be sorry, indeed, to bring any charge of anything like corrupt collusion in the escape of criminals against members of the present Ministry. I should be very far, indeed, from endorsing a charge of criminal conspiracy, except in the innocent and merely political sense that is necessarily attached to that phrase in some particular circumstances. All that I accuse the Ministry of — and I cannot but consider that, at any rate, a prima facie case has been proved — is a somewhat wrongful negligence. They may have thought that they had a discretion to exercise ; but, in my opinion, they exercised it improperly. We can well understand the natural unwillingness of the Government to meddle with such a disgraceful matter at all, but when the exposure took place, and the law dealt with such a case, the law ought to have been evenly and impartially applied ; and the question is, whether that has been the case ? There are certainly gaps in the Attorney General's argument. He assured us that the Ministry throughout the history of this dreadful case always intended when the evidence warranted it to proceed. I quite believe that ; but I cannot help thinking that they formed an over-estimate of what was necessary evidence to enable them to proceed. An impression has been created that they would have been satisfied with much less evidence in the case of poor men than in the case of certain rich men. Then, again, in every criminal case it is always considered as of the utmost importance to arrest the criminal before he has time to escape. The police frequently arrest men suspected of murder if they have a reasonable amount of suspicion, and why should not the same rule have been applied in the case of a dreadful crime like this ? I cannot but think that a grave error has been committed by those responsible in allowing these criminals to escape while even suspicion existed. The Attorney General has denied that any arrangement was made by which the persons arrested were to plead guilty. Of course I know nothing about law, and I may not have understood the language of the Attorney General properly ; but it seems to me that the Attorney General did not exactly deny what was alleged on this side of the House. The allegation is not that Mr. Poland arranged the counts on which the accused should plead guilty ; but that there was a general understanding that if the men pleaded guilty they would be dealt with leniently. As far as I understood the Attorney General, he did not deny that.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (Sir E. CLARKE, Plymouth) : Will the hon. Gentleman allow me to re-read the passage from Mr. Poland's letter which the

Mr. Picton

Attorney General has already read ? It is as follows :—

“I wish to say I neither directly nor indirectly made any arrangement with the prisoners' counsel as to what counts they should plead guilty to. There was no undertaking of any kind, either expressed or implied, as to what should be done by me or the prisoners' counsel.”

MR. PICTON : Mr. Poland states there was no arrangement made as to which counts the prisoners should plead guilty to ; but he does not say there was no understanding whatever that they should plead guilty generally. These poor men know nothing about counts. The allegation is that they pleaded guilty generally, on the suggestion being made to them that if they did so they would be leniently dealt with. Of course, that may not be so ; but all I say is that the denial given to us does not absolutely contradict what has been said on this side. Then with regard to Hammond, we are told by the Attorney General that he could not possibly have been arrested. It was on the 4th July that the first revelations were made, and had there been prompt action taken Hammond could certainly have been arrested. Hammond did not escape until the 5th. One cannot help thinking that if the same energy had been displayed as would be displayed, we hope, in the case of a murderer, the man might have been arrested before he left the country. Then, it is said, he could not possibly have been brought back by extradition. But we have been told, and it has not been contradicted, that Mr. Phillips, who is connected with the Post Office, went to Belgium and telegraphed, on the 14th of September I think, that as soon as assurance was given that demand for extradition would be formally made, action would be taken by the Belgian police. If the Belgian police were anxious to co-operate with the police of this country, why was not advantage taken of their willingness ? Even if the Extradition Treaty did not apply to the case literally, arrangements might have been made by which the man might have been expelled the territory of Belgium and so brought into the hands of justice. I do not think that the case made by my hon. Friend has been quite answered, and I cannot but think that the impression created by this debate in many parts of the country will be a very disagreeable one. It is most important that the law should be enforced regardless of rank or position. ["Hear, hear."] Yes, but the impression has been created that this has not been done in the present case, and the Government will have to make a very much better defence than they have made to-night if they would convince all sections of the community that the law in this case has been applied equally and impartially.

(10.48.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Very early in the life of this Government I came to the conclusion that they would if they could introduce Irish methods into English administration, and the facts that have been elicited to-night have gone very far to bear out the justice of that conclusion. This debate has been interesting in a literary point of view; it has brought out a fresh letter from Lord Salisbury, but a letter very unlike those written to the Portuguese Government, a letter equivalent to the plea of the man who said, "Not guilty, but I will not do it again." The answer given by Lord Salisbury to the anticipated attack of the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) convinces me that bluntness is hereditary, for I see the style of the Prime Minister in answering questions bears a remarkable family likeness to the style of the Chief Secretary in answering Irish questions. Now, there are various coincidences in this case to which I should like to direct the attention of the country. The 5th of July is a remarkable date in these transactions. On that date the warrant was issued for the arrest of Hammond, and on the same date Hammond escapes. No matter how the hon. and learned Gentleman shakes his head——

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I had better correct the hon. Gentleman. The information was put into the hands of the police on the evening of the 5th. The warrant was not issued until the 6th; and that was obliged to be because there had to be sworn informations obtained. Hammond escaped early on the morning of the 5th.

MR. MAC NEILL: That makes the case against the Attorney General stronger. We shall make him a very fine criminal lawyer before we have done, as good a criminal lawyer as the Lord Chancellor. On the 4th of July these unfortunate boys were dismissed from the Post Office. They were told for what they were dismissed. That gave them an opportunity of communicating with Hammond. We have been told of the difference between misdemeanour and felony; and that Lord A. Somerset could not be extradited because he was only accused of misdemeanour. What were the boys accused of? If of anything, they were accused of felony; and if the Government had wished justice to come home to Hammond, they would have at once arrested Hammond's collaborateurs in iniquity, and not given them an opportunity of communicating with the wretch. When I heard the description of Hammond's escape just at the lucky moment I thought of our old friend Richard Pigott and his escape just at the lucky moment. If we do not see to these matters the administration of justice in this country will become rather more Irish than it is in Ireland. The next date is the 18th of October. That was the date on which Sir Dighton Probyn interviewed the Prime Minister in reference to a criminal matter; and on that evening who escaped from justice? Lord Arthur Somerset. When Lord Arthur Somerset was well out of the way the Government issued a warrant against him. The Dowager Duchess of Beaufort died in October, and Lord Arthur Somerset attended her funeral. Constable Hanks was sent to arrest Lord Arthur Somerset, but when he got to Badminton his orders were countermanded. Why were his orders countermanded? I would suggest was out of kindness—it would have been an ungracious thing to arrest a man at a funeral. But no such considerations enter into the system of Irish administration. We know that Irish funerals are happy hunting grounds, not only for arrests, but for baton charges. Lord Arthur Somerset, a member of the classes, is to be allowed to go, while John Mandeville, who is a member of the masses, is to be arrested. I respect the Attorney General as a lawyer, and I always thought he was an independent man. When, however, he was consulted in this matter what did he do? He asked the opinion of two of the highest persons in the land, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Salisbury. When did Lord Salisbury become a criminal lawyer? I do not think even the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland would be satisfied with his criminal knowledge. It is rather singular that in a case of this kind the Attorney General should consult these high personages, when we know that in a case in which the character of the Irish Members was involved, he studiously kept aloof from any Members of the Cabinet. He confers with the Lord Chancellor and Lord Salisbury in this wretched case, but in a case in which perjury and forgery went together, in which violence and fraud kissed each other, he depended upon his own unaided judgment. I think if the Solicitor General were defending a criminal in a case like this, in a case where there might happen to be a conflict of evidence between two men, such as there is between the Marquess of Salisbury and the hon. Member for Northampton, he would consider the probabilities of the case as to where the truth would be likely to be. Did the Attorney General act in this way? The hon. Member for Northampton, when there was a conflict of testimony between himself and the Marquess of Salisbury, invited in support of his own case the name of a certain person. Now, I ask the First Lord of the Treasury and the Attorney General do they know the name of that person?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury know? [Mr. W. H. SMITH dissented]. Well, I pass it by, for I fear that if I press the question further the right hon. Gentleman will move the Closure, having regard to his sense of duty to the House and the country. The right hon. Gentleman keeps locked up in his own breast the secret he challenged an irresponsible Irish Member of the House to give to the House and the country. Why did not the Attorney General in his investigation of the truth take for what it was worth the evidence put forward by the hon. Member for Northampton? Why did he, a lawyer with 30 years experience at the Bar, and a high reputation in this House, why did he when he rejected that evidence, reject it with the blushing modesty of a young lady of 16? Why was the good man nonplussed? Because he knew that the personage whom he does not know but whom he strongly suspects—perhaps he has no legal proof, perhaps he only has the name of hear-say—because he knows that the name being known would at once give predominance to the truth of the allegations of the hon. Member for Northampton. I do not accuse Lord Salisbury of falsehood; I simply say there is an inaccuracy of recollection. Were I called upon to give judgment as between the testimony of Lord Salisbury and the testimony of the hon. Member for Northampton, I should find myself on the horns of a dilemma. The hon. Member for Northampton has always been a very good friend, an honourable and a true-hearted friend of ours, and therefore I would, with all my heart and soul, believe him. But, on the other hand, I would believe Lord Salisbury because he is a Member of the House of Peers. But I would point out—and I am sure the Solicitor General will agree with me—that in judging in a conflict of testimony between these two, and if the hon. and learned Gentleman were, say, engaged in defence of the hon. Member for Northampton, he would naturally, by examination, test the memory of Lord Salisbury. Suppose the noble Marquess in the witness-box, one of the questions would be:—"Do you remember the Salisbury-Schouvaloff Memorandum, the existence of which you at first denied, but afterwards confessed, amid the cheers of the opposite Party?" In this matter of recollection, it would be fair to judge Lord Salisbury and the hon. Member for Northampton by their antecedents. I do not impute inaccuracy of statement to hon. Gentlemen, but I ask them, do they know what truth is? The hon. Member for Northampton has done good service in noting a difference in the administration of justice as between rich and poor; he has made a gallant fight, and I do not think that eventually he will get the worst of it. If for a season we are deprived of his voice here, I have no doubt it will be heard with effect in speaking to the Commons at large in St. Pancras.

*(11.5.) MR. C. HALL (Cambridgeshire, Chesterton): I will detain the House but a very few minutes. I was in the United States when these occurrences took place, and up to this point I thought it better to leave to those better qualified by knowledge to speak on the matters which form the subject of this discussion.

I should not have interposed now but for some observations that fell from the hon. Member for S. Donegal, in which he alluded to what he called the "marvellous coincidence" between the date of Lord Arthur Somerset leaving London, and the date of the interview between the Prime Minister and General Sir Dighton Probyn. It is necessary to refer to the charge originally made in this respect by the hon. Member for Northampton, for it is practically repeated by the hon. Member for S. Donegal. Now, what was this charge? The charge brought by the hon. Member for Northampton was, that Lord Salisbury having told Sir Dighton Probyn that a warrant would be obtained the next day or immediately, that information was conveyed to Lord Arthur Somerset, who left London the same evening. The hon. Member went on to say that the information was given with the intention that it should be conveyed to Lord Arthur Somerset. Now, there is no mistake about that being the allegation, and I hope by the recital of a very short statement of facts to show not only that information was not given, but that it was impossible that it should have been given. I will not deal with the question of the honour of Sir Dighton Probyn; his name is too well known to suffer from any attack from the hon. Member for Northampton, but I will show first of all that it is impossible that the information could have been communicated by Sir Dighton Probyn to Lord Arthur Somerset, or anyone on his behalf; secondly, that Lord Arthur Somerset's flight was the very last thing that any man connected with the household of Marlborough House wished. The facts are simple, and I will recite them as far as I can without any expression of feeling. The interview between Sir Dighton Probyn and Lord Salisbury took place at King's Cross in the evening. When that interview was over Sir Dighton Probyn drove home to dress for dinner. It was then late, and having dressed he went to his club and commenced a late dinner. Before Sir Dighton Probyn had finished his dinner, and before he had spoken to anyone on the subject, Lord Arthur Somerset had left London, and it has since been ascertained that he gave orders to his servants to have his things ready for his leaving London before the interview between Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn took place. Now, if that be the case how can it be suggested that Lord Arthur Somerset's flight was in any way connected with any information given by Sir Dighton Probyn, or through Sir Dighton Probyn? I have only to add that Sir Dighton Probyn and Lord Arthur Somerset's Colleagues in the Household believed him to be innocent, and it was their most anxious desire that he should take steps to clear his character from what they believed base and scurrilous accusations made against him; and on that very day Sir Dighton Probyn had urged him, pressed him, to vindicate his character, and Lord Somerset said he would take steps to do so. How, in the face of these facts, can it be alleged that Sir Dighton Probyn behaved as has been suggested. I have stated the facts, and they speak for themselves. I venture to say that when these matters are looked into, when the facts are considered dispassionately, it will be seen that so far from being true it was absolutely impossible that Sir Dighton Probyn could have given information to Lord Arthur Somerset, or anybody on his behalf, before he left London.

(11.10.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I do not personally take any interest in this matter, but, after the remarks of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Hall), it is right that somebody should say a word on behalf of the hon. Member for Northampton, who is not here to speak for himself. The hon. and learned Gentleman has given us a very fair account of Sir Dighton Probyn's experiences on the evening of the interview with Lord Salisbury, but he has expressed some indignation that anybody else should have put things in a contrary way. Up to the present moment, however, we have not heard any hon. Member who is able to speak so authoritatively as the hon. and learned Gentleman. I am glad to have heard him for several reasons, but especially because just as he was resuming his seat he said that his statement of facts would be borne out when the thing came to be examined. Now, it is for this that I have risen, because the hon. Member for Northampton said he wished for a Select Committee to inquire into the matter. He did not ask for a decision as the result of this debate. He asked the Government to appoint a Select Committee for inquiry. Now, from the time the hon. Member for Northampton sat down many hours ago, the Government have made no answer whether they will grant this Committee or not. All we heard on the subject from the leader of the House was that the matter ought to be decided to-night, because this was not the sort of thing the Government could allow to hang over them. Well, it is rather hard that we should be required to accept the vote of a mechanical majority on a matter which the hon. and learned Gentleman says ought to be inquired into.

*MR. C. HALL: What I said was, when the facts are looked into dispassionately.

MR. PHILIPPS: Quite so, when the facts are dispassionately looked into, but can that be done by the Committee to-night? How can the facts be best looked into? The Government, I believe, do not like Select Committees; perhaps they would prefer a Royal Commission. The hon. Member for Northampton would prefer a Select Committee, but no doubt he would be satisfied with any impartial tribunal. The hon. and learned Gentleman seems to take it for granted that there is going to be an inquiry because he talked about it when these things are inquired into.

*MR. C. HALL: I must really ask the hon. Member not to misrepresent me. I said nothing about an inquiry by Committee, or of any sort whatever.

MR. PHILIPPS: I took down the words, and I thought the hon. and learned Gentleman said when these matters were looked into dispassionately. Well, surely that must refer to some time other than to-night. One good service the hon. Member for Northampton has done is bringing before our notice this very curious interview which took place between Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn. Now, when my hon. Friend was making his speech and gave an account of this interview, I thought that this surely would be denied. I never thought that any Member of the Government would admit that such an interview had taken place between the Prime Minister of this country and a private individual in reference to a criminal prosecution. I say that interview, whichever account of it you accept, that interview of Lord Salisbury's showing was a very curious affair. As to the statement of the hon. and learned

Gentleman that this gentleman who has left the country did not leave in consequence of that interview because he had arranged his departure before that interview took place, I have no doubt that the statement was made in good faith, but, speaking as a lawyer, I should like to have all that kind of thing tested by cross-examination; it is not to be settled by any hon. Member coming here and giving us an interesting account of the proceedings of an hour or two. The Committee cannot decide fairly upon the materials before them. The Attorney General asked us to point out to him anything that he had not answered fully, and I must say I do not think he has explained how Lord Salisbury came to be mixed up in these matters at all. He has told us that he took the legal opinion of the Lord Chancellor, and he said of course that the Lord Chancellor's opinion was valuable on a matter of Criminal Law. He says he also took the opinion of Mr. Poland, but he did not say why or when Lord Salisbury was brought into these transactions. Why in the world should the Prime Minister, with, I should think, work enough on his hands be consulted about a criminal action? There is another little point the Attorney General did not deal with and which I will recall to his recollection. The hon. Member for Northampton mentioned that this gentleman now absent from the country left the Army under somewhat peculiar circumstances. His resignation was accepted, whereas the usual course in such matters is to issue a Gazette notice that his services are dispensed with. Whether that is so or not I, of my own knowledge, cannot say; I only know that such was the statement made by the hon. Member for Northampton, and the Attorney General has not said a word about it to-night. These among other things ought to be cleared up by a Member of the Government before we go to a Division. It is unfair that we should be called upon to vote to-night. It is a very important matter that people should know why it is that a Prime Minister and other Members of the Cabinet should mix themselves up in criminal matters. We cannot determine these things to-night, and it is because these matters must be inquired into, because the demand of the hon. Member for Northampton for a Committee is reasonable, that if the present Motion is carried to a Division I shall support it.

(11.20.) MR JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E). I am the first of the Metropolitan Members to speak upon a matter upon which London is specially concerned. I am not going into the whole controversy that has occupied the evening; I regret that the hon. Member who introduced the matter is not here to bring it to an issue; but what I wish to draw the attention of the Government to is that they have not said one word expressing their opinion as to an inquiry. Let me ask them seriously to consider this. I speak with some knowledge of what has been in the public mind in London during the autumn and winter. The people of London have had a great scandal in their midst, and in connection with this scandal many rumours have been going about, growing as rumours do until they took shape that has filled the public mind with anxiety. The names of many influential persons have been mixed up in matters with which the Motion of the hon. Member for Northampton is concerned, and in the public interest it is necessary that these matters should be cleared up. I ask the Government to consider, can they grant this inquiry whether there is any thing in the allegations freely made outside or not? Let the thing be sifted. Let the worst be known—let public confidence be restored. One thing there is that fills the public mind with anxiety. I do not say it is true, but it has been forced on the attention of the people of London, that, owing to the intervention of the higher authorities, the police have not been permitted to perform their duty in connection with these cases. It is a most serious charge to make, and I do not say it is true, but bring it to the light of day, and if it is only wild rumour show that it has no foundation in fact. Let us have it searched into and settled once for all. I know the rumour has great hold on the public mind in London. Even this evening after listening to the speech of the hon. Member for Northampton and the reply of the Attorney General, one cannot help noticing in connection with the action of the police referred to by the hon. Member, that there was not an answer from the Attorney General as to whether the best possible means were taken to bring the criminals to justice. The whole question cannot be settled by a Vote in this House. Whether the majority against the hon. Member for Northampton be large or small, it will leave the public mind exactly where it was before. No one who was in London through the autumn could have failed to recognise that these scandals have produced a great effect on the public mind. The wildest rumours are prevalent; let us for Heaven's sake know what is the truth. I earnestly urge the Government again to agree to an inquiry in order to restore public confidence.

*(11.25.) MR W. H. SMITH: I understand that it is deliberately suggested by the hon. member that a Committee of the House of Commons, or some similar body, should be appointed to inquire into the truth or falsehood of the rumours that have prevailed in connection with these charges—that is to say, that the names of a number of gentlemen, or rather of persons, because all people are equal before the law, who, according to the opinion that is entertained by the Law Officers of the Crown, have been falsely accused should be dragged before the Committee or other body appointed to carry out the inquiry, and that they should be pilloried and gibbeted, and perhaps injured and ruined for life by the institution of inquiry into the truth or falsehood of these rumours. Well, I think that a Government who undertook to authorise such an inquiry of such a character would be guilty of the greatest possible wrong to a number of persons against whom, according to the information that has been received, no sort of evidence exists. I will say at once that the Government will not be a party to such a proceeding. I can also say that we rely upon the completeness and fulness of the answer given by the Attorney General, and that we claim the judgment of the House upon the matter.

(11.27.) MR. J. ROWLANDS: I did not wish to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman while he was speaking, but he has made such a parody of my statement that I must explain. Nobody asked that any persons should be pilloried or gibbeted. We have had a distinct statement made us on a matter of fact that the police were not so active as they might have been, because the higher authorities checked them. That is the question I urge should be inquired into. No man in his senses would propose that all the names associated with rumours should be brought to light and be gibbeted, I only mentioned the disquieting effect of an impression that action taken by the Government had prevented that being done by the police which could have been done. With all respect to the Attorney General his statement will not be satisfactory to the people of London. One effect it certainly will have, to strengthen our determination to have the control of our own police, and take it from the Home Office.

MR. PICTON: The right hon. Gentleman has entirely misinterpreted the object with which this question has been brought on. It is not rumours with which the proposed Committee would concern itself, but the action or inaction of the authorities—surely a proper subject to bring before a Committee. No innocent man need fear being gibbeted by the inquiry. If the name of any person falsely accused comes up before the Committee, he will have the opportunity of clearing himself. No harm can come to the innocent person, but if the guilty escape it is a curse to the whole nation.

(11.28.) MR. MAC NEILL: I am most anxious that the hon. and learned Member opposite (Mr. Hall) should not have a false impression of what I said earlier. I simply said it was a remarkable coincidence—and I only put it as a matter of comment—a remarkable coincidence that the flight of Lord Arthur Somerset took place on the self same day as that memorable interview between the two friends, Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn, an interview which seems likely to become as famous as the Parnell-Carnarvon interview. The hon. and learned Member says—and I believe him—that Sir Dighton Probyn in no way had any communication with Lord Arthur Somerset between the interview with Lord Salisbury and the flight of Lord Arthur Somerset. But it is remarkable, and it is a fact we did not know before, that Sir Dighton Probyn came straight from an interview with Lord Arthur Somerset to the interview with Lord Salisbury. He saw Lord Salisbury at some railway station on the day of his last interview with Lord Arthur Somerset, and then the hon. Member, in a short description of the habits of Sir Dighton Probyn, told us how that gentleman went home to dress and afterwards dined at his club, both important occupations, but he did not come into personal contact with Lord Arthur Somerset. But the principal question is, what communication had Sir Dighton Probyn with Lord A. Somerset after the interview with Lord Salisbury?

*MR. C. HALL: I stated distinctly that he never communicated directly or indirectly with Lord Arthur Somerset or anybody on his behalf.

MR. MAC NEILL: It is perfectly certain that Lord Arthur Somerset was able to find out the result of the interview.

(11.31.) DR. TANNER: After the discussion which has taken place in the House this evening, I think people outside will ask themselves "What is it that the Government wish to hide?" Not so long ago, when charges and allegations were made against us, we were asked why we would not go before a Court of Justice, and now I am inclined to ask why the Government do not propose the appointment of a Commission to inquire into the charges brought forward by the hon. Member for Northampton. The Attorney General may smile and smile, and smile again, but we are growing accustomed to his smiles now. I want to know, seeing that these charges have been made in the strongest possible way, what it is that the responsible Ministers of the Crown are trying to hide. I think the Government have put in a poor, shabby, paltry, and mean defence. Lord Arthur Somerset, against whom these abominable charges are made, is a member of the aristocracy, he held a high position, and I want to know what was done to prevent him escaping from justice. Just compare the action of the authorities in this matter with their action in regard to persons suspected of offending against the Coercion Act in Ireland. Why, in my own case, when I was served with a summons for telling the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, a big force of police was employed to serve the document, although it was only an ordinary civil proceeding not even arising under the Coercion Act. Hon. Members who wish to address their constituents in Ireland are dogged all over the place, but the course taken is different when a member of the aristocracy is concerned, although he may be accused of a most abominable crime.

Why not give the people an opportunity of forming their opinion on this matter? I should have thought that, in the interests of justice and fair-play, we should, instead of this conspiracy of silence, have had some answer from the responsible and paid minions who are at present decorating the Front Bench opposite.

(11.38.) MR. PICTON: I understand the question before the Committee is whether the whole Vote on Account shall be passed. At present we have not had an opportunity of discussing it.

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is in error. The question now before the Committee is the reduction moved by the hon. Member for Northampton.

MR. PICTON: When a Division is taken on the reduction shall we still be able to discuss other points in connection with the Vote on Account?

THE CHAIRMAN: Yes.

MR. PICTON: I do not think the question has as yet been thoroughly discussed, and I therefore move that you do now report Progress.

(11.40) Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again." (Mr. Picton.)

The Committee divided: Ayes 82; Noes 202. (See Div. List, No. 19.)

Question again proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,725,003, be granted for the said Services."

Whereupon, Mr. William Henry Smith rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put;" but the Chairman withheld his assent, and declined then to put that Question.

(11.53.) MR. COBB (Warwickshire, Rugby): I only wish to make a few remarks. I was glad to hear the hon. Member for Cambridgeshire tell us for the first time in this discussion of the interview between Sir Dighton Probyn and Lord Salisbury. He said Lord Salisbury had no intention whatever of giving information to any one that a warrant was to be issued for the apprehension of Lord Arthur Somerset. I do not presume to dive into the intentions of the Prime Minister—

*MR. C. HALL: I never said one word about Lord Salisbury's intentions. I never referred to them. I simply quoted the remarks of the hon. Member for Northampton. He said it was intended that the information should be communicated to Lord Arthur Somerset. I said nothing as to what Lord Salisbury's intentions were.

MR. COBB: I should be sorry to in any way misrepresent the hon. and learned Gentleman. He told us that after the interview Sir Dighton Probyn went home to dress for dinner, and then went straight to his Club. The only assurance we have got is that he did not communicate either directly or indirectly with Lord Arthur Somerset or any one on his behalf. But we have not been informed whether Sir Dighton Probyn told any one that evening what Lord Salisbury had said to him. If he did, it is quite possible that without any intention on his part to communicate directly or indirectly with Lord Arthur Somerset, the information may have got to Lord Arthur Somerset through some third person. We have been told that Lord Arthur's luggage was packed in readiness for his flight before the interview between Lord Salisbury and Sir Dighton Probyn took place. But is it not probable that a man, knowing the position in which he was placed and the crime he had committed, would have everything ready to go away directly he heard that a summons was out against him? I take no interest in the facts of this case, but I am interested in ascertaining whether the law is administered impartially to rich and to poor. I think we are carrying on this discussion under great disadvantages in consequence of the absence of the hon. Member for Northampton, and I hold that we ought to have further time to debate this Vote on Account, as there are other questions which we desire to raise. I therefore think I should not be doing my duty to my constituents if I did not move that you now leave the Chair.

(11.57.) THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is under a complete misapprehension. The Vote can be discussed even if the present question is disposed of.

Motion made, "That the Chairman do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Cobb.)

But the Chairman, being of opinion that the Motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereupon to the Committee.

(11.58.) MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I desire to support the reduction of the Vote. We have frequently been told that equal laws are applied to Ireland and to England. Recently, when we complained of the Statute of Edward III. being put in operation in Ireland, we were told by the Home Secretary that it could be put in force also in England. Within the last few days we have seen a venerable pastor in Ireland and a lot of his parishioners—

(11.59.) Mr. FORREST FULTON rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

(12.2.) Question put, "That the Question be now put:—The Committee divided:—Ayes 196; Noes 78.—(Div. List, No. 20.)

Question put accordingly, "That a sum, not exceeding £3,725,003, be granted for the said Service."

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I beg to say that no division was challenged, Mr. Courtney.

MR. SEXTON: When you declared the Ayes had it that declaration was not challenged.

THE CHAIRMAN: I heard it challenged.

(12.10.) The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 206.—(Div. List, No. 21.)

Original Question again proposed.

It being after Midnight, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

ARRANGEMENT OF VOTES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Statement laid before the House, showing the changes in the Arrangement of Votes made in the Estimates for 1890-91, be referred to the Committee of Public Accounts."—(Mr. Jackson.)

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Mr. Speaker ruled this evening that the functions of the Public Accounts Committee are strictly limited by the Standing Order; and as the Committee will require a special instruction, I would ask the hon. Gentleman to withdraw the present Motion, and put one on the Paper sufficient for the purpose.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.) I have been in consultation this evening as to the form which will best carry out the intentions of the House expressed to-day. I have consulted with the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, and it is his view that the reference to the Committee must, of course, be limited by the functions of the Committee as defined by the Standing Order. I hope that explanation will satisfy hon. Gentlemen. I will endeavour as far as I can to give effect to the wish of the House as expressed to-day, and to act with the concurrence of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee.

(12.31.) MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): The hon. Gentleman has entirely missed the force of the objection urged by the Public Accounts Committee themselves, namely, that the Committee as at present constituted are not empowered to deal with such a subject as this, and that a special Resolution would be required to enable them to deal with it. Both the Public Accounts Committee and the Committee on Estimates Procedure, of which the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Mr. Goschen) was a member, have recommended that any change in the form of the Estimates should be submitted to the approval of the House, and not referred to the Public Accounts Committee. If this matter be referred to the Public Accounts Committee we shall not be able to deal with it except as far as it deals with matters of mere account.

(12.33.) MR. LANE (Cork Co., E.): I would ask the Secretary to the Treasury and the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the interests of public business to reconsider their decision in this matter. If the account be referred to the Public Accounts Committee in its present shape we shall merely be compelled to send a second Report down to the House, such as we have sent this week already. Unless the reference be accompanied by a special instruction from the House, the result will be the wasting of a week of the public time and a day of the time of the Committee, which has enough work thrown on its hands every year already.

*(12.35.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): My hon. Friend (Mr. Jackson) was under the impression that he was acting according to the views of the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee in the course he has taken. We by no means wish to oppose the feeling of the Committee in the matter, and we will postpone the Motion for two or three days. In the meantime, we will consult the Chairman and Members of the Public Accounts Committee to see whether we can agree upon a reference.

Question put, and agreed to.

Copy presented accordingly; to lie upon the Table.

ADJOURNMENT.

On the Motion for the adjournment of the House,

MR. SHAW LEFÈVRE (Bradford, Central) said: I wish to ask when the Vote on Account will be taken again?

MR. JACKSON: I have put it down for Monday; but it will not be taken on Monday.

IRELAND—THE CLONGOREY PRISONERS

MR. SEXTON: I regret, Sir, that the Government has not considered the urgent case of the Clongorey prisoners; but perhaps the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Madden) will now be able to make a statement. The House is aware that the tenant on the estate agreed that some of her out-houses, which were her own property, should be enlarged for the purpose of affording shelter to a number of evicted tenants who were in a poor and friendless condition. The agent of the estate made an affidavit, to the effect that the enlargement involved unlawful waste. The Act of 1860 defines the manner in which the summons shall be served. It must be served on the occupier or posted on the principal door of the dwelling. It was not served in either way; and the precept was not sent at all to the workmen who were employed. The Government acted under a complete misapprehension in the case, and on the insufficient basis of an improperly served summons they proceeded with a number of acts of violence the arrest, the handcuffing, and the housebreaking. Three batches of prisoners were arrested. The first batch was called on to answer a charge of disobeying the precept, and the second a charge of unlawful assembly. In the case of the third, which included Father Kinsella, the magistrate did not proceed to any action on the charge, but, in default of bail, sentenced them to imprisonment for two months which was double the maximum term to which they could have been sentenced under the precept. The first batch was brought up the day before yesterday before two Castle resident magistrates. It turned out that the precept had not been duly served, and the Government Justices agreed that the case fell to the ground. The Government counsel asked that a case might be stated. The curious thing is that when we ask for a case to be stated we very rarely get it; but in this instance the application was granted, and the proceedings were adjourned for two months. The defendants went free, and the cases pending were adjourned for two months. The second batch was tried yesterday and to day, the Court being again composed of two stipendiary magistrates. In the event, one of the magistrates held that there was no case against the accused, and the other took the contrary view. The result was that the men went free. The third batch of prisoners were brought before a solitary magistrate. They asked to have a case stated on this very point of whether the precept was duly served. The magistrate refused to state a case, and called on them to give bail. They declined to give bail, were sent to prison for two months, and are suffering imprisonment now. I am not competent, and not disposed, to go into this question in its strictly legal aspects, but I would ask the Government whether it is desirable that this priest and these 17 men should be detained in prison when if the same procedure had been adopted in their case as in the case of the others they would have been free at the present moment. I hope the Government will be able to see their way to order the release of the third batch of prisoners.

Mr. Sexton

*(12.43) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. A. J. BAKER, Manchester, East) The hon. Gentleman has imported into this question certain controversial elements which, under other circumstances, I should have thought it my duty to reply to. I think that at this late hour I can pass them by, and I am far from complaining, speaking generally, of the tone of the hon. Gentleman's speech. The analysis of facts which the hon. Gentleman has brought forward is one which appears to me to be substantially accurate. It is a fact that two batches of these people have been released, in one case because the Court thought the precept had not been properly served, and in the other because the members of the Court differed on the point whether there was unlawful assembly or not. On both grounds a case has been stated to a Superior Court, and I am far from saying that my opinion is adverse to the action originally taken. But no doubt the substantial conclusion is that two batches of men are free at this moment and the others are in prison. The two batches released cannot be tried afresh for two months, and an interval of indefinite length must elapse before we can learn on proper authority whether or not the precept was properly served. Of course, if no action were taken in the matter the persons imprisoned under the Statute of Edward III would undoubtedly remain in prison during all that time, with the possibility that at the end of that time it might be held that the precept was improperly served, and therefore the root of the action of the magistrates was not supported by reason or by law. Under these circumstances, I shall take the opportunity to-morrow of consulting my noble Friend the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland as to whether some steps may not be taken for the purpose of releasing the persons still confined to prison. I hope that answer will content the hon. Gentleman.

House adjourned at a quarter

Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 3rd March, 1890.

SAT FIRST.

Lord Ampthill, after the death of his father.

COUNTY COUNCILS ASSOCIATION
EXPENSES BILL.

Brought from the Commons; read 1^a; to be printed; and to be read 2^a on Thursday next.—(The Lord Herschell.) (No. 32.)

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.—(No. 28.)

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I wish to ask the noble Viscount the Secretary of State for India whether he would postpone the Second Reading of his Bill to Thursday next, because, unfortunately, the Papers he promised have not yet reached us; at all events, I have not seen them, nor has my noble Friend behind me.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): With regard to the Papers to which my noble Friend refers, I am sorry there should have been any mistake made. But I should like to explain to the House, because I think it ought to be known, that they were sent to the Queen's Printers early last week. I had a copy of them in my hand last night, and I had been told distinctly that they would be delivered on Saturday morning. It was my desire that that should be done, as the discussion upon the Bill was coming on. It is quite clear some mistake has been made in the matter, and I can only say that I had nothing to do with it. I will, of course, postpone the Second Reading of the Bill to Thursday next as the noble Earl desires.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I need hardly say that I am quite satisfied the delay in delivering the Papers has arisen from an accident.

Second Reading put off till Thursday next.

VOL. CCCXLI. [THIRD SERIES.]

THE WEST END SCANDALS—PERSONAL EXPLANATION—THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, before the business of the House is proceeded with, I wish to make one or two remarks in reference to a matter with regard to which I see that my conduct has been called in question in the other House. My Lords, it is said that I met Sir Dighton Probyn with the view of enabling a person who was exposed to a serious charge to escape from justice. My meeting with Sir Dighton Probyn happened in this wise. I was coming from France—I think it was on the 18th October. When I landed at Dover I found a telegram from Sir Dighton Probyn asking if he could see me in London. I had no notion what it was about—I imagined it had something to do with Foreign Office business connected with the journeys of the Prince of Wales. I replied that I should be passing through Town, and that he would find me at the Great Northern Railway Station in time for the 7 o'clock train. I missed the 7 o'clock train, but I arrived in time for the half-past 7 train, and Sir Dighton Probyn came to me there. He then informed me what he wanted to do was to ask whether there was any ground for certain charges which had been made in the newspapers against sundry persons whom he named. My reply was, that so far as I knew, there was no ground whatever for them, no vestige of evidence against anyone except one person, whose name it is not necessary I should mention, and I said that, as against that person, I understood that the evidence was not thought to be sufficient in the judgment of those whose business it was to decide. I think I added—but of that I am not quite certain—that rumours had reached me that further evidence had been obtained, but I did not know what its character was. My Lords, I am not ashamed to say that that is all I recollect of a casual interview for which I was in no degree prepared, to which I did not attach the slightest importance, and of which I took no notes whatever. The train started very soon afterwards. The interview was brief and hurried; and, as far as I know, the rest of the conversation principally consisted of expressions on the part of Sir Dighton Probyn of absolute disbelief in the charges which were levelled against the person whom I have indicated, and of answers of a more reserved character on my part. I cannot give your Lordships any positive information as to the precise language that was used at that interview; but I can give you negative information. I am quite certain that I never said, as has been imputed to me, that a warrant was about to be issued the next day, because such a statement would have been absolutely inconsistent with what I am certain I did say, that, in the judgment of the legal authorities, the evidence was insufficient. You cannot issue a warrant against a person if the evidence is insufficient. I certainly conveyed no secrets to Sir Dighton Probyn, for the best of all possible reasons, that I had no secrets to convey. I had been abroad, and I had no further information except mere rumour of the precise condition in which the affair stood; and I may add that I can aver in the most confident manner that the suggestion which has been made that a man of Sir Dighton Probyn's character and career could have appointed an interview with me for the purpose of worming out matter which he might use for the purpose of defeating the ends of justice is the wildest and most malignant imagination that has ever been conceived. For the rest, my Lords, the subject is not one that lends itself to extensive treatment, or that commends itself for lengthened debate; but I thought it right to say these few words, in order to give any noble Lords who might wish to avail themselves of it the opportunity of questioning me on the matter, should they desire to do so. To this House I am responsible, and I desire to act fully up to that responsibility.

STATUTE LAW REVISION BILL.

(No. 23.)

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Your Lordships are aware that a new edition of the Revised Statutes is in rapid progress, and that Bills of this nature are required in order to enable the expurga-

The Marquess of Salisbury

tion of the Statute Book to be carried on. If it is desirable that this Bill should be passed as soon as possible, as there is a volume waiting to come out as soon as the requisite authority is given by this Bill becoming law. The substance of this Bill has already passed your Lordships' House. It was comprised in a larger Bill which I introduced last Session, but which, to my great regret, was opposed in another place and dropped. Every care is taken to remove Bills of this nature entirely out of the region of controversy; and I would gladly have availed myself of any opportunity to obviate any possible source of objection rather than delay the progress of the work I have referred to, that is the issue of the volumes, which when their publication is begun ought to follow one another as quickly as possible. This Bill contains only so much of last year's Bill as deals with Acts of Parliament down to the end of the reign of William IV. That will cover the extent of the volume which is waiting to come out. I shall introduce, as soon as possible, another Bill to cover the ground of the remaining volumes which are intended to be published this year. I should add that there are some additional verbal repeals made in this Bill by reason of the Interpretation Act of last Session.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

LUNACY (CONSOLIDATION) BILL.

(No. 24.)

SECOND READING.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: This Bill is introduced to complete the legislation undertaken by the Government as to lunacy. Many of the enactments contained in the Act passed last year were inserted with a view to the consolidation of the Lunacy Acts, and in the Act of 1889 it was provided that it should not come into operation until the 1st May next, in order to give time for this Bill to be passed. It is simply a measure of consolidation, and it is hoped that every facility will be given for its passing. I may take this opportunity of saying with how much satisfaction I have observed that the Government have stated in another place their intention of appointing a Select Committee to deal with any further Consolidation Bill with a view to the new edition of the Revised Statutes, and also that the statement appeared to meet with general approval.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Monday, 3rd March, 1890.

QUESTIONS.

THE PRESS GALLERY.

MR. HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works if, having regard to the fact that there are 1,800 newspapers in the United Kingdom, reporting the proceedings of the House of Commons, it is possible to provide accommodation in the gallery for more than some 50 journals?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, University of Dublin): I should be very glad if I could provide more space for the Press than is at present allotted to it, but I fear that it would not be possible to do so by any rearrangement of the existing reporters' gallery, or to add to that gallery, without encroaching upon the places now reserved for Members of the House, and which, as is well known, are on crowded nights insufficient. I am afraid I could not, under any circumstances, undertake to provide seats for the representatives of all the 1,800 journals referred to in the question, but we do our best for the gentlemen connected with the various Press agencies by whom reports of our proceedings are distributed through the country.

IRELAND—THE OLPHERT ESTATE.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many tenants on the Olphert Estate, in the County of Donegal, who applied to the Land Commission before the 1st of November, 1887, to fix the fair rent of their holdings have subsequently accepted judicial leases at a rent agreed upon by landlord and tenant without adjudication by the Land Commission; and do the agreements so entered into between landlords and tenants on this estate out of Court owe, in many cases, their origin to the delay of the Land Commission in hearing applications to have fair rents fixed?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): From the Report received from the Land Commission it appears that there were no cases of the nature indicated in the first paragraph of this question. No agreement or consent fixing a fair rent for any holding on the Olphert estate, in the County of Donegal, has been lodged with the Commission since November 1st, 1887.

THE OFFICE OF HIGH SHERIFF.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government propose to take any steps towards relieving commoners who own land from liability to serve the office of High Sheriff, in accordance with the recommendations of the Select Committee of the House of Lords in 1888?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): Her Majesty's Government are fully alive to the importance of the subject to which my hon. Friend refers in his question, and the matter is now receiving their consideration.

THE TOWER WHARF.

MR. MONTAGU (Tower Hamlets, Whitechapel): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what number of barges were moored to the Tower Wharf in 1889 for the purpose of loading or unloading goods on the quay; and whether such goods could not be received and despatched by road?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincoln, Horn-castle): Forty-seven barges were so moored. The goods conveyed by them could, of course, have been carried by rail and delivered by waggon, but the cost of transport would be heavily increased, especially on stores from Woolwich, for which the river is a most convenient highway.

SOLDIERS' DISCHARGES.

MR. HANBURY (Preston) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what is

"The authority from which the Commander-in-Chief derives the power of cancelling the discharges of soldiers, with the grave effect of practically misrepresenting the facts of their military service," as described by the Auditor General; whether H. Holdgate, who was discharged from the Army by purchase in 1885, had his discharge cancelled in 1883, and thereupon has obtained deferred pay for 11 years' service in the Army, for more than three years of which he was in civil life, while in regard to more than three and a half years, although in military employment, it was as a civilian and not as a soldier; and whether, in addition to receiving deferred pay for nearly seven years, whilst absent from the colours, he has also received a pension based upon service supposed to have been rendered during that absence?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The War Office is in correspondence with the Treasury on the subject of the cancelling of discharges as to the best way of giving the benefit of former service to soldiers who may have been re-enlisted. The case referred to, like all those to which my hon. Friend has recently called attention, is about to be considered by the Committee on Public Accounts, to which a full explanation will be given. It will then be seen that the case of H. Holdgate would have been a singularly hard one if no means existed of giving him the full benefit of his service. During the greater part of the time mentioned he was rendering excellent service to the State in South Africa.

THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT COMMISSIONERS.

SIR UGHTRED KAY-SHUTTLEWORTH (Lancashire, N.E., Clitheroe): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether the Government propose to ask Parliament to extend the period of sitting of the Local Government Act Commissioners for the Settlement of Financial

Mr. E. Stanhope

Differences beyond the present statutory limit of December next?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RICHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): It appears to me probable that the Commissioners will not be able to complete the duties imposed upon them by the Local Government Act before the 31st of December next, when their powers expire. It is too early for me at present to form a positive opinion upon the point, but should an extension of time be necessary I shall be prepared, if the Commissioners concur, to propose legislation for the purpose.

ARMY AND NAVY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what action he has taken, or intends to take, with reference to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the pay, status, and conditions of service of the medical officers of the Army and Navy, which was laid upon the Table of the House in August, 1889; and whether it is his intention to print the evidence taken before that Committee for the information of the House?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The recommendations of the Committee would, if carried out, involve an annual increase of expenditure exceeding £100,000, for which no sufficient grounds appear to me to have been brought forward. I do not propose to give effect to the recommendations involving expenditure; and as regards the recommendation to confer combatant titles on medical officers, as I find that my military advisers are unanimously opposed to it, and the naval medical officers do not desire it, no change is proposed in the titles. It is not intended to publish the evidence, but if the hon. Member would like to see it I shall be happy to show it to him, or to any other hon. Member who may be interested.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS.

MR. DONAL SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland how many of the National teachers of Ireland notified their desire to be admitted to the July Examination of 1889 as candidates for promotion and were not admitted, and what were the grounds on which they were refused admission; have all the teachers, candidates for promotion from class to class, to give nine months' notice of their desire to be admitted to examination, and did the two teachers who passed the July Examination of 1889, and were not promoted, give this nine months' notice; did the Commissioners of the Irish National Education ascertain the efficiency as school-keepers of these two teachers before authorising their admission to examination as candidates for promotion; were the schools of these two teachers in an efficient condition before the holding of the July Examination of 1889; and, if not, what were the reasons for summoning them to that examination as candidates for promotion, in contravention of the rules regulating the promotion of teachers; what were the dates of the unfavourable Reports upon the school of the teacher from whom promotion has been withheld, and what were the dates of the inspections to which these Reports referred; what was the condition of the school of the teacher whose promotion has been deferred at the inspections which took place since July, 1889; and, will he recommend the immediate promotion of the two teachers who, in July 1889, successfully passed the final stage in determining a teacher's fitness for promotion, and were not promoted?

MR. MADDEN: The National Education Commissioners report that the teachers referred to in the first paragraph numbered 123. The grounds of refusal were various—such as unsatisfactory proficiency of pupils, falsification of school accounts, &c. The general rule is as indicated in the second paragraph. Both the teachers seem to have given due notice. As regards the inquiries in the third and fourth paragraphs, the cases of both teachers were at the time, in the opinion of the Commissioners, very doubtful, and it was with much hesitation they were admitted to the examinations. In the case of the teacher referred to in the fifth paragraph, his school was examined for results on August 16, 1888. The Inspector's Report showed that the school was not in an efficient condition. This Report caused the Commissioners to hesitate about admitting the teacher as a candidate for promotion. It was next examined on June 24, 1889, with very unsatisfactory results; but the Report did not reach the Office until it was too late for the Commissioners to countermand the teacher's admission to the examination. A subsequent communication was also received from the Inspector of a highly unfavourable character. The Commissioners, weighing all the circumstances, decided that the teacher, though a good scholar, was an inefficient teacher, and therefore could not be promoted to the first-class. In the case of the teacher referred to in the sixth paragraph, the examinations of his school for results on June 11, 1888, and June 17, 1889, were not satisfactory; and he was admitted to the July examination for promotion on the distinct understanding that if his answering proved satisfactory his promotion would depend upon the results examination of his school in June, 1890. The Government cannot interfere with the discretion of the Commissioners in the matter.

INSPECTION OF RESERVOIRS AND WATERWORKS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether, in view of the increasing number of reservoirs and waterworks now being built in this country, and of the danger to life and property resulting from any insufficient construction of the retaining walls, the Government will take steps to provide some system of inspection similar to that now in force with regard to railroads?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): There might be danger to life and property if such works as are referred to in the question were improperly constructed; but it seems to me that such danger would be local in its origin and effects, and wholly different in its nature from the danger possible from the improper construction or administration of railways. If it were deemed necessary that there should be statutory inspection of such works, I think it should be conducted by officers of the County Council, rather than by those of a Department of the State.

IMPORTATION OF STORE CATTLE.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Minister for Agriculture whether it is within the knowledge of his Department that there is a strongly-expressed desire by agriculturists in Scotland for the same facilities to be given for the importation of store cattle, for feeding purposes, from the United States as from the Dominion of Canada; whether there is in his Department trustworthy information of recent date with regard to the existence of disease amongst cattle in the United States justifying the continued enforcement of the regulation, that all American cattle must be slaughtered at the port where they are landed after crossing the Atlantic; and whether there are any objections to such information being laid upon the Table of the House?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincoln, Sleaford): The question of admitting store cattle from the United States of America has frequently been urged upon the Department; but, as the Government of that country is unable to comply with the conditions laid down in paragraph 4 of the fifth schedule to the Act of 1878, the present restriction cannot be relaxed. The Department is in possession of trustworthy information as regards the existence of disease in the United States. During 1889 no less than 47 cattle from America were found to be affected with pleuro-pneumonia after landing in this country. So recently as the 21st of last month a bull affected with pleuro-pneumonia was landed at Deptford from New York. The diseased portions of the lungs are now in the possession of the experts of the Central Department; and I am informed that they were shown to the Deputy Consul General for the United States, and it is believed that he has communicated that fact to his Government.

PRISONS.

MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department for what articles other than mats do contractors furnish materials to the prison authorities; are any of such articles sold in the open market in competition with their respective trades; and, if so, will he name them; and will he undertake that the information given in the Annual Reports of the Prison Commissioners, in accordance with the Prisons Act of 1877, shall be in the hands of Members a reasonable time before the Prisons Vote comes on for discussion?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. STUART WORTLEY, Sheffield, Hallam): I have obtained from the Prison Commissioners, and will show to the hon. Member, a list of all the articles made in prisons for which materials are obtained from contractors and which are sold to the public, distinguishing those in the case of which the contractor who supplies the material also purchases the product. The list is too long to read to the House in reply to a question. I regret that I cannot undertake to arrange an earlier presentation of the Annual Report. The year in respect of which it is made does not end till March 31. The preparation of the Report entails the examination of voluminous and complicated accounts, and the preparation and printing of elaborate statistical tables. The dates of the presentation of the Report of late years have ranged between July 24 and September 9. Every effort to secure the earliest possible presentation will continue to be made.

MR. QUILTER: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that the information he has just alluded to is not in the hands of the House until the Vote has actually been taken, so that Members have no opportunity of studying the Report?

*MR. S. WORTLEY: That is undoubtedly the case, not only in respect to this Report but in respect of other Annual Reports which relate to periods which end on the 31st of March.

IRELAND—LAND COMMISSION SITTINGS AT LONGFORD.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland what is the cause of the delay in holding a sitting of the Land Commission in the County of Longford; and if he is aware that the Commissioners have not held a sitting since February, 1888, and that there are an enormous number of cases pending?

MR. MADDEN: It appears from the Land Commissioners' Report that the hon. Member is under a misapprehension as to the last sitting in the County of Longford. The Commissioners will arrange for another Sub-Commission sitting in that county as soon as possible. There has been no unavoidable delay. There are in the County Longford at the present time 561 cases undisposed of.

POSTAL FACILITIES AT KNOCK.

MR. DE COBAIN (Belfast, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention had been called to the pressing necessity that existed for greater postal and telegraphic facilities at Knock, County Down, and, as this suburb has attracted a large number of residents, and was now a most populous as well as popular district, would he consider the propriety of giving the desired facilities at the earliest moment consistent with the convenience of his Department?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (MR. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): In reply to the hon. Member, I am glad to be able to state that, so far as postal facilities are concerned, arrangements have already been sanctioned for carrying out the improvements desired by the inhabitants of Knock. As regards the question of telegraphic facilities, I have to state that an offer was made in the early part of 1888 to open a Telegraphic Office at Belmont under a guarantee of £24 a year, but the offer was not accepted. I shall be happy to make inquiries as to whether the circumstances have changed.

DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the contemplated sale of the Delagoa Bay Railway, which Article II. of the Decree of 25th June last, purporting to forfeit the concession, directs to be made by public auction, and whether, in view of the importance of the Railway as a great commercial highway, the Government will take care that British interests in respect thereof will be duly protected?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (SIR J. FERGUSSON Manchester, N.E.): Her Majesty's Government have laid before Parliament all the information in their possession in connection with the railway. The Papers show the anxiety of the Government to use their utmost efforts to protect British interests connected with it. The Portuguese Government have replied to our remonstrances that they were willing to treat with the representatives of the Portuguese Company with a view to compensation for the seizure of the Railway, and have indicated that the English Company is in a position to influence the selection of those representatives, promising, in case of failure, to refer the point to arbitration; and it is understood that a Director of the English Company has gone to Lisbon with a view to the negotiations mentioned.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING.

MR. CAUSTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Board of Trade has determined, without inquiry into the circumstances of the case, not to proceed with any applications for Provisional Orders to supply electricity, if the Local Authorities refuse their consent, and thus to ignore the power vested in them by Section 1 of "The Electric Lighting Act, 1888," which provides for dispensing with such consent?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, Sir; no such determination has been arrived at. In view of the Sessional Orders of Parliament, the Board of Trade informed promoters of Provisional Orders that they could not proceed with applications unless the consent of the Local Authority was produced by the 25th February. Where, however, as has already been the case, the promoters request the Board of Trade to dispense with such consent, their application will be carefully considered, and if there appear to be exceptional circumstances connected with the refusal of the Local Authority, an inquiry will be held.

SCOTCH SCHOOLS.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a letter, addressed by the Secretary of the Scotch Education Department on 27th of September last, to Mr. C. Jamieson, a member of Forfar Burgh School Board, in which it is stated that—

“In view. . . of serious risk that, as now conducted, it (Forfar Academy) may in some particular be found to contravene the provisions of the Code, my Lords are strongly of opinion that such a resolution should be adopted,” that is, a resolution by the Forfar School Board converting Forfar Academy into a higher class school; in what particular, if any, has Forfar Academy been conducted in contravention or alleged contravention of the Code; whether, and when, the Forfar Burgh School Board were informed thereof; if he will explain what are the circumstances referred to in the letter from the Secretary to the Clerk of the School Board, dated 21st of September, 1889, which create the “grave doubts” in the minds of the Scottish Education Department as to the propriety of considering the academy as a school entitled to share in this Grant, i.e. the Probate Duty Grant, and whether, and when, these have been brought under the notice of the School Board; whether, inasmuch as the question of converting an existing parish school into a higher class public school is left by Statute to be determined on the initiative of the School Board, the Scotch Education Department have any power to compel School Boards to take such initiative; whether the Scotch Education Department can refuse payment of any Grant which is lawfully earned by compliance with the Code, in respect of any non-compliance, or alleged non-compliance, with conditions outside of the Code; and if not, whether he will explain the note appended by the Education Department to the Inspector’s Report of Forfar Academy, 9th of May last—

“That before Grant is paid to any part of the school next year, my Lords must, of course, be satisfied that the conditions attached to any payment under the Endowed Scheme recently before Parliament have been fulfilled;”

and under what authority the Scotch Education Department are acting in bringing this pressure to bear on Forfar Burgh School Board?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. P. B. ROBERTSON, Buteshire): I am acquainted with the terms of the letter addressed to Mr. Jamieson on September 27 last by the secretary to the Scotch Education Department. The question of the status of the Forfar Academy has long been matter of discussion, and, looking to the position and organisation of the school, the endowment which it enjoys, and the conditions imposed in connection with a Grant made under a recent scheme of the Educational Endowments Commissioners, the Department felt it right to point out the risk which they believed existed that the higher department of the school might fail to fulfil the conditions of the Code either in regard to school fees or otherwise, and thus forfeit grant. On educational grounds the Education Department agreed with the view that the higher department of this school should be made a higher class school under Section 62 of the Education Act of 1872. The initiative as to this rested with the School Board, who have, I understand, adopted this view. The Department had no power to bring pressure upon the School Board except by drawing attention to the conditions under which the Parliamentary Grant is distributed. Before paying Grant the Department must be satisfied that the conditions of the Code and the provisions of the Education Acts are complied with, and in connection with this they would have to inquire whether the conditions upon which a certain sum is contributed to the school under the Endowment Scheme sanctioned by Parliament are fulfilled.

Mr. Caldwell

INDIA—COOLIES IN ASSAM TEA GARDENS.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been drawn to the high rate of mortality among the coolies employed in the tea gardens in India; whether his attention has been drawn to the Report of Dr. Eteson, late Sanitary Commissioner of Assam, that—

“The ratio of sickness and mortality among the tea garden labourers as a class has been always very great,” and that—

“In many gardens it is above what is counted a frightful epidemic in civilised countries;”

that

“In 1886 the largest death-rate in any garden was 270 per 1,000, while in the following year even this terrible figure was far outstripped, for in one garden the chances of life and death were almost equally divided, there having been a mortality of 465·9 per 1,000 ;”

that the Civil Surgeon of Debrugurh, in his Report for 1884, states that—

“The conditions of child life in a tea garden are altogether so unfavourable that the wonder is how so many children succeed in passing childhood's stage ;”

whether his attention has been drawn to a case which happened in 1886, in the Mesaijan Garden in Lakimpur, in which the Deputy Commissioner states that—

“A large body of coolies left the garden, and came to the station complaining of ill-treatment. They stated that both men and women had been flogged; in the case of women, that they had been tied to a post in the porch of the manager's house, their clothes lifted up to their waists, and that they had been beaten on the bare buttocks with a stirrup leather by the orders of the assistant manager ;”

whether he is aware that in 1886 there was in existence in some tea gardens a dungeon in which refractory coolies were confined and tied down with ropes; and whether he can state that such abuses are now prevented; whether he is aware that, although by Section 116 of the Act the coolie is entitled to one day of rest every week, there is a tacit understanding between employer and labourer that the rights of the latter under the section would not be claimed, and that the Government is believed to support the planter in this arrangement; and what measures the Government propose to take under these circumstances?

SIR G. CAMPBELL (Kirkcaldy) : Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will, at the same time, answer a question which I have placed upon the Paper on the same subject. I beg to ask the Under Secretary, with reference to the employment of coolies in the Assam tea gardens, whether the Inland Emigration Act of 1873 limited the term of labourers under contract enforced by penal laws to three years, with many provisions for the protection of such labourers, and at the same time, with a view to the gradual substitution of free labour, provided an alternative system of free recruiting under ordinary engagements, not enforceable by penal methods; whether the more recent law has extended the term of enforced labour to five years; whether complaints have reached him that the provision in favour of free recruiting and free labour has been evaded by a system under which labourers enlisted without the safeguards of the labour law are brought to the nearest part of the Assam territory, and there, when far from their homes and when they have not the means of returning, are induced to sign long labour contracts, before they have seen the gardens where they are to be employed or have had any opportunity of offering their labour in the free labour market; whether he is aware that of late years the labourers compulsorily employed on many gardens have suffered terribly; and whether any steps are being taken to mitigate the severity of the system introduced under the last law?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham) : In answering these questions the Secretary of State wishes me to say that questions on the condition of the coolies in the Assam tea gardens are frequently asked in this House. They are based on facts picked out of the official Reports for many years past, and calculated to give an exaggerated impression. They are suggested to hon. Members either with the object of procuring the substitution of a system of free recruiting for the safeguards of the Act of 1882, or with that of stopping migration from Bengal to Assam. They give a most incorrect impression of the general condition of the coolies. As to the specific allegations contained in these questions, I may say, in answer to the first question of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), yes; the mortality has engaged the most anxious attention of the Secretary of State and of the Government of India for many years. My answer to the second paragraph of the hon. Member's question is that the Report of Dr. Eteson refer to bygone times and particular districts. The death-rate on an individual garden is often frightfully enhanced by an epidemic of cholera. In answer to the third paragraph of the question of the hon. Member, I have to say that I was questioned on this case last year, and I then stated that the manager in question was prosecuted, convicted, and sentenced to 10 months' rigorous imprisonment and a fine. My reply to the fourth paragraph of the question is that the Secretary of State has no reason to suppose that any such abuse exists now. In answer to the fifth paragraph, the Secretary of State is not aware of any such tacit understanding, and is certainly not supported by the Government. In reply to the questions of the hon. Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir G. Campbell), my answer to paragraphs 1 and 2 is in the affirmative. As regards paragraph 3, such complaints have been made, and have been carefully investigated by the Chief Commissioner of Assam and reported by him to be greatly exaggerated. This question illustrates one of the difficulties to be encountered in doing away with the safeguards of the Act of 1882. In regard to the general question asked by both hon. Members, I have repeatedly stated to the House that the Government of India has been for some time engaged, under the direction of the Secretary of State, in making the most careful investigation into the condition of the coolies in the Assam tea gardens, and the working of the Act of 1882, with special reference to the question whether that Act shall be continued any longer. As to the general condition of the coolies, the House will perhaps like to hear the evidence of an entirely impartial witness, the Rev. Isaac Row, Secretary to the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society. He writes in the Indian newspapers as follows:—

“I am much interested in the correspondence in your columns with reference to the tea planters of Upper Assam, and their treatment of the coolies under their charge, and I shall be glad if, in the interest of the cause of truth, you will kindly allow me to give my testimony on this subject. I think I may fairly claim to speak with some authority, as during the past two years I have spent nearly 12 months in the Brahmaputra Valley, and during that time travelled very widely over the country. My observations, therefore, have not been superficial and confined merely to a few gardens in the more settled districts; but my work as a Minister of the Anglo-Indian Evangelization Society led me to visit a very large number of out-of-the-way gardens, seldom, if ever, visited by strangers, and my testimony is that of an impartial witness, equally the friend both of the coolie and of the planter. As a rule, all the coolies that I saw, numbering tens of thousands, were remarkably well cared for by their employers, and I could specify many instances of special kindness and consideration on the part of the latter, of which I was myself an eye-witness. I am quite sure that there are hundreds of starving poor in England to-day who would be most thankful if they could only be as well fed and as well housed as are the great bulk of the people employed on the tea gardens of Upper Assam. I say this the more emphatically, because, in former years, I laboured much among the destitute poor of London. The misrepresentations so persistently made with reference to this subject are a great wrong, not only to the planters, but to the coolies themselves, of whom there are tens of thousands half-starved in over-crowded districts, in Bengal and elsewhere, who should be encouraged and helped to emigrate to Assam, where they might readily find lucrative and easy employment.”

SIR G. CAMPBELL: As the right hon. Gentleman has thought fit to read a long passage from an advocate of the continuance of the system, may I call his attention to the 4th paragraph of my question—

“Whether he is aware that of late years the labourers compulsorily employed on many gardens have suffered terribly.”

No doubt the hon. Member for Flintshire did quote statistics which are three or four years old, but I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether during the last three or four years there has not been an excess of mortality in some of these gardens?

*SIR J. GORST: The question of the hon. Member is whether I am aware that of late years the labourers compulsorily employed on many gardens have suffered terribly. In the opinion of the Secretary of State that statement is the result of a misapprehension.

SIR G. CAMPBELL: I think I am bound to say that, personally, I have made no such statement. The words are not mine. All I ask of the right hon. Gentleman is that he shall tell me whether the fact is so or not. I repeat that I made no statement on the subject.

SIR J. GORST made no rejoinder.

CEYLON.

MR. PHILIP STANHOPE (Wedgebury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware of the general dissatisfaction existing amongst officers of the Crown in Ceylon at the manner in which appointments in the Public Service have been made by Sir Arthur Gordon, the present Governor, and whether instructions will be given to his successor to inquire into and remove any causes of just complaint?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): Permanent appointments, except to the smaller posts, in Ceylon are made not by the Governor but by the Secretary of State. There is no general dissatisfaction in Ceylon at the manner in which Sir A. Gordon has filled temporary, or acting appointments, which it is supposed are referred to in the question. As a rule the Secretary of State does not interfere with such appointments, but in certain cases the propriety of the Governor's selections has been questioned by or on behalf of officers who conceived themselves to have better claims than those actually selected; and after careful examination the Secretary of State has decided that the action of the Governor ought to be upheld, and that the complaints made were not well founded. In filling acting appointments, or in recommending officers for promotion, the Governor is required to give weight to other considerations than that of seniority.

THE INDIAN GOVERNMENT AND AFRICA.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Indian Government has occupied any part of Africa on the coast opposite to Aden, or sent any troops there on its own account, or on account of the British or Egyptian Governments; and whether, as reported in the newspapers, a small force of Indian soldiers were lately engaged in some expedition into the Hara country and suffered considerable loss on their return; and, if so, what was the object of the expedition? In putting this question, I should like, with the permission of the House, to explain that I had not forgotten the observation of the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury that the time of the House would be saved by putting certain questions as to facts to the heads of Departments at their offices instead of inside this House. A fortnight ago I put a question to the Under Secretary for India on this subject, and I have not yet been favoured with an answer.

SIR J. GORST: I can assure the hon. Gentleman that if he has not received an answer, it has not been my fault. In answer to the first part of the question, I have to say that small detachments of troops from the garrison at Aden occupy the ports of Zeyla, Bulhar, and Berbera on the Somali coast. With regard to the second paragraph of the question, the object of the expedition was to punish the authors of a raid upon Bulhar in August last, in which 100 persons were killed.

BURMA AND SIAM.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any, and, if so, what, progress has been made in the delimitation of the respective protectorates of this country and of the Chinese Empire in the Shan States, under the provisions of the Treaty of 1886 between Her Majesty and the Sovereign of China; and whether it is the fact, as has been recently stated in the newspapers, that steps are being taken to determine certain questions of boundaries between British Burma and Siam?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: No steps have been taken to demarcate the frontier between China and Burma; but surveys are being made by the two Governments concerned of the frontiers of Siam and Burma.

THE SCOTCH MAILS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is cognisant of the fact that the mails despatched from Dundee and the East of Scotland on Saturdays, the most important mails of the week to the American merchants, to catch the Cunard steamers at Queenstown for New York, have repeatedly missed the connection where they should be taken on with the London mails to Holyhead; whether the Cunard Steamship Company have repeatedly remonstrated with the Post Office Authorities on the subject, their representations remaining entirely unheeded; whether the Dundee mail, which should have gone by the Aurania on 25th January, did again miss the connection; and whether it is in the power of the Post Office Department to enforce such reasonable regularity in the conveyance by railway in this country of important mails for America as will prevent the serious inconvenience to which British and American merchants have been of late subjected?

*MR. RAIKES: I cannot say that the Scotch mails for America have repeatedly missed the steamers from Queenstown; but, owing to exceptionally stormy weather on the 25th of January, the mails from Scotland missed the junction with the Irish mail at Warrington, and thus lost the packet from Queenstown to New York. No remonstrance on the subject has been received from the Cunard Steamship Company. The Post Office is in constant communication with the Railway Companies, with the view of preventing delay in the mail services; but occasional irregularities will happen from causes over which the companies have no control.

THE NEWINGTON VESTRY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the clerk of the Newington Vestry is alleged to refuse to make any later Annual Report than one dated 1887, though requested to do so by the Vestry; and will he order an inquiry into the matter?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Vestry clerk of the Parish of Newington is not subject in any way to the jurisdiction of the Local Government Board, and the Board are not empowered to order an inquiry into the matter to which the hon. Member refers.

*MR. C. GRAHAM: May I ask to whom this Vestry is to address itself?

*MR. RITCHIE: Perhaps the hon. Member will put the question on the Paper.

FISHERTON NATIONAL SCHOOL, SALISBURY.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has received complaints from the parents of children attending the Fisherton National School, Salisbury, that their children have received religious instruction contrary to their expressed wish and desire; and whether his attention has been called to a letter in the Daily News of 21st February, to which is attached the names of four whose children attend the same school, and for whom the benefit of the Conscience Clause had been claimed, complaining that, during the time of religious instruction, their children, with others, have been shut up in a porch, between the inner and outer doors, in darkness and cold, and without instruction?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The Department has received complaints of the kind described. It is admitted by the managers that owing to the confusion caused in the school by a sudden influx of scholars some children did, inadvertently, receive religious instruction, contrary to the wishes of their parents. The Department is making inquiries into the matter, including the allegations of the writer in the Daily News, and if the facts are proved is prepared to take ample security against any repetition of the circumstances complained of.

IRELAND—

BAILIEBOROUGH NATIONAL SCHOOL.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen the following paragraph in the Daily Express of the 24th February, 1890:—

“Bailieborough National School.—The examinations in this school were held in March, 1889, and as yet neither have the results been made known nor the premiums distributed;”

and will he explain the cause of the delay which has occurred?

MR. MADDEN: I have not yet received a Report. I must, therefore, ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question.

SCIENCE AND ART GRANTS.

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that the Regulation of 1889, requiring before a grant is made a certificate in all cases from the Committee having management of a Science and Art Class, in which the principles of agriculture are taught—

“That the students are, or are going to be, employed in a trade or industry to which that subject applies, or are going to be teachers of that subject,” has had a very detrimental effect on many of these classes; and whether he will consider the withdrawal of this Order in respect of classes in agriculture?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: In some cases the Regulation in question has diminished the classes in which instruction in the principles of agriculture is given, but only in localities where the subject is an unsuitable one. The general effect of the Regulation has not been detrimental to the classes in localities where that subject of science can be properly taught; for, as the principles of agriculture are an applied rather than a pure science, it would be a waste of public money to pay grants on students who were neither likely to be employed in agricultural industry nor to become teachers of the subject.

WEIGHING OF CATTLE ACT.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I beg to ask the Minister for Agriculture whether he is disposed favourably to consider the extension of the provisions of "The Market and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act, 1887," to auction marts where fat cattle are sold?

*MR. CHAPLIN: The administration of the Markets and Fairs (Weighing of Cattle) Act rests with the Local Government Board; but I should have no objection to proposals for increased facilities for the sale of cattle by live weight. There is a Commission now sitting on market rights and tolls which, I understand, has had submitted to it, amongst other questions, proposals for the amendment and extension of the Statute referred to by the hon. Member, and it may be desirable to wait for their recommendations before any decision is taken on the question.

SCOTTISH FISHERY BOARD.

MR. MARJORIBANKS: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any provision is made in the Scottish Fishery Board Vote for the present year to increase the salaries of the Board's officers; and what decision the Government have come to on the subject, in consequence of the consideration promised on the 28th March, 1889?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: No increase in the salaries of these officers is made in this year's Estimates, as the Government have not yet come to a final decision on the question.

CONNEMARA RAILWAY.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if the Report of the Commissioners on the line of Railway through Connemara will be published in sufficient time before the Galway Spring Assizes to permit of the selected line being brought before the Grand Jury?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Yes; the Report will be published in sufficient time.

COLONEL NOLAN: When?

MR. JACKSON: It has not yet been decided.

THE ZULU CHIEFS.

MR. ALEXANDER M'ARTHUR (Leicester): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will inform the House as to the authority under which the Chiefs Dinuzulu, Ndabuko, and Tshingana, having last April been sentenced to imprisonment in Zululand, have now been transported to St. Helena; what arrangements have been made, during the detention of these Chiefs in St. Helena, for the maintenance of the family of Cetewayo, which is dependent on Dinuzulu, and for the wives and children of Ndabuko and Tshingana; and whether Her Majesty's Government has sanctioned or modified the sentences passed on the seven other Zulus who were tried by the Special Court at Etshowe?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The authority for the removal of these Chiefs is the "Colonial Prisoners Removal Act, 1884." Sir Charles Mitchell reports that the families will be no worse off on account of the absence of these Chiefs, as the latter, of course, never did any work. They have plenty of cattle and lands; and the Secretary of State is ordering that they are to be fully protected in the enjoyment of their property. The cases of the 10 other Zulus have been carefully considered; the sentence in all but one case will be modified; and I may add that the sentence of death in Umpikwa's case will not be carried out. I shall be happy to show the Despatch to the hon. Member at a later date; but it is obviously undesirable that its details should be made public in this country before it reaches the hands of the Governor, which will not be for another three weeks or so.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. RICHARD POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as regards the proposals of the Ridley Commission, as set forth in their Second Report, presented in August, 1880, in connection with the Higher Division of the Civil Service; and when the Superannuation Bill will be laid upon the Table, the interests of the Service having suffered by the prolonged anxiety occasioned in the various Public Departments owing to the uncertainty as to the steps that may be taken to give effect to the proposals referred to?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I must ask the hon. Gentleman to be good enough to put the question down for to-morrow.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT SERVANTS—
CASE OF MR. W. S. FOULSHAM.

MR. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether a claim to compensation, made under the Local Government Act of 1888, by W. S. Foulsham, an Inspector of Weights and Measures for the old County of Middlesex, has been rejected by the Treasury on the ground that Mr. Foulsham held office subject to annual re-appointment; whether the Clerk of the Assessment Sessions, many of the Justices' Clerks of old Middlesex and other "transferred" officers, who, with the Inspectors of Weights and Measures, are declared by the Act to be entitled to compensation, hold their offices upon the same tenure; and whether the annual re-appointment was a mere formality, the office being practically tenable for life during good behaviour, Mr. Foulsham's two predecessors having in fact (though re-appointed annually) held the office for periods of between 30 and 40 years respectively?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that Mr. Foulsham on the appointed day held an office for one year ending November 12, 1889. On the termination of that period he was not re-appointed. In this case the Treasury did not consider that they were empowered by the provisions of the Local Government Act, Section 120, to require the County Council to pay any compensation. I may mention that the Treasury are informed that on the termination of his appointment Mr. Foulsham was offered by the County Council and declined other employment. There is no information at the Treasury which will enable me to answer my hon. Friend's question contained in the two last paragraphs.

CIVIL SERVICE WRITERS.

MR. JAMES ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury with regard to the writers in the Out-door Department of Customs (some of them of long service) now being dismissed from the Department, who were sent from their permanent employment to temporary duty to meet a pressing emergency, and, on the completion of the latter, were refused permission to return on the ground that the duty they had been engaged on had been completed; whether such dismissal is intended to exclude such writers from the benefits which the forthcoming Order in Council will confer on those writers serving in other branches of the Customs?

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I wish also to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether it is a fact that the usual Annual Statement of Imports and Exports, which is prepared for the Board of Trade in the Statistical Department of the Customs, was offered as overtime to the writers in that Department who are in receipt of 1s. per hour; whether these writers unanimously refused the account, upon the ground that they were offered less remuneration for overtime, namely, 10d. per hour, than they were in receipt of for the normal official day; and whether, as the result of their refusal, a number of the writers who were engaged in the outdoor department of the Customs, and whose services range from 8 to 18 years were removed from their posts, and transferred for the convenience of the Statistical Department, and placed upon the preparation of the annual statement; whether they have recently been informed that they will be returned to the Civil Commission, thus breaking their prolonged service at a critical juncture, and run the risk of depriving them of any benefits which may be conferred upon their class under the impending Order in Council ; and whether, in view of the circumstances referred to, some assurance can be given that, in the event of their return to the Civil Service Commission, they shall not be sufferers by the transfer ?

MR. JACKSON : The preparation of the annual statement of trade necessitates the temporary addition of copyists to the Statistical Office. It is ordinary work, and always paid for at the rate of 10d. per hour. It was offered to some of the copyists in the Statistical Office who are paid at the rate of 1s. an hour for certain special work, but they asked to be allowed to decline it, because the rate of pay was less than the 1s. an hour which they are paid for the special work in the normal official hours. The work was then given to copyists employed in the outdoor department. These copyists will, on the conclusion of the additional work in the Statistical Office, be returned to the Civil Service Commissioners, from whom I learn that work can speedily be found for them in other Departments.

MR. J. ROWLANDS : May I ask whether it is not a fact that some of the gentlemen who have been appointed to work on these statistical abstracts have been in the service of the State for a long period of years, some of them 20 years, and whether these persons are about to be dismissed ?

MR. JACKSON : There is some misunderstanding about that. It has been decided that the work on which these writers have been employed will be better done by some other officers. When a Department has completed a certain work on which it has been engaged, the necessary order is made, formally dismissing all the writers who have been engaged on the work for the time being. It is well understood that although these writers may have been employed for a great many years, they are not in the permanent service of the Department, but are being temporarily employed, and it is quite open to any Department, having completed its work, to dismiss the writers engaged for that purpose. As a matter of fact, I understand that the Civil Service Commissioners have been on some occasions rather shorthanded, and I do not anticipate that there will be any difficulty in finding employment for these writers, nor is it intended to inflict any penalty on these men by dismissing them.

MR. J. ROWLANDS : Are we to understand that these men, who are under notice to leave to-morrow, will not be turned out of the Service ?

MR. JACKSON : I think it may be taken that a notice from a Department with regard to the work of that particular Department does not amount to notice to leave the Service entirely.

*MR. C. GRAHAM : As this constitutes a great grievance to this class of men, I must press for an answer to the last two paragraphs of my question, namely, whether it is contemplated by the Civil Service to deprive these men accidentally or otherwise of any of the benefits their long service may have entitled them to, and whether, secondly, some assurance will be given that, in the event of their return to the Civil Service Commission, they will not be sufferers by the transfer ?

MR. JACKSON : I do not think I ought to enter into any engagement. I have endeavoured to explain the circumstances. The hon. Member refers to some benefit which may have come to these men under an impending Order in Council. It would be obviously wrong for me to give any pledge on the subject.

THE SILVER COINAGE.

MR. CRAIG (Newcastle-upon-Tyne) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amount of profit realised on the Silver Coinage Account in the year ended 31st December, 1889 ?

MR. GOSCHEN : I propose to make a statement upon this subject in the Budget, and I trust I may be excused if I do not anticipate it.

MR. CRAIG : Is the right hon. Gentleman not aware that the year ended upon the 31st of December last ?

MR. GOSCHEN : Quite so ; but I prefer to make a general statement.

THE CHELSEA TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.) : I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the total amount of the defalcations at the Chelsea Trustee Savings Bank ; the number of Friendly and other Societies depositing in such bank ; and the amount of their deposits; whether he is aware that since the failure some of these Societies have been unable to draw any money with which to discharge their obligations to members in respect of sickness and death; and whether some arrangement can be made for the payment of a dividend on account at an early date, so that Societies may be able to meet these obligations?

MR. GOSCHEN: The total amount of the defalcations cannot be ascertained with certainty till the books can be verified on receipt of the claims from the depositors. According to the Society's Annual Report of 1888 (the last one made) there were as depositors five penny banks, £356 8s. 6d.; 32 Charitable Societies, £2,640 10s. 9d.; 112 Friendly Societies, £9,045 5s. 11d., but this has not yet been verified. I have no doubt this is so. The liquidator would not be able to make these payments at the present stage of the proceedings. By direction of the Court the usual advertisement under the Companies Act has been issued to depositors to send their claims before March 18. The 21st of March is appointed for adjudicating on the claims, after which the liquidator will be able to proceed with the distribution of the estate. To assist depositors the official liquidator has prepared a special form of claim, which has been sent to each depositor, and all he has to do is to insert the amount of his claim and send it to the liquidator. This form has been approved by the Court.

THE VICTORIA DIVORCE ACT.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies is it true that the Government of England has advised the Queen to assent to the Divorce Act recently passed by the Parliament of Victoria; and whether he can briefly state in what respect does the said Act differ from the Law of Divorce in England?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The reply to the first paragraph of the question is in the affirmative. It is not possible, within the limits of an answer, to give a correct statement of the provisions of the Act, which are numerous, or to compare them with those of the English law; but it may be stated generally that the grounds for divorce are largely extended.

Mr. Howell

CHARGE AGAINST AN EMERGENCY MAN.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a case heard at Woodford Petty Sessions on the 24th inst. before Messrs. Hickson, R.N., and Burke, J.P., in which an emergency man named M'Keever was summoned by Constable Sheehan on a charge of being "drunk in the streets of Woodford on the 14th inst., and having a loaded revolver in his possession;" if it is true that a few hours after his arrest he was brought before Mr. Burke, J.P., by whom he was discharged, and who added that no further action should be taken; has his attention been called to the report of the trial, from which it appears that it was proved by Constable Sheehan that M'Keever, on being arrested, threatened to shoot him; that Mr. Burke, notwithstanding the protest of the presiding magistrate, persisted in cross-examining the policeman, and finally called him a "black-guard;" and that after M'Keever had been fined £2 and costs, and had paid that sum, Mr. Burke stood up in Court, advised M'Keever to appeal, and ordered the money to be handed back; and, if the above facts are correctly stated, whether the Lord Chancellor will make inquiry into the action of this magistrate?

MR. MADDEN: I have called for a full Report of what occurred, but have not yet received it.

*MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman be able to answer the question to-morrow?

MR. MADDEN: Possibly.

ARBITRATION IN TRADE DISPUTES.

MR. W. F. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the increased organisation of labour since "The Arbitration Act, 1872," Her Majesty's Government will appoint a Select Committee to inquire how far that Act and its predecessors have succeeded in promoting arbitration in trade disputes; to obtain information, as far as practicable, regarding Councils of Arbitration in Foreign countries; and to report on the propriety, or otherwise, of further legislation being initiated in support of the principle of arbitration by regularly constituted Boards of conciliation?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): Having regard to the fact that a Conference is about to sit in Berlin on this question, the Government think it would not be expedient to appoint a Committee until they are in possession of the information which will, no doubt, be placed before that Conference, and of the result of that deliberation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. WALTER M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the memorials presented to him in 1888 and 1889, largely signed by Members of this House, asking that a day might be kept for the discussion of the Women's Franchise Bill, he will undertake not to take Government business on Tuesday, the 4th March, before the Motion on this subject is disposed of?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sorry I cannot give an answer satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman. The debate on the Report of the Special Commission will take precedence of all other Orders until it is concluded. I am therefore afraid the hon. Gentleman will lose his day.

MR. M'LAREN: Then, when the right hon. Gentleman makes his Motion, I shall move that the debate be postponed until after my Motion.

MR. CREMER (Haggerston): Do the right hon. Gentleman's observations apply to Wednesdays?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Looking at the importance of the debate it would hardly be expedient to interrupt it until it is concluded.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman give an opportunity for discussing any of the important Motions which are down for those days?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: That question had better be asked at a later date.

MR. COBB (Warwick, Rugby): Will the right hon. Gentleman name a day for the Second Reading of the Allotments Act Amendment Bill?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; I cannot name a day.

THE VAN AND WHEEL TAX.

SIR EDWARD BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what number of memorials he has received from County Councils and other Local Authorities, asking him to supply the deficiency in the contribution promised in aid of rates, caused by the abandonment of the Van and Wheel Tax?

MR. GOSCHEN: In answer to the hon. Member I have to state that I have received memorials from 15 County Councils, 50 Highway Boards, and six Unions in favour of the re-introduction of a Van and Wheel Tax; I have received memorials from three County Councils in favour of a Horse, Van and Wheel Tax, and from 23 County Councils for aid to supply the deficiency arising from the withdrawal of the Bill, while five County Councils send suggestions by which, in their opinion, the amount required might be raised. I wish to draw the especial attention of the House to the fact that only three County Councils definitely state they are in favour of the Horse Tax, although the House will remember that of the £800,000 which the County Councils wish to obtain, over £500,000 would, according to my original proposal, have been drawn from that tax, and there appeared to be much less objection to its imposition than to that of the Wheel Tax. The enactment of the Horse Tax would replace £500,000 or more of the amount involved in the Excise Duties (Local Purposes) Bill of 1888.

TRANSFER STAMP DUTY.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer can he state the amount received for 1889 on account of the Transfer Stamp of 1s. per cent. on bonds and shares; and whether he is aware that men of business are by no means reconciled to this tax, on account of the trouble and loss of time caused by the stamping?

MR. GOSCHEN: I will take the opportunity of the Budget to make a statement of the amount received in the current financial year on account of the Transfer Stamp. I am aware that some objection was taken to the tax on its introduction. But no recent complaints have been made; and, indeed, I have never heard of any tax which is not attended with complaints from those who have to pay it.

PRE-VICTORIAN SOVEREIGNS.

MR. MONTAGU: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer the amount of pre-Victorian sovereigns and half-sovereigns sent into the Bank of England up to the end of February; and, whether he contemplates demonetising such coins which shall not have been sent in by the end of March?

MR. GOSCHEN: The amount of pre-Victorian sovereigns and half-sovereigns received up to the end of February is:—Sovereigns, £1,500,000; half-sovereigns, £80,000. The answer to the second question is, yes.

ARMY AND NAVY MEDICAL OFFICERS.

DR. FARQUHARSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what action he has taken, or intends to take, with reference to the recommendations contained in the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the pay, status, and conditions of service of the medical officers of the Army and Navy, which was laid upon the Table of the House in August, 1889?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Admiralty have had under their consideration the recommendations, three in number, relating to the Naval Medical Service, which are contained in the Report referred to by the hon. Member, and they are in communication with the Treasury on the subject. The third recommendation, relating to Yarmouth Hospital, involves an important administrative question, which has already occupied the serious attention of the Board of Admiralty. Owing to the peculiar difficulties of the case no satisfactory solution has yet been found.

PENSIONS TO SEAMEN.

ADMIRAL MAYNE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether an arrangement has been made with the Treasury to provide for the payment of pensions to seaman pensioners without taking the money from the amount properly available for Greenwich Hospital pensions: if not, whether the Board will cease granting seamen's pensions at 50 years' old until proper provision is made for them, and discontinue what they have themselves publicly stated to be "a misappropriation of the Greenwich Hospital funds, which they do not feel justified in continuing"?

LORD G. HAMILTON: No arrangement has yet been made with the Treasury on this point. In reply to the second part of the question, the Admiralty, whilst adhering to their opinion, are not prepared to withhold from the members of the Pensioner Reserve the payment of pensions to which they have a claim.

THE CROFTERS' COMMISSION.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether it is the case that the Crofters' Commission have determined 7,377 applications for fair rent since their appointment; whether it is the case that the total rental in these cases on application was £40,498, and the fair rent fixed £28,448, a reduction of from under £6 each per annum to under £4 per annum; and what is the number of cases where there has been a compulsory enlargement of the crofters' holdings under the Act?

*MR. J. P. B. ROBERTSON: Up to December 31, 1889, the Crofter Commissioners had decided 7,377 applications, the total rental involved being £40,503, or an average of about £5 9s. per croft, the fair rents fixed amounting to £28,450, or an average of £3 17s. per croft. Two hundred and eighty-six crofters in all have had their holdings enlarged under the Act; 35 of these cases were contentious to the end. In the other cases, where there was any opposition at the outset, the applicants and the landlords came to an adjustment during the proceedings.

LORD G. HAMILTON AND MR. LABOUCHERE.

MR. E. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty a question of which I have given him private notice, namely, whether he is correctly reported in the Times this morning as having said at St. Pancras on Saturday evening, referring to a speech delivered in Committee of the House by the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere), that—

"He himself listened with amazement to Mr. Labouchere as he sat there deliberately concocting and fabricating his tale, and endeavouring to associate Her Majesty's Government with this offence by charging them with a criminal conspiracy for the purpose of condoning the offence by enabling those who participated in it to escape from justice."

I wish to ask the noble Lord whether he used those words or any words to a like effect?

LORD G. HAMILTON: Sir, the substance of the sentence read by the hon. and learned Gentleman, though I believe not verbally correct, accurately represents the sense of what I said. To be literally accurate, I believe the sentence should read as follows:—

"He himself listened with amazement to Mr. Labouchere as he sat there deliberately concocting and fabricating the tale by which he endeavoured to associate Her Majesty's Government &c."

MR. E. ROBERTSON: Mr. Speaker, if I am in order, Sir, I wish to ask you whether the words admitted by the noble Lord to have been used by him on that occasion constitute in themselves a breach of the privileges of this House?

*MR. SPEAKER: I am not the judge of what constitutes a breach of privilege outside of this House. These words were used outside; had they been used within it I should have considered them a breach of Parliamentary etiquette. I am aware that several speeches have been made outside the House which I should regret if they had been made inside.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: I now wish to address a question to the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury—in his capacity of leader of the House and the guardian of its privileges whether he is prepared to consider the propriety of taking steps to deal with language which, on the face of it, appears to be a breach of the privileges of this House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I think, Sir, that my task would be a very serious one if I were called upon to deal with language used by Members outside of this House. I do not wish in the slightest degree to extend my responsibility, which is already sufficiently great. I am not, therefore, in reply to the hon. and learned Gentleman, able to give him the assurance he desires.

MR. E. ROBERTSON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he accepts or disclaims, according to old Parliamentary usage, responsibility for the language used by a Colleague of his own in the Cabinet?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hardly know, Sir, whether it is fitting I should be addressed with regard to the conduct of a Colleague of my own outside this House, and not in the discharge of any official duty. I say, again, that I think it is unreasonable on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman that he should ask me to express an opinion on a question of this kind.

PASSENGER TRAINS (CORRESPONDENCE).

Copy ordered—

FEE-PAYING (SCOTLAND) SCHOOLS.

Return ordered—

"Giving the name of each School Board in Scotland, in which fee-paying schools have been sanctioned under the Minute of the Scotch Education Department, issued in terms of 'The Local Government (Scotland) Act, 1889,' with the name of each such fee-paying school, the total number in average attendance therein respectively, and the average attendance of infants and of children in each of the six standards and Ex. VI. in each of the said fee-paying schools, all for the four weeks immediately preceding the making of said Return, together with the scale of fees charged in each of said fee-paying schools."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

NOTICE OF MOTION.

RULES AND ORDERS OF DEBATE—

MR. LABOUCHERE'S SUSPENSION.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): I rise, Sir, for the purpose of giving a notice, and of putting a question with reference to that notice, upon a matter of so much interest to the House that it is, I think, invested with an exceptional character, and I trust the House will permit me to make a few observations in order to make my notice intelligible. My attention has been directed to an occurrence which took place in this House on Friday night, at a time when I was not present, and which resulted in the suspension of the senior Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere.) The ground upon which he was suspended appears to have been the use of certain language with reference to an assertion of the Prime Minister's, and doubts have arisen in the minds of many Members whether or not that proceeding, unless it be accompanied by some explanation or declaration on the part of the House, might result in some limitation of the liberty of Members of the House to impeach the conduct of a Member of the Government in cases where the Member of the Government whose conduct happens to be impeached is a Member of the House of Lords, and where he disclaims or denies the matter of fact imputed to him. I am quite certain that the feeling on the part of the House that there should be no limitation of that liberty is general; and it is right that attention should be called to the subject, for it is a question of the utmost importance to hon. Members with reference to the discharge by them of their highest duties, and it is also one that should be set at rest at the earliest possible moment. I was not surprised to learn, on your authority, Sir, that this question could not be raised as a matter of privilege, and I thought it could not be raised on a Motion for the adjournment of the House, when matters are never allowed to be discussed which relate to the Rules and Procedure of the House. I have therefore framed the following Motion:—

“That this House deems it necessary to declare that when a Member of this House prefers a charge against a Minister of the Crown, which charge is denied on behalf of the Minister, such Member should not be restrained from refusing to accept such denial and persisting in his charge by reason that the Minister is a Member of the House of Lords.”

That notice is framed with the view of clearing up the question. I may express the hope that it may not come to be a subject of hostile debate; but the question ought in any case to be cleared up. As it is constitutional in character, and approaches nearly to a question of privilege, I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury (Mr. W. H. Smith) whether he will agree to allow me, as far as he and the Government are concerned, to make this Motion at the beginning of public business to-morrow?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am, in a measure, taken by surprise by the question of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I beg pardon. I gave notice to the right hon. Gentleman half-an-hour ago.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I understood the right hon. Member for Derby to say that the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would probably ask for a day; and I am, somewhat taken by surprise by the request that this Resolution should be considered to-morrow, and perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to consider to-night what course it will be right for the Government to take in the matter. I admit the importance of the question, and therefore I do not wish unnecessarily to delay the Debate upon it; but the right hon. Gentleman must see that it would not be well to allow any but the gravest matter to interrupt the important Debate upon which we are about to enter this evening.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: I shall reserve the notice at my disposal until I know the final decision of the right hon. Gentleman.

M O T I O N.

IRELAND—SPECIAL COMMISSION (1888) REPORT.

*MR. W. H. SMITH: Mr. Speaker, the Motion which I have placed upon the Paper is intended to complete what may be termed a judicial procedure. The words of the Special Commission Act, 1888, directed a Commission to be appointed to inquire into the truth of certain charges and allegations made against Members of this House, and to report upon those charges and allegations. It appears to me that this Motion is not only the natural result, but the only right consequence and conclusion of an important judicial procedure. We desire to place on record the findings of the tribunal appointed by Parliament solemnly and seriously, after prolonged Debate, and the Motion will in our humble judgment effect this fairly, impartially, and justly. We consider the course which we propose to take is one which will do absolute justice to all the parties concerned—justice to hon. Members whose conduct has been impugned ; justice to the other persons included with them in the allegations ; and justice to the newspaper which, in the first instance, gave publicity to these charges. [Ironical cheers from the Irish Members.] I notice the cheers of hon. Members opposite, but I apprehend that there is no one in this House—no one who is not extremely prejudiced—who would not wish to do justice even to the newspaper in question. I have always been of the number of those who have most deeply deplored the circumstances in which certain publications were made in that newspaper. I deeply deplore the publication of the forged letters, and I join in the satisfaction which has been expressed in all quarters of the House that the personal charges which were based on them have fallen to the ground. I have from the first joined most heartily and sincerely in that congratulation, but I will also do justice to those who, in the performance of what they deemed to be a public duty, have brought forward certain charges, some of which have been maintained, and some of which, fortunately, have been disproved. The Commission was one which was absolutely unique in its character. Happily for this House and the history of this country there has been before no occasion for the employment of any such machinery in connection with what is affirmed to be, and believed to be, a conspiracy against law and order. The body of learned men who conducted this inquiry are entitled in my judgment to the thanks of the whole English community for the absolute impartiality with which they discharged their duties—an impartiality which has been recognised even by the warmest supporters in the Press and elsewhere of hon. Members opposite. It must be remembered that the charges made were the subject of frequent debate in this House. On April 18, 1887, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, answering the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) said—

“The hon. Member for West Belfast can bring on the owner and editor as serious a punishment as he could desire through a Court of Law . . . Let him bring his case into Court ; let him have it tried where it can be tried fairly.”

Subsequently, in May, the hon. Baronet the Member for North Belfast proposed that the printer of the Times should be summoned to the Bar of the House, and, after a long debate, the Government offered to hon. Members opposite that a State prosecution of the Times should be undertaken in the name of the Attorney General. [Ironical Opposition cheers.] Again hon. Members think it right to cheer ; but there is not a lawyer in this House who does not know perfectly well that it would have been necessary to use the name of the Attorney General in a prosecution of this kind. The prosecution itself need not have been under the direction of the Attorney General, for the offer was made that any Queen's Counsel and any solicitor whom hon. Members opposite desired might be employed in the conduct of the prosecution, the only object and purpose of the Government being that in some way or other the charges which had been made should be investigated by a tribunal which was able to take evidence on oath and do justice to all parties concerned. That offer was not accepted by hon. Members opposite. They did not desire to place their case before a jury, and I make no complaint against them in respect of the course which they then thought right to take. The rejoinder that came from them was a demand for a Committee of this House to investigate the matters, and I then said, on behalf of the Government, what I still believe, that no tribunal could be imagined that would be more unfit to undertake the duty. We are charged sometimes with being unfair as to our views of acts which may be committed by hon. Gentlemen opposite ; but it may be imagined what would have been said if, claiming to deal with charges brought in this way in a spirit of absolute impartiality, we had constituted ourselves, by a majority, the tribunal before which all these charges should be considered. It is obvious that any political tribunal of that character would have been perfectly unfit to try questions of the gravity and importance of those which would have been submitted to it. The right hon. Gentleman opposite asked for the Committee, and the debate lasted for a considerable period. In the course of that debate the hon. and learned Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy) said not that the only question was that of the forged letters, but that the question was the personal charges brought against individual Members of the House. The hon. Gentleman said—

“ You know it is the Irish representation which is on its trial, and the Irish representation challenges you to the combat.”

Then the right hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) said that in his view the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) and his Colleagues were not only charged with falsehood, but that they were further charged with being the associates of, and in league with, assassins and some of the vilest criminals of the United States. Therefore, they recognised in 1887 that these charges went much further, and extended considerably beyond the personal charges to which reference is made in the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. W. E. Gladstone), and which are dealt with by the Commissioners in their Report. We were asked by the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. V. Harcourt) to submit the question of the forged letters and the truth of all the charges that have appeared under the head of “ Parnellism and Crime ” to a Committee ; and from time to time it was pressed upon us that a complete and full inquiry should be made by a Committee or some such tribunal. The question was again raised in 1888, after the famous trial which is referred to in the Act which was passed, and a Motion was again made for a Select Committee of this House by the hon. Baronet the Member for Cockermouth (Sir W. Lawson). The hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) himself asked for a Committee ; but the Government again felt that they must decline to submit to a political tribunal of this House the very grave questions which would have to be dealt with in respect of the conduct and character of Members of this House and those implicated with them. It is hardly necessary for me to go through the story of the Bill that was passed through this House, but I will remind hon. Gentlemen that it was an offer by the Government, in the first instance, as an alternative to the inquiry by a Select Committee. That offer was accepted in this sense—that the Second Reading and the previous stages were passed without a Division, and it was only in Committee that questions arose as to the extent to which the inquiry should be carried, and these questions produced very long and heated discussions. Hon. Gentlemen, therefore, were agreed as to the principle of an inquiry by a Commission. [“ No, no ” from some Members of the Opposition.] Well, I remember perfectly well that the hon. Member for Cork on one occasion said that he would “ hold the Government to this inquiry, and would not allow them to sneak out of it.” The House and the hon. Gentleman himself may draw what conclusions they please from the fact that there was no Division whatever against the Second Reading of the Bill ; and therefore, according to Parliamentary usage, the principle of the Bill was accepted without a Division. I admit that hon. Members objected in Committee to the scope of the inquiry and to the fact that it included other persons than Members of this House. But they accepted decidedly and completely the principle. How did Lord Chief Justice Coleridge define the charges which were made ? In the trial of “ O'Donnell v. Walter ” the Lord Chief Justice said that—

“ Members of Parliament and others ”—not Members of Parliament only—“ are accused frankly and plainly of abominable crime, not so much having been guilty by their own hands, but of having lent themselves to a system which must necessarily as its reasonable effect be accompanied with crime, and of having had a personal knowledge of many of the crimes which did accompany it.”

My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) said—

“ An investigation into the conduct of Members of Parliament to enable them to clear themselves was not the primary object of the Bill. The primary object of the Bill was to investigate charges which my right hon. Friend has correctly described as constituting a catalogue of melancholy and disgraceful crimes which had been left uninquired into and uninvestigated by those most concerned.”

We thought it right, as a matter of public interest and importance, as a matter of duty, that not only the truth, but the whole truth, should, if possible, be ascertained with regard to all the charges, without exception, which were made in the Times. I think I have now said enough to vindicate the course which Her Majesty's Government think it right to take upon the present occasion. We say that this Body was set up by Act of Parliament to make this inquiry—an inquiry in answer to the repeated demands made by hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, as they had failed to avail themselves of any other method of ascertaining the facts of the case, and we now say that the complement and completion of the whole business is the record of the result at which the Judges have arrived. What is the alternative presented to the House? The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian thinks it right to ask the House not to adopt the Report, not to thank the Commissioners for their just and impartial conduct, and not to order the Report to be entered on the Journals of the House. His opinion is that a Resolution should be placed on the Journals of the House expressing

"reprobation of the false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery," and he also asks the House to declare

"its satisfaction at the exposure of these calumnies, its regret for the wrong inflicted and the suffering and loss endured, through a protracted period, by reason of these acts of flagrant iniquity."

Now, if this were adopted there would be a record in the Journals of the Act of Parliament constituting the tribunal, but no record of the verdict, the exhaustive judgment, or of the labours of this tribunal. Instead of that there would be, if the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment were carried, a statement from which any one would assume that all the charges which were made were to be considered as false charges and were all based on calumnies and forgeries, that they all merited condemnation as acts of flagrant iniquity, and that, in short, the conduct of hon. Gentlemen, which is detailed in the evidence upon which a true finding has been given by the Judges, is conduct which is not reprehensible, which is not deserving censure on the part of this House, and which is, in point of fact, on the whole so meritorious that it deserves the expression of this House's sympathy. I am not in a position to accept that Amendment. It appears to me that we should do injustice to the very great gravity of the utterances of the learned Judges, who have found that in some cases, some of them important, the hon. Members accused have been completely exonerated from the charges made against them; but who have also found that other, and some of them very grave, charges, had a foundation in truth, and that the action of hon. Members had a serious effect upon the peace and good order of an important part of the country. These were very much wider than the personal charges, as the hon. and learned Member for Longford admitted when he said that—

"When Members are charged with complicity with assassins and dynamitards, with treason against the Queen, and other forms of political and human villany, there is no question whatever to be referred to a Select Committee."

And the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton said, on the same day, that it was charged against hon. Members that they were associated with some of the vilest criminals in the United States. Language as strong as that has been used, but I think it can be shown that the association has been proved to have existed to some extent, and if hon. Members did not know the character of their associates before, they know it now. The exposure of the character of their American allies has rendered, in my humble judgment, a great service to the country and some service to the House. The hon. Member for East Mayo was willing that the inquiry should be widened, so as to include every charge which could be brought against hon. Members opposite. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) accepted that on behalf of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). The charges have also been summarised in the language of Lord Chief Justice Coleridge in the action of "O'Donnell v. Walter." Lord Coleridge says:—

"The main issue is whether what is called in the Times 'Parnellism' is or is not founded on a system of cruelty, and rapacity, and murder, and crime."

And again—

"The articles contain a great variety of statements, and statements deeply incriminating a number of persons—Members of Parliament, persons not Members of Parliament, but well known to the world, and a number of prominent men, who are accused, if I may say so, frankly and plainly, of abominable crime, not so much, perhaps, that they themselves have committed with their own hands abominable crime, but they have lent themselves to a system which must necessarily as its reasonable effect be accompanied with crime, and that with regard to many of the crimes by which it was accompanied they themselves had personal knowledge."

Such, in effect, was the charge, and the Report with regard to it states—

“While we acquit the respondents of having directly or intentionally incited to murder, we find that the speeches made, in which land-grabbers and other offenders against the League were denounced as traitors, and as being as bad as informers—the urging ‘young men’ to procure arms, and the dissemination of the newspapers above referred to—had the effect of causing an excitable peasantry to carry out the laws of the Land League, even by assassination.”

Now, while we must all feel sympathy for men against whom baseless charges have been brought, and though we admit that they have been acquitted of the graver charge of directly inciting to murder, we cannot pass by altogether that of which they have been found guilty. The Commissioners add:—

“We find that, whilst some of the respondents, and in particular Mr. Davitt, did express bonâ fide disapproval of crime and outrage, the respondents did not denounce the system of intimidation which led to crime and outrage, but persisted in it with knowledge of its effect.”

If the respondents generally had acted as Mr. Davitt did in this matter what an amount of suffering might have been saved! Then the Commissioners go on to point out the effects of boycotting—

“The effects of boycotting,” they say, “were such as might be expected to and did create a well-grounded terror in the minds of those who suffered under it, and we come to the conclusion that this was the intention of those who devised and carried out this system. It is further to be observed that, though boycotting led in many cases to actual outrage, yet it was persisted in for years against the same individuals, and was generally recommended, notwithstanding the evils which plainly resulted from it.”

The respondents are found guilty of “persisting in intimidation with knowledge of this effect,”

and though exonerated

“of knowing that murder in some cases was going to take place,” yet it is found that “they were present at meetings where murder was talked of, and did not disown it.”

Thus at a meeting of the Land League, at which several of the respondents were present, Mr. Redpath referred to the murder of Lord Mountmorres in these words—

“He had had the misfortune to be in Clonbur when Lord Mountmorres was killed. The friends of the Irish peasantry had been altogether too gentle in their talk about the infamous rascal. He was a Government spy, and once bragged that he was in the pay of the Castle. He made very disrespectful remarks about Fenians. If they were going to do that they should keep out of the west of Ireland, or they would be hurt.”

Upon this the Commissioners state—

“We find no repudiation of this speech by those present, and on the 29th of November, 1880, two Resolutions of the Land League were passed, one thanking Mr. Redpath for his services in the cause of the toiling masses in Ireland, and the other requesting him to give his services in the Land League movement in America in lieu of Mr. Davitt, who was coming back to Ireland.”

And then there is Mr. Davitt's letter in May, 1882, to the Standard, in which he expressed the loathing which he felt for outrage, his belief that a pilgrimage to denounce assassination and outrage ought to be made, and that, had it been made before, he firmly believed that the terrible tragedy of the Phoenix Park and many another tragedy which, though it had not attracted so much attention, had wrung heart-strings as bitterly, would never have occurred. There was one man above all others who could have effectually denounced crime, and if he and the hon. Gentlemen associated with him had done so, and had acted as Mr. Davitt did, what an amount of misery might have been saved! Well, such are some of the charges which have been proved. No doubt the Commissioners find that others of the charges—personal charges—were without foundation. But the Amendment would pass by unheeded the grave charges which have been proved, and practically exonerate hon. Gentlemen opposite in respect to them. Such an exoneration would, in fact, practically applaud them for having entered into a criminal conspiracy, “illegal both in its objects and the means which were adopted.” We cannot accept this course. The respondents are found to have entered into an alliance with and to have been supported by the American Fenians, including the Clan-na-Gael—“a body actively engaged in promoting the use of dynamite for the destruction of life and property in England.” The Report finds that they invited and obtained the assistance and co-operation of the Physical Force Party, including the Clan-na-Gael; that they abstained from repudiating or condemning the action of that Party; that they invited the assistance and co-operation of,

and accepted subscriptions from, Patrick Ford, a known advocate of crime and the use of dynamite. This finding would rather seem to imply that they knew all about the Clan, and invited their assistance, but that it is not proved that they knew the particular fact of the complete supremacy of the Clan in the American League, and that the Parliamentary Fund was supplied by the Clan. They are entitled to the benefit of that. Lastly, there is the grave charge of conspiracy to obtain separation. It will be admitted that this is a political charge of the most serious importance. It is proved that Mr. Davitt and seven other of the respondents are guilty of this charge. It is found that some of them established and joined in the Land League organisation with the intention to bring about the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation. The organisation was established for that purpose. In its origin it aimed at separation. This is the charge which is held to be proved. The Commissioners said guardedly,

"Some at least of the leaders of the movement joined it as a means of obtaining the complete separation of Ireland from England, but we do not think that the mere joining the Land League necessarily implied a desire for such separation."

They also say that a large force in favour of complete separation would follow such leaders is apparent, and the Report finds too that Mr. Parnell "Used language indicating a desire for the complete separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom."

Well, Sir, I think few will deny that these are grave charges, and cannot permit a "clean bill" to be given to the respondents. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman would practically be a condonation of crime. It cannot be said even that the respondents considered that they were unimportant charges, and that the whole accusation was contained in the personal charge against the Member for Cork. But now, Sir, I have no doubt I shall be asked why the Government propose to proceed no further. Why is it the Government proceed no further than the Resolution I move to enter the Judges' Report on the Journals of the House; my answer is because it was no part of our intention at any time to constitute a Commission for the purpose of obtaining evidence to inflict punishment. The primary object was to obtain the truth whether the charges were true or false, and the Bill specially provided that all who gave witness of the truth would receive indemnity for so doing. On this point the Bill was clear. Sections 10 and 11 are as follows:—

"10. (1) Every person examined as a witness under this Act who, in the opinion of the Commissioners, makes a full and true disclosure touching all the matters in respect of which he is examined, shall be entitled to receive a certificate signed by the Commissioners, stating that the witness has on his examination made a full and true disclosure, as aforesaid. (2) If any civil or criminal proceeding is thereafter at any time instituted against any such witness in respect of any matter touching which he has been so examined, the Court having cognizance of the case shall, on proof of the certificate, stay the proceeding, and may, in its discretion, award to the witness such costs as he may be put to in or by reason of the proceeding; provided that nothing in this section shall be deemed to apply in the case of proceedings for having given false evidence at an inquiry held under this Act, or of having procured, or attempted or conspired to procure, the giving of such evidence."

"11. This Act may be cited as the Special Commission Act, 1888."

And as my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary stated—

"The primary object of the Bill was to investigate charges which have been left uninvestigated by those who are most concerned."

My right hon. Friend spoke definitely on this point. He said—

"A statutory Commission has never been used as an instrument for the prosecution of people, and that is why you cover it with indemnity. You use it as the instrument for discovering the truth on an occasion of such great public importance as to warrant the creation of an extraordinary tribunal of this sort. Why is it that you shut the door against punishment and against all those consequences which are the root and foundation of all that is precise and accurate in your Criminal Law? It is because you want to discover the truth of the matter."

As I have said, our desire was to obtain the truth in the interests of the whole community, including the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. It was on that ground the Commission was granted. I ask the House to adopt the Report without colour, without adding a word by way of preface. I ask the House, in the second place, to give its thanks to the Judges, who have so ably and labouriously discharged their duties. The task imposed upon them was a most painful one, and it was with great satisfaction that in a newspaper representing hon. Gentlemen opposite I observed it stated that the Judges had vindicated the absolute impartiality of the English Judges. It is with regret that I observe the right hon. Gentleman omits to include in his Amendment any recognition of the services of the learned Judges who have acted as Special Commissioners. Whatever may be the view which the right hon. Gentleman and his friends entertain of the conduct of the Government in asking the House to pass the measure which became law in 1888 under which these learned gentlemen were appointed, there can, I imagine, be but one opinion as to the absolute impartiality with which they discharged the most painful duty which was imposed upon them. I am glad, as I have observed, to notice that even the strongest partisans in the Press of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends have recognised frankly and fairly the absolute impartiality of the Commissioners. It is no more than I should expect from honourable opponents, but I venture to think for myself that we owe a great debt of gratitude to those gentlemen for the patience, the justice, and the discrimination which they have shown in the discharge of, I admit, the painful duty imposed upon them. The labour has been severe, but I can best express the temper and the spirit in which they have approached the discharge of their duties by quoting the words of the President himself, who says—

“Conscious that throughout this great inquiry we have sought only the truth, we trust that we shall be guided to find it, and set it forth plainly in the sight of all men.”

There can be, I think, no doubt in the mind of any man, whatever his political feelings may be, that the Commissioners have indeed “sought and set out the truth plainly in the sight of all men.” The attempt to call the offences political was absurd. Time cannot change the character of the offences or their nature, nor can Party exigencies. [Ironical Opposition Cheers.] I am exceedingly glad to hear those cheers and that there is a disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway to return to those ancient methods—[Mr. T. P. O’CONNOR: Ancient alliances]—those ancient methods—[Mr. T. P. O’CONNOR:

Mr. W. H. Smith

Alliances]—of honesty. [Cries of “Oh!”] I beg pardon; I do not impute to them dishonesty, but my contention is that the influence they have exercised on the unfortunate tenant-farmers of Ireland has been destructive of their ancient character for honesty. Is it seriously contended by the Liberal Party that the methods denounced by the Commissioners are legitimate weapons of Party warfare? Is that the view of the right hon. Gentleman? Do they identify themselves with acts which up to 1885 they condemned? Are Home Rule and an Irish Parliament to be set up on the ruins which boycotting and intimidation have left, on the abolition of all personal liberty and freedom, on the destruction of any rights of property which the law has solemnly recognised, and on the misery, suffering, and destruction of all who refuse to obey, or hesitate to obey, the mandates of an irresponsible League? Is this to be the basis on which a representative and responsible Government is to be created in Ireland, and if in Ireland, why not in England? The right hon. Gentleman may say that the misery which has existed in Ireland, the difficulty of paying the rent (which is alleged as the cause of these offences), is an excuse, if not a justification, for the outrage and disturbances and defiance of the law which have existed in connection with the Home Rule agitation; but he must remember the occasions on which he has himself alleged that the Land Laws of Ireland are more favourable to the tenant and to the occupier than any which existed in any quarter of the civilised globe. He must remember his own declarations that the provisions of the Land Acts, for which he is responsible, ought to give satisfaction to the tenant and security to the landlord; and he will know that it has always been held that even hardship does not justify the contempt of all law, and the infliction of suffering and misery upon perfectly harmless and helpless individuals who refuse to carry out the behests of a society which seeks to enforce its rules and its laws regardless of the interests of the community at large. If these things are to be done in Ireland, why should they not be done in Scotland and in England? Why, if they are to be done with reference to the land, are they not to be done with regard to the other relations in which debtors and creditors stand to each other in the same position of hardship so far as the debtor is concerned? Are we now, in the 19th century, to depart altogether from those conditions which have hitherto been held to be necessary to the prosperity of any civilised land? It is true "political economy" is banished to Jupiter and Saturn, but there has been hitherto a belief in the necessity of enforcing the obligations which the State itself has revised and recognised as fair and just. In our progress towards liberty, in our advance towards good government, are all the experiences of past generations to be set at naught? Is the mandate of an illegal Association alone to determine whether legal obligations shall or shall not be discharged, which have not only been the result of contract, but have received the approval of the State itself? Sir, this prospect afforded by the alliance of a great Party with doctrines which can only be regarded as anarchical is one which must make a man pause and hesitate. If political necessities compel them to imperil the very existence of society, it may become a question whether even the maintenance of Party government in this country, which has in the past done so much to advance and develop our Parliamentary institutions, may not be regarded in these latter days rather as a curse than a blessing. If only a few years ago I or any of my hon. Friends had ventured to prophesy that the Liberal Party would be found ranging itself on the side of those whose language they denounced, whose acts they alleged to be, and believed to be, criminal, no words of condemnation would have been too strong in the mouths of our political opponents in denouncing us for such an anticipation. Alas! it has come to pass; and I can only hope and believe that the people of this country, and even the people of Ireland, will come to realise how dangerous to the best interests of the State are the temptations to which the right hon. Gentleman and his friends have succumbed.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, Parliament having constituted a Special Commission to inquire into the charges and allegations made against certain members of Parliament and other persons, and the Report of the Commissioners having been presented to Parliament, this House adopts the Report, and thanks the Commissioners for their just and impartial conduct in the matters referred to them; and orders that the said Report be entered on the journals of this House."—

(Mr. W. H. Smith.)

(5.35.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Mid Lothian): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move the Amendment of which I have given notice. It is to leave out all the words after "House," in line 5, in order to add the words—

"Deems it to be a duty to record its reprobation of the false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery, which have been brought against Members of this House, and particularly against Mr. Parnell: and, while declaring its satisfaction at the exposure of these calumnies, this House expresses its regret for the wrong inflicted and the suffering and loss endured, through a protracted period, by reason of these acts of flagrant iniquity."

In the temperate speech of the right hon. Gentleman there are several passages which would invite remarks. I do not propose to dwell on them, though I might be tempted to ask what are those periods in the past when the application of honest principles gave, as he says, prosperity to Ireland? On one of his observations I wish to make a comment, and it is on the construction he has given to the Amendment. He states that in the Amendment, fairly construed, the language is such as to lead to the impression that everything noticed by the Commissioners, everything done by Irish Members, receives the sanction of that Amendment. Now, I should have thought it hardly possible for the right hon. Gentleman to fall into such an error, because the reprobation which is recorded is directed to—

"The false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery, which has been brought against Members of this House."

It is impossible that the right hon. Gentleman can suppose that it is intended by the Amendment to convey that all those assertions of censure which have been made by the Parliamentary Commission "are charges of the basest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery." Consequently, I put it to the House that the right hon. Gentleman's construction of the Amendment entirely falls to the ground. He is quite right in stating that the Amendment bestows no censure upon the conduct of

hon. Members, and to that part of the subject, of course, it will be my duty to refer. The right hon. Gentleman occupied the earlier part of his speech with a defence of the conduct of the Government. Now this subject, I must own, to me, as connected with the Opposition, is, in that point of view, a tempting one, but I will not follow the right hon. Gentleman on this occasion. I desire to avoid on this occasion, for a reason which appears to me even more than sufficient, all Party-recrimination. Tempting as the opportunity is, I entirely refuse it. For I ask myself, whose character and honour are at issue to-night and will be principally affected by the Vote the House is about to give? In some sense the three Judges are upon their trial; in some sense the Irish Members of the Nationalist Party are upon their trial; in some sense the Government may be upon its trial; but, Sir, it is mainly the House that is upon its trial. It is the character of the House, which, when brought to the tribunal of history, no Parliament, as well as no Party, can finally avoid; it is the character of the House which will suffer or gain according as on this occasion its course is wise and just, or according as it has been led into setting a precedent in my opinion unworthy of its high honour and highly dangerous as an example of future Parliaments. There is one point which I will explain at once, for it is one on which I do not think there can be any quarrel on principle between the right hon. Gentleman and myself. He invites us to thank the Judges of the Commission "for their just and impartial conduct in the matters referred to them." It is not on account of a fundamental difference as to the conduct of the Commissioners that I have hesitated to embody these thanks in my Amendment. It appears to me to be a questionable and hazardous proceeding to introduce into the course of our political action the practice of rendering formal thanks for the performance of judicial duty. I own that I have very considerable apprehensions on that subject. This House must necessarily be swayed from time to time by passion leading it in this direction or that. It has been our object to keep the action of the Judges separated by the widest possible interval from all our proceedings and from the temper and heat that here occasionally prevail. Here is an occasion in which all feelings have been stirred and roused from their depths, and in which the Judges have been called in to deal with a large portion of the subject matter, and I own I have very great doubts indeed as to the policy of rendering to them the formal thanks of the House. But I will not grudgingly render to the Judges what personally I can. An hon. Friend of mine sitting behind me has expressed a desire to insert words in the Amendment, "To acknowledge the zeal of the Commissioners in the discharge of the arduous duties imposed upon them." Well, I am ready to acknowledge their zeal, and I am ready to acknowledge more than their zeal. I acknowledge their ability, their assiduity, and their perfect and absolute good faith. Though I may reserve to myself the right to criticise freely some of their statements, yet I do not think there is a line of that Report from beginning to end which has not been written by the Judges in absolute honour and good faith. And accordingly in what I may now say I beg it to be remembered that it is under the reservation of what I have just said and which I do not, in the slightest degree, desire to qualify. What I have said of the Judges I think I may have been able to say of many a speech I have heard delivered in this House. Such temper and disposition and such honour and good faith do not expel from the human mind and from human action all the effects of prepossession. In this Report, as I think, along with the amplest evidence of every quality I have described, there are defects, and there are errors—

"Quas aut incuria fudit,

"Aut humana parum cavit natura."

I hope I have satisfied the House that I do not look in a grudging or unworthy spirit at the action and proceedings of the Judges, and accordingly if I claim, and it is a duty to claim—I am compelled by the action taken by the other side to claim—a liberty to criticise that Report, that will not imply any defect of fair and equitable intention towards those on whom we imposed a heavy burden, and who, I am bound to say, whatever view we may take of the political prepossessions—well, political sentiments, I will not even say prepossessions

—with which they entered on the inquiry, have in every respect, I think, fulfilled the best and fullest expectations which we could possibly have entertained of them. So much for the Judges; and now I come to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. I will not dwell upon the serious addition that he proposes to make to the burden of the Journals of this House by inscribing upon them the 120 pages of this Report. I should have thought that if the House were to deal with this Report it ought to have been presented to us not wholesale but in parts. As far as I know, that is the course which has been pursued upon former occasions—not upon occasions of Commissions like this, for, as the right hon. Gentleman says, there has been no Commission like this before, and I hope there may never be again. When bodies acting by delegated powers, or by powers not supreme—for example, a Committee of this House—have made a Report, and when it has been intended to induce the House to adopt the Report, the regular and Parliamentary course, I believe, has been to move that the Report be read, in order that it may be adopted freely and with full consideration of all its parts. But was there ever seriously made to a deliberate body such a proposal as is now made to us when we are asked, with reference to a document of 120 folio pages, bristling throughout with contested and disputable matter, to accept it in the lump, and at once to pledge ourselves to every proposition it contains? If the purpose of the Government had been to secure our adhesion to the main propositions of the Report—namely, to the findings—the course was obvious and open for the right hon. Gentleman to follow. He had only to propose that the findings should be adopted by the House, and undoubtedly then the decision of the House of Commons would have been taken upon a considerably narrowed issue. But I submit that the demand he now makes upon us, that we should adopt this Report of 120 pages, considering the multitude of varied propositions it contains, is alike contrary to the usage of Parliament in analogous cases and, I must say, to the dictates of propriety and of common sense. If it is said that we are totally unable through a Select Committee to deal with a question of this kind, are we more fit to adopt the present course? Observe, that when the right hon. Gentleman refused the repeated demand for reference to a Select Committee he stood in this position of advantage—that in acceding to it he would have had the unanimous assent of the House. The demand was the demand of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork and the whole of the Irish Nationalist Party. It was thoroughly supported and approved by the Liberals on this side of the House. But the right hon. Gentleman, with his extreme scrupulousness and tenderness for the position of the Irish Members, would not allow their case to be submitted to the consideration of a Select Committee, a political tribunal. If because of our political colour we are unable to investigate the facts, I want to know how we have acquired a better capacity for that purpose now when we are called upon without examination, without inquiry, and without the slightest discrimination between any one proposition in the Report and another, to swallow the whole from beginning to end. Now, Sir, I will illustrate what I have said about some of the judgments in this Report in respect of which I find it necessary to reserve my liberty of criticism, and I will point out a few of the propositions to which hon. Members are going to be invited to-night to append their subscription and approval. I say that this Report contains a number of opinions given upon issues which are in no sense and in no degree judicial. A serious question arose before the Commission whether the agitation and the Land League were the causes of crime in Ireland, or whether it was due to other causes. Four other causes were brought before them as causes of crime, or causes of the cessation of that crime. The first was eviction and fear of eviction—I am now in 1879 and 1880. And I must offer this practical criticism upon the Report, that it is extremely unfortunate that in these findings generally there is no reference at all to period. We shall presently see that that is a matter of the most vital importance. The Commissioners say, on the top of page 86, that evictions and the fear of evictions were not the causes of crime but on the bottom of the page they say that the increase of evictions and the result of the agitation against the landlords were contributory causes; consequently, it all comes back to the agitation. We are told that we have no right to look at evictions as having contributed to the increase of crime. They have of themselves, we are informed, induced to crime; but we must look to the causes of evictions, and the causes of the evictions are the causes of the increase of crime. This is an issue which is absolutely non-judicial. In what way can these three Judges, sitting 10 years after the fact, have authority to determine with more weight and influence than any other man that evictions were not the cause of crime, or, if they were the cause, still that the evictions themselves were due to agitation? Observe, in that statement we are given to understand that in the creation of those crimes in 1879-80 distress and extravagant rents had nothing to do with it. This opinion, so irrational in itself, we are called upon to adopt without question or correction. Then there is the statement that crime was due to secret societies. I will not criticise that conclusion, because I admit that the question as to whether there were secret societies or not is a question of fact which may fairly be called a judicial issue. Then we come to another issue, absolutely non-judicial, and yet we are called upon to declare to-night—every one of us—that the rejection by the House of Lords of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill in 1880, which was the remedy we sought to apply to the great difficulties of Ireland at that moment, had nothing to do with the increase of crime at all. I cannot conceive a more astounding assertion. It appears to me to be in defiance of all the first rules of common-sense and of every likelihood of the case. It may be said that the Irish ought to have met their distress more in the spirit of philosophers or angels, and to have drawn upon an unbounded stock of patience, and to have had unbounded faith in Parliament; but the Irish were men, and, according to the view of the Commissioners, they were men with a fair share of human imperfections; and to say that the provocation offered by the rejection of that Bill, which drew from Mr. Forster a most indignant denunciation—to say that it is not to be reckoned one of the causes of the increase of crime in Ireland, is indeed not a matter for censure, for no doubt it is an honest opinion on the part of the Judges; but it is an astounding proposition to submit to us in the year 1890 and to ask us to subscribe to. Then the land legislation of this House is brought upon the carpet. It was alleged by some persons before the Commission that the land legislation had been a great cause in mitigating the condition of Ireland and procuring the decrease of crime. Nothing of the sort, say the Commissioners. They say that the legislation of 1881 had no such effect, and they reject the proposition in like manner in respect to the Arrears Act of 1882, and say the suggestion that the Arrears Act tended to produce, and did produce, a diminution of crime, is a suggestion not well founded. That is a statement entirely untrue, in my opinion; but, whether true or untrue, it is a judgment upon an issue entirely non-judicial, and one which, in virtue of the authority we gave to the Judges, we ought not to be asked to subscribe to. I will give one other instance, perhaps in one sense of a different description; but I will give an instance of what I think disproportionate and ill-balanced judgment. It will be for the Law Officers of the Crown to correct me, and contend that in this case the amount of censure has been justly apportioned to the amount of guilt. The Commissioners unearthed in the course of their inquiry the history of a miserable and obscure Irish paper called, I think, the Irishman—a paper so obscure that my noble Friend Lord Spencer, whom no one will accuse of insufficient attention to Irish affairs and the duties of his office—Lord Spencer has said that he was not even aware of its existence. However, this paper has at length attained to fame through the labours of the Commission, and several pages of the Report are filled with extracts from it, and these extracts from the paper, with the concurrence of Archbishop Walsh, are termed most abominable. I do not object—I do not complain; but what I ask is that you should be equally liberal in according blame to other things as abominable, when, as I think I can prove, these extracts from the Irishman were—I will not say pardonable at all, but insignificant from obscurity as compared with other things as abominable, blazoned forth to the world. When we come to the grand and capital offence, the nature of which I will do my best to set forth to-night—when we come to that, there is not a word, there is not a citation of one of the aggravating circumstances; all that is given is a statement that the letter upon which a certain detestable charge was founded is a forgery. That I call an unbalanced judgment, a disproportionate assignment of blame. I did not wish to enter into minute criticisms of this kind; but you have forced me by compelling me, through your Motion, to become responsible for each and all of these assertions from beginning to end. There is one other objection to adopting this Report which I will dwell upon by-and-by; but it appears to me to be so conclusive, so simple, that I own I do not understand in what way it is to be met on the other side, or how the Motion is to be justified. We have it on the declaration of the Judges themselves—a declaration they were justified in making, and bound to make—that great portions of the evidence, and what we know to be essential portions of the evidence, were entirely excluded from their view. They have arrived at these conclusions; they have recorded them; they have passed censure upon certain acts; but they have shut out from their consideration—as they have told us, and, moreover, in my opinion, they were justified from their position and point of view in shutting out from their consideration—essential portions of the evidence. What those essential portions were I will endeavour, by and by, to explain; but surely it is hard to believe the right hon. Gentleman can maintain this contention, that a judgment has been passed upon the Irish case by a body of men who were precluded from looking at many of the most important topics that bear upon it. They have said that they were so precluded. But we are not precluded from looking at them—we are bound to look at them, we cannot do otherwise than include them. We are totally unfit for our office as politicians and as legislators unless we do include them, and give to each its due weight. How is it possible to so accept, on the authority of the Judges, the conclusions they make upon a portion of the evidence, when you are both able and bound to look at the whole evidence which the Judges were prohibited, by the nature of their Commission, from examining? These are, I think, conclusive reasons against adopting the Report en bloc, as has been suggested. The right hon. Gentleman calls upon us to adopt this Report, but in what circumstances? It comes to us with the authority of the three Judges, who have most laboriously, zealously, and, so far, meritoriously, taken an enormous amount of evidence, upon which mass of evidence they have founded their conclusions; but you cannot separate the conclusion from the evidence on which it is founded. That evidence is not before us. There is not a man in this House who has read it—he cannot; it is morally impossible, it is physically impossible. Is it decent? Is this what the right hon. Gentleman describes as being the due conclusion of judicial procedure, if, when certain conclusions have been adopted by other people and upon evidence, we are to adopt them wholesale, the evidence being out of our knowledge, out of the recollection probably even of those who heard it, and not having been heard by one in 10, or 20, or 50 of those who are called upon to accept the conclusions? Now, consider what is the sum of this great and important Constitutional case. In my opinion it is this. There has been a controversy in which the Nationalist Members for Ireland were accused of two classes of offence. (One of those classes was a class of infamous and dishonourable offences. The right hon. Gentleman has expressed his joy and satisfaction, if I understood him rightly—and I should be sorry indeed if I did not—that justice has been done to the Members accused in respect of the personal charges. By that I apprehend he means those infamous and dishonourable offences. There was also another set of accusations of acts which were not in the nature of infamy or dishonour, but which were of a character which attach to all great and passionate popular movements and crises of agitation. On the first and great charge they have been acquitted, and our contention is that that acquittal, viewing the nature of the charges, absolutely demands notice from the House. The censure, as we contend, is not a subject for a Vote of Parliament at the present day and in present circumstances. Now, let us see what are the arguments which bear on those several propositions. Let me consider what are the points upon which the Nationalist Members of Ireland have been censured. I will endeavour to gather them into heads in a manner to which I do not think hon. Gentlemen opposite will object. I bring them into three heads. I admit that I take no notice of two charges which do not fall under those heads. One is the charge that they disseminated newspapers tending to crime. That is the charge the formation of which is said to imply the application of the high doctrine of constructive conspiracy. Some of the agents of the League were found disseminating some of those newspapers, and consequently the 65 Members of Parliament, who sit in this House and who are not ashamed to belong to the League, are implicated. Yet the right hon. Gentleman really thinks that it is the business of Parliament to adopt and make such a contention as that. There is another head which may be called the £6 case, or it may be called the £12 case—because in all there were £12 spent for the purpose of relieving persons who had been or were supposed to have been engaged in committing crime. I think a more trumpery charge to appear in a State indictment than this, standing as it does and supported as it is, it would be difficult to conceive. Now, the main charges are three; and I do not think there is any doubt about it. One is that seven of the respondents joined the Land League with the ultimate view of separating Ireland from England. I here lament, as in many places I have to lament, that the Judges do not point out the time when this offence was committed. The time when this offence was committed was a time when desperate distress prevailed in Ireland, and when she was on the brink of famine; when unrighteous, unjust, and impossible rents largely prevailed in Ireland, as we know from subsequent experience of facts. It was in 1879 and 1880 that they joined the League with a view to the ultimate separation of Ireland from England. For my part I rejoice to believe that the idea of the separation of Ireland from England—which, even in the worst circumstances, I think was both unreasonable and impossible—I rejoice to think that that idea is an idea which is now dead.

If anything would tend to revive that idea it would be the vote which is now proposed to be given in condemning a portion of our fellow Members because they have given countenance to that idea. I am compelled by the love of truth to say that, in my opinion, to deny the moral authority of the Act of Union was for an Irishman no moral offence whatever. Yes, the hon. and learned Gentleman may take me down [referring to the Attorney General making a note of the last observation]. I heard the Attorney General cross-examine his witness from a pedestal, as he felt, of the greatest elevation, and endeavouring to press home the monstrous guilt of an Irishman who did not allow moral authority to the Act of Union. In my opinion the Englishman has far more cause to blush for the means by which the Act of Union was obtained than the Irishman has to blush for anything, even of excess or error, into which he may have been betrayed in his recollections of that Act of Union. It was, Sir—and this I speak not in temper nor in heat, but after having done the best in my power for years past to learn the case—it was the off-spring of tyranny, of massacre, of bribery, of fraud. It is no doubt a very serious responsibility to disturb a country that is under a Government procured by those means, because every man is responsible for the consequences of that disturbance; but to treat this as a great moral offence, and to come forward now in 1890, and in a sanctimonious vote, to condemn Irishmen because they held opinions in which it is highly probable, if not almost certain, that Grattan would have concurred had his life been prolonged, is a monstrous proposition. I do not object at all to the recital of the Judges; they have made it in fair and temperate terms; but the adoption of this Vote of Censure by the House of Commons I object to in the strongest manner. I deem it not only unjust to the Members so designated—and who will suffer from it extremely little—but flagrantly absurd and unwise. The other two censures of the Judges are more to the purpose—I mean more to our purpose, more to the purpose of the present Motion. I think those two propositions sum up the assumed guilt of the Irish Members. First, they incited to intimidation by speeches, with knowledge that intimidation led to crime. I do not think that, as far as I can judge, that is an unfair statement of the case on that head against the Irish Members. I believe it is quite as much as the Judges themselves have stated. I think the citations of the right hon. Gentleman were not entirely fair on the subject. I do not understand what was his object in citing from the charge of Lord Coleridge, where he set forth the nature of the accusations which have been made on the part of the Times as if he were favouring us with Lord Coleridge's opinion. Some one will, perhaps, kindly explain what in the world those have to do with the Vote now before the House. But I would call the right hon. Gentleman's attention to a passage on page 76 of the Report, where the Commissioners speak of the connection between agitation and crime. It is about 15 lines from the bottom, and it runs as follows :—

“ We may say at once that the charge that the respondents, by their speeches or otherwise, incited persons to the commission of murder, or that the Land League chiefs based their scheme on a system of assassination, has not been substantiated.”

But, in the opinion of the Judges, it was substantiated that the Nationalists incited to intimidation by speeches with knowledge that it led to crime. I am not in a position to say that intimidation did not produce crime. I contended and argued from that place [pointing to the Treasury Bench] that it did, and I have seen no reason to reverse that opinion; but again I observe we are now speaking of what happened in 1880 and 1881. The proofs connecting those speeches with intimidation, and with intimidation which led to crime, belong to that period, and do not belong to a later. The prosecutors of this case arrived at an arrangement with my hon. and learned Friend which I think excluded everything after 1885 or 1886 from that investigation. [Sir C. RUSSELL: 1886.] It was not worth their while to enter upon it; but we are now speaking of a former period. The hon. Member for Cork has himself frankly and ingenuously confessed and stated in this House his opinion that much had been done at that time in the way of boycotting which was questionable or improper, and I do not imagine that they deny the Judges' case in which they say there were cases in which intimidation led to crime. What was the other great charge? It was that the Nationalist Members never placed themselves on the side of law and justice; that they did not assist the administration, and did not denounce the party of physical force. I believe that I have stated fairly the charges against the Nationalists as they have been given by the Commissioners. Let us see what follows. In the first place, let me point out that these charges of continuing to encourage intimidation, after its association with crime had become known, are charges perfectly general in their character. It is a question of the general prudence or imprudence, propriety or impropriety of the language that they used in its action upon the temper of an excited nation; it is not a question of having ministered to this crime or that; it is not a question of the slightest personal complicity with crime. There is not one here who will not share in the opinion held by Lord Spencer on the subject from the first: that personal complicity with crime was not charged against any one of the Members returned to this House. These charges are charges made by the Judges, and I am going to give you some weighty and conclusive reasons against voting in affirmation of them. In the first place, they are 10 years old. It is a bad and a dangerous precedent to go back upon these long dates in order to obtain matter to hurl at the heads of political antagonists. In the second place, being 10 years old—what happened at all happened in 1880, 1881, and 1882, chiefly in the two former years, 1880 and 1881—were the facts then unknown? Were these things done in a corner? Were they not the subject of incessant discussion and denunciation in this House? Is there anything now affirmed against the Irish Members by the Judges which was not affirmed by Mr. Forster and, in part, by myself and by others at that time? If these things deserve condemnation now by a Vote of this House, why did you not then condemn them? Well, I will tell you why. The Liberals of this House desired the matter to be fought out fairly in debate, and I do not think there was any reason or ground—not a rag of reason or ground—for a Vote of Parliamentary condemnation. That was the Liberal idea; was the Tory idea more severe? Not at all. They thought that these men were good enough to associate with for political purposes. The practice was to arrange with them the Votes and Divisions, and at last, in 1885, how was the crisis of the Liberal Government brought about except by the firm, steady co-operation of the Irish Members with the Tory party, for which I have never blamed them any more than I blame them now, because they thought that the interests of their country were superior to those of any British Administration. Right hon. gentlemen opposite climbed to power upon the shoulders of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork—upon the strong shoulders of the hon. Member for Cork, and they have now become a majority; and, having had full cognizance of his guilt upon the charges at the time—the charges not having been added to since—now in 1890 they actually rouse themselves to such a point of indignation that they are, forsooth, prepared to vote the condemnation of a cause and of a policy, the whole benefit of which they took at that period. I am very sorry that I have been compelled, by the nature of this proposal, which left me no choice, to go into the discussion of polemical matters between the two sides of the House, but I am contending that it would be unwise, and, indeed, in the highest degree indecent, now in 1890 to pass this Vote of Censure, and I cannot give my own opinion of that without showing what was your own conduct during the preceding years, when the offences were committed. The right hon. Gentleman read out the ninth finding of the Commissioners, and he seemed to be deeply impressed with the subject matter. What he said was indeed, in his characteristic way, put very mildly, but he felt he was setting forth matters of extreme gravity when he stated that the Irish took money for Parliamentary purposes from men promoting physical force in America—physical force which the Irish Members disapproved; but these men were willing to do what the Irish Members approved—namely, to subscribe money for Parliamentary purposes. If a parallel precedent were wanting to justify their conduct they have nothing to do but to point to you. You disapproved of the proceedings of the Irish in 1881 and the following years; you thought those proceedings led to crime and to mischief, but then the Irish were willing to join you in voting out the Liberal Government, and you took advantage of their good dispositions, notwithstanding their criminal and unworthy deeds. Mutatis mutandis is a formula which will well serve to express what the Judges have put into this Report. I ask the House of Commons now to consider the counter-allegations which may be laid before them—allegations made seriously by the Irish Members. They hold the opinion that the agitation, even of 1879, 1880, 1881, prevented more crime than it caused. Crime was caused; what the Judges very properly call increased crime was caused by agitation. But I believe it to be a perfectly serious allegation, tendered in good faith by the Irish Members, that more crime and worse crime, more atrocious crime, was prevented by agitation. But what do you say to the allegation of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork, who has told us from the first that his endeavour, his policy, his scheme has been to draw off agitation and popular action in Ireland from violence to Parliamentary methods? Now, for my own part, I do not hesitate to say that there was a time when I did not recognise that intention. And when was that time? This I shall say, as a matter of fact, that never at any period since the early part of 1882 have I charged the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork, as a Minister or otherwise with any action, any language, tending to the increase of crime in Ireland. I viewed him as a conservative force—I mean conservative in the sense of maintaining the law, the order, and the peace of the country. And when the Irish Members tell me that in their conviction the agitation, even when it was of the roughest and wildest, stopped more crime than it caused, and especially when they tell me that the endeavour of their distinguished leader has been to put an end to violence and to substitute Parliamentary action for what Mr. O'Connell used to call "the wild justice" of popular movements, I will not say that the House ought to vote in affirmation of that statement—that may be left to the historian to decide—but to vote that such a statement is unworthy of credit, and is without force or weight is, in my opinion, a course not very well suited to maintain the dignity of the House. I ask the House to listen to the words in which the Judges describe the limited scope of the inquiry. I will not quote the entire passage; it will be found on page 5 of the Report, but nearly at the close are these words—

“We must confine our researches to the question whether the respondents, or any of them, have been guilty of the things charged and alleged against them; we have no commission to consider whether the conduct of which they are accused can be palliated by the circumstances at the time, or whether it should be condoned in consideration of benefits alleged to have resulted from their actions.”

In the first place, I say this—I am not making it an accusation against the Party opposite for their former conduct, but only against what they propose tonight—that condonation was given in the amplest, in the most solemn manner which is conceivable when, in 1885, the representative in Ireland of Her Majesty's Government, with the knowledge and the sanction of the head of the Government, entered into close, private, confidential communications with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Cork, the leader of the Irish Party, for the purpose of devising, if possible, a scheme and a policy for the government of Ireland. I ask you to answer that argument, and to show me that the proceedings of Lord Carnarvon and Lord Salisbury—for he was an essential party to them, and it would not surprise me if I were to be authentically informed that no other Member of the Cabinet knew anything about it—I have my own suspicions, but I do not wish to act on suspicion alone—I ask you to show me that the action of the Viceroy and Lord Salisbury, who concurred with the Viceroy, in taking these gentlemen into their confidential counsel, for the purpose of devising a plan for the government of Ireland and their treatment in Parliament, was not a full, absolute, and ought to have been a final condonation and closing of the book of controversy with respect to former acts. I want the House to consider a little what is the meaning of these remarkable words, “palliation and condonation.” Suppose this to be true—that there was some evil in the Irish agitation of 1880 and 1881, when, as I conceived at that time—erroneously or not—there was a policy which aimed at the destruction of agricultural rents. That charge I made at the time in good faith; but I am not quite sure now whether it ought not to have been strongly qualified by the circumstances of the time. But supposing I am told that even then the good in the agitation far outweighed the evil, are you prepared to deny that? And here I have a sorrowful confession to make. Suppose I am told further that without the agitation Ireland would never have had the Land Act of 1881, are you prepared to deny that? Are you prepared to say that without the agitation Ireland would have got the Land Act of 1881? I hear no challenges upon that statement, for I think it is generally and deeply felt that without the agitation the Land Act of 1881 would not have been passed. I ask, what would have been the condition of Ireland at this moment—what horrors would have filled the interval—because you are now looking back on a period of comparative calm and tranquillity. I had a controversy with some of the Irish Members—particularly the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. T. Healy)—upon a point of difference. I always contended, and I now believe, that the abolition of the Irish Church and the Land Act of 1870 were the free gifts of the Imperial Legislature to Ireland. I do not admit that agitation had to do with the passing of either of these measures. I am not endeavouring to convince others. I am only reciting my own opinion. I was glad enough to claim credit for Parliament where I could for an impartial judgment in matters beneficial to Ireland. The abolition of the Irish Church was, in point of feeling and sentiment, a great sacrifice for Parliament to make, and, I think, a most honourable sacrifice, and the abolition of the Irish Church carried in its train the Land Act of 1870. At the time it was passed that Act was a great blessing to Ireland. It was highly favoured by the fortunate circumstances of good seasons, and for some years it seemed as if it might be a settlement of the Land Question. Then came the distress and misery of 1879, and it broke down. As the man responsible more than any other for the Act of 1881—as the man whose duty it was to consider that question day and night during nearly the whole of that Session—I must record my firm opinion that the Act would not have become the law of the land if it had not been for the agitation with which Irish society was convulsed. You may say, that if it be true that a great law was necessary for the safety of Ireland—to save the people from misery and starvation—and if that Act could not have been passed without popular agitation, and if you are now going to pass censure on those concerned in that agitation, are you justified in saying—"I am precluded from looking at the beneficent results of their agitation"? The truth is this. This is our position. The Judges, under the necessities of the case, have looked at a part of the case. It is our duty to look at the whole. What were the whole facts of that crisis? In the first place, terrible distress; in the second place, the rejection by the House of Lords of the legislative remedy for the time proposed by the responsible Ministers of the Crown, and passed by a large majority in this House; in the third place, the growth of evictions; and, in the fourth place, the wide prevalence of iniquitous and impossible rents. Out of this great group of facts the Judges, acting under the terms of the Commission, absolving themselves, but not absolving us, have selected the agitation, and have said—"We cannot look to the right or the left, or backwards or forwards; all we have to do is to return a verdict upon the dry facts whether we can allege that in some degree or other, and in some circumstances or other, there was a connection between the agitation and the increase of crime." But is Parliament to act upon such a basis? Are we to put out of view the facts I have referred to? Perhaps I shall be told that in the year 1881 I myself expressed my belief that the number of landlords levying iniquitous rents in Ireland was comparatively small. Yes; I did express that opinion, and I did it on the best evidence at my command. That was the evidence of the Commission, at the head of which sat Lord Bessborough; and that Commission reported to that effect. But I cannot plead such ignorance now. Somewhere about 400,000 tenants in Ireland were empowered and enabled by the Land Act to seek judicial rents, or to make covenants with the landlords, which were themselves equivalent to judicial rents. And, in round numbers, 200,000 of them went into the Court or obtained these agreements, by which large reductions were secured. It is not possible for me now to deny that at that time excessive, iniquitous, and impossible rents prevailed widely in Ireland, and that they constituted a gigantic and capital fact in the whole Irish case of that period; and to pass judgment on that case without taking them into account is in itself a monstrous injustice. The fact is this. You are called upon now to weigh certain classes of actions and speeches in gold scales. They are the actions and speeches to which you can trace, as you think, injurious consequences. But all the other acts of far greater consequence, all the great historic force which determined the bringing about of the Irish crisis, and, as one may perhaps now say, the happy determination of that crisis, you are to set aside and say, "No, we have nothing to do with them." And yet you are not Judges in a limited Commission, but statesmen, politicians, and legislators, bound to look at the whole range of circumstances of the case, and guilty of misprision of justice if you fail so to do. I can only show you my meaning in this matter by historical illustrations. My doctrine is this: These acts, with respect to which Irish Members have been censured, are not fit subjects for Parliamentary censure at all, because they are so mixed up with other circumstances that unless you take those circumstances into view you cannot possibly do justice; and when you have taken them into view, you find that the acts are such as are invariably incident to periods of national crisis, struggle, and revolution. Perhaps you think it wrong in me to apply the term revolution to any changes that have taken place, or are likely to take place, in Ireland. But remember who it was who connected revolution with Irish affairs. It was your own greatest authority—it was Lord Beaconsfield, as Mr. Disraeli. In the year 1844, in one of the most remarkable, and perhaps, the wisest, passages to which he ever gave utterance in Parliament, he pointed to Ireland and told the Parliament of that day that the evil features of Ireland were such as could only be corrected in other countries by revolution, and that the duty of Parliament was to correct these evil features without revolution. Yes, that he said in 1844, and for 25 years after that declaration no single Act of importance was passed which, in any way touched the conditions, fortunes, and prospects of the people of Ireland. Well, now, Sir, what are the circumstances? The circumstances are that, in the existence of this great necessity to relieve half the population from the pressure of impossible rents, means were adopted which were not ill-intended and which were not purposely directed to crime or mischief, but which were capable in given circumstances of excitement in this case or in that, of operating on excited minds, and of being auxiliary causes of crime in such cases. These are the circumstances. But, Sir, is it not the case that in all great movements in human affairs even the just cause is marked and spotted with much that is to be regretted? Have you ever heard of great changes brought about in the condition of a nation with nothing contrary to honour, nothing contrary to right, nothing contrary to order? Let me take the two charges against Irish Members—one of them that they gave no assistance to justice, and the other that they did not denounce the party of violence. I will take an illustration from our own history. Under Queen Elizabeth—and if ever there was a period of crisis in English History it was during that reign—the body of Roman Catholics of England were strictly and absolutely loyal. Of that there is no doubt, and it is recorded that the venerable Lord Montagu—I do not know whether he was entitled by years, as some others who have taken a share of public action, to be described as venerable—but, at any rate, the venerable Lord Montagu marched to Tilbury to support Queen Elizabeth with a troop of horse, commanded by himself, his son, and his grandson. Such was the loyalty of the body of Roman Catholics. At that time there was a handful or group of Roman Catholics, young Roman Catholics, chiefly in holy orders, emissaries of Rome, sustained and cherished by the colleges abroad, and continually engaged either in arranging plots or awaiting outbreaks when they might have an opportunity of riveting upon this country a foreign domination, and possibly even of removing by assassination the Queen whose life was regarded by the mass of the people as an inestimable treasure. I have contrasted these two classes of persons—the one small and working against the law, the other as heartily attached to it. But who ever heard—I, for one, never heard—that those loyal Roman Catholics made it part of their active duty to detect the disloyal? They had no share in exposing them; and it is too much to demand when you have got before you an oppressed nation and a system of law which you believe to be in the main radically unjust and bad and administered in a foreign spirit, hostile to the welfare and the feelings of the country—it is too much to expect every man as a test of loyalty and as the only means of extending to him protection, to actively associate himself with the law and to make himself a portion of its train for the purpose of detecting those whom such a state of the law naturally alienates. I take another case, and that is with regard to the fact that the agitation in the eyes of the Judges, and possibly in the opinion of many more, cannot be held to have been wholly dissociated with crime. I will illustrate that in like manner from our history. I will illustrate it from the history of the Long Parliament. Now, I suppose that if there is a body of men who have a secure place from generation to generation in the grateful veneration of the country it is the leaders of the Long Parliament in its early years. I do not speak of the time of Cromwell, of Ireton, and of Lambert, although it has become a great fashion of late to worship Cromwell. It is the time of Pym and Hampden, of Falkland and Hyde, for the incidents which I am going to recite occurred within the last 12 or 14 months of the Long Parliament. Falkland and Hyde themselves in the Long Parliament belonged to the Opposition. I will not quote the passage from Hallam, where he gives a general description of it, but I will quote cases of what was done by those great champions of law and order who now enjoy our gratitude and veneration. I take them from Mr. Hallam, except in one case, which I take from the notes of Sir John Northcote, a very worthy and distinguished ancestor of Lord Iddesleigh:—“The Long Parliament usurped from the first,” Hallam says.

"Legislative, executive, and judicial functions. There was a Judge whom they did not like, who was considered to be subservient to prerogative. They sent the Usher of the Black Rod into the Court of King's Bench, and they seized Judge Barclay while the Court was sitting. They required the Judges who had signed the warrants for ship-money to enter into heavy recognisances of many thousands of pounds" (whether they had been students of the Act of Edward III. or not). "When they heard of a clergyman who had performed any ceremony in the Church that they disliked they sent and seized him and committed him to prison as a delinquent. There was a tailor so imprudent as to curse the Parliament."

He was sent to labour in Bridewell for life, not by the House of Commons, but by the House of Lords, so that a congenial spirit prevailed in both branches of the Legislature. Well, Sir, when petitioners petitioned in the most orderly manner for the preservation of the Constitution they were sent for and imprisoned, but when tumultuous crowds brought petitions for a change they were welcomed to the Bar of the House. The climax of all these cases was one which I hope, Sir, will never be repeated during the period of your own experience. This happened on the 10th of December, 1641. A Member of Parliament, Sir William Earle, gave information of some dangerous words that had been spoken. Dangerous words! That is the statement of the charge. What was voted?

"That Mr. Speaker should issue his warrant to apprehend such persons as Sir William Earle shall point out."

Such, Sir, was the admixture of gross and human elements in the popular movement upon which, notwithstanding, we look back as one of the most beneficial and most glorious, at any rate in these early stages, in the whole course of our history. And we have been accustomed, many of us, to toast at our festive gatherings, "the cause for which Hampden bled in the field, and Sidney on the scaffold." Very probably some of those who vote with the right hon. Gentleman to-night have toasted this cause for which Hampden bled in the field, and Sidney on the scaffold. These deliberate, flagrant, constant, wilful, and systematic violations of law and of private right which were thus perpetrated by those great men, and, on the whole, good men, are far graver and far fitter to be put into an indictment than the indirect consequential responsibilities that you throw upon some of the Irish

Members, whose motives and whose intentions the Judges themselves have been the first to acknowledge. Perhaps I may be allowed, for it conveniently sums up the whole case, to quote the words ascribed to Lord Chatham. I believe they are not in his speeches; they rest upon the authority of Mr. Grattan. Lord Chatham spoke of that very time which I have been describing. He said—

"There was ambition, there was sedition, there was violence, but no man shall persuade me that it was not the cause of liberty on one side, and of tyranny on the other."

The cause which was marked by sedition and violence was—in the judgment of Lord Chatham, who stands at the head, perhaps, of your orators and statesmen—the cause of liberty; and the cause opposed to them, which no doubt had its catch-words of "law and order," was, in his judgment, the cause, not of liberty, nor law and order, which are the sisters and essential allies of liberty, but the cause of tyranny. For these reasons I say that in my opinion you must raise yourselves a little above the level of the day, and, if you can, endeavour to take the view of the transaction we are now engaged in that the historian will take when he comes to perform his final office; and you will see that these matters—though I will not say the conduct of the Irish Members is free from censure, any more than I will venture to say that my own conduct is free from censure or the conduct of better than I—are not fit subjects for a Parliamentary vote. And that Parliamentary vote, the vote of an adverse, antagonistic majority, delivering itself in consonance with its own views to crush or discredit political opponents, while adding nothing whatever to the weight of the judgment of the Commissioners, will, on the contrary, tend to deprive it of such weight. I will now refer briefly to the acts which constitute the acquittal. I allude to the charges, every one of which would have personally stigmatised and personally disgraced all the men who were the objects of them had these charges been true. I do not think you could ever have made arrangements with these men to conduct along with them the opposition to a Liberal Government. I do not think that in 1885 you would have entered into confidential communications with them for the purpose of arranging informally a scheme for governing Ireland. What are these charges? I take them in their latest edition. There are many editions, and the last edition is the least violent, and, I was going to say, the least atrocious. They were charged with having given incitement by speeches to a scheme of assassination carefully calculated and coolly applied; with having given payment to promote murder; with having entered into personal association with criminals; and with having made payments to aid escape from justice. I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has observed that the Commissioner expressly absolved the Members from this personal association with notorious criminals. Then it was charged that they gave countenance to a murderous association in America, but it was proved that they gave it no other countenance than that which I have described; it was charged that they, in the person of their chief, were intimate with the leading Invincibles, and had probable knowledge of what they were about in the beginning of May. And lastly, Sir, there come the forged letters. These are the charges of an infamous character from which there has been a full acquittal, and we ask you to give effect to that acquittal. Now, I have spoken thus far of the Irish Members without distinction. I must now speak of the chief among them, because he was the object of by far the worst and most atrocious of these charges. I must speak of Mr. Parnell. I believe that the charge brought against him was not only an atrocious charge, but that it was in itself a charge of atrocity entirely unexampled in our history. Had that charge been true the hon. Member for Cork would have been guilty, morally guilty, as an assassin, as a coward, as a liar, and as a hypocrite. Every one of those crimes, the worst and the basest that can be charged to a human being, would lie at the door of the hon. Member for Cork had he been guilty. Such was the charge in itself. If it were true, it was the more needful that it should be made. On whom was it made? It was made on a man who, looked upon in his public career, was charged with the leadership of a people. He was charged from day to day with the daily care of a nation's interest, at a time when he was invited to become virtually a defendant in a Court of Justice that sat for a year and a half. Such was his condition in public. What was his condition privately and personally? The hon. Gentleman was well known to be strong in mind as he was weak in health. He was known to be a man of broken health at the time this charge was made, and finally—there is no indelicacy in alluding to it, because the hon. Gentleman himself has modestly and becomingly spoken of it—he was known to be a man whose lot has not been cast among the rich men either of England or of Ireland. When this charge was brought, under enormous responsibility, what was the assurance that accompanied it? It was not cast at random before the country; it was cast with a solemn assurance that imposed even upon Members of this House, in these terms, that, “after the most careful and minute scrutiny, we are satisfied that the letter is authentic.” Was there a scrutiny? Was there a scrutiny at all? Was there anything careful and minute about it? Yes, Sir; there was something careful about it, and that was a carefulness not to know. Mr. MacDonald went into the box, appeared upon his oath, not closed up within the curtains of the office of the Times newspaper, but upon his oath personally in the face of day; and what said Mr. MacDonald? “I abstained from asking Mr. Houston why the envelopes were wanting, and from whom he got the letters”; and then, “I particularly avoided the subject of origin.” Having ventured upon forgery, having carried calumny to its climax, the whole of this was crowned with falsehood, divulged in the most solemn form, and given to the credulous, those whom Party prejudice for a moment might mislead, to assure them that they would tread in the paths, not of cruelty and tyranny, but of justice. Sir, is it an immoderate demand that, after an occurrence like this, after a poisoned weapon has been aimed, aimed under such circumstances, aimed at such a person, and aimed with the solemn assurance that nothing was so dear to those who launched it as the strict observance of the law—is it too much that I should ask the House of Commons, which by implication and involuntarily at least came to give much countenance to the exterior part of this case—is it too much to ask that we should record our judgment upon this unexampled occurrence? I have not been able, I admit, to abstain altogether from reference to the conduct of the Party opposite in former years. I have made no charge against the conduct of the Party, or the conduct of the Government, in immediate connection with this matter. I wish to do nothing to give an excuse to prejudice or to prepossession. And now, Sir, as a Member of the minority, to whom am I to appeal? I appeal from the Party opposite to the Party opposite. I appeal from them as a Party to them as individuals. I ask you as citizens—I will not say as Christians—and as men to consider this case. I ask you to acknowledge the law of equal and reciprocal moral obligation; I ask you to place yourselves for a moment—not the mass among whom responsibility is diffused and severed till it becomes inoperative and worthless; but I ask you individually, man by man, to place yourselves—in the position of the hon. Member for Cork as the victim of this frightful outrage. Is it possible, in doing this, after all his cares, all his suffering, all that he has gone through—and I believe there is no parallel to it at least for 200 years—that you can fail to feel that something remains due to him, or that you can bring that something lower or make it smaller than I have put it in the Amendment I am about to move? No, Sir. Then give, I pray you to give; give it as men, but do not be satisfied with giving a judgment that may be sustained by the cheers of a majority of this House upon a victorious or favourable Division; give such a judgment as will bear the scrutiny of the heart and of the conscience of every man when he takes himself to his chamber and is still. Of such a judgment I have no fear. For such a judgment I ask you, I entreat you, I urge you, I might almost say, in the name of that law of reciprocal obligation, I respectfully demand it of you. Give such a judgment in the terms of the Amendment, concur in declaring that which is, after all, but a part, and a feebly drawn and represented part, of the wrongs that have been inflicted—give that judgment, accede to our demand, accede to our prayer, and grant this late, this measured, this perhaps scanty reparation of an enormous and unheard-of wrong.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "House," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "deems it to be a duty to record its reprobation of the false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery, which have been brought against Members of this House, and particularly against Mr. Parnell; and, while declaring its satisfaction at the exposure of these calumnies, this House expresses its regret for the wrong inflicted, and the suffering and loss endured, through a protracted period, by reason of these acts of flagrant iniquity,"—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone.)

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*(7.13.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Gentleman, in a passage of fervid and glowing eloquence, has invited this House, and especially those who sit on this side, to give a judgment, as he calls it, in satisfaction of a wrong done to the hon. Member for Cork. But I appeal to anyone who has listened to the whole of the right hon. Gentleman's speech whether in that speech there is not proof that the judgment for which he asks could not, consistently with justice, be given by this House. We have heard that the Report of the Commission has been described as a triumphant acquittal. The whole speech of the right hon. Gentleman shows that he regards it as something very different—as not only, after fair inquiry and deliberate judgment, acquitting the hon. Member for Cork with regard to those infamous and dishonouring charges to which he alluded in the latter part of his speech, but also as recording judgment on other matters, which possibly may seem of even greater gravity to the country at large. Now, the right hon. Gentleman has not accepted the terms in which my right hon. Friend proposes to acknowledge the work of the Judges. He objected to that proposal on this ground—that he objected to render formal thanks for the performance of judicial duties. But, Sir, I venture to remind him that this was no ordinary duty. It was imposed by Parliament upon public servants very much against their desire, I should imagine, and certainly very much beyond the scope of their ordinary work. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman should have marred what he said with regard to the conduct of this inquiry by the Judges by the suggestion of political sentiment. I think that the Report before us bears on its whole face clear proof of calm, impartial judgment, absolutely devoid of any political sentiment or prepossession whatever; and remembering the suggestions made and the insinuations thrown out before this Commission was appointed, and since it began its work, of unfair bias on the part of those of whom it was composed, I think that the least this House can do is to show that it has no sympathy whatever with such insinuations, and that it trusts and accepts the absolute impartiality with which this Commission has been conducted. The right hon. Gentleman divided the charges under two heads. He classed the first, on which an acquittal has been given, as infamous and dishonouring; and, secondly, as charges of conduct such as accompanied all great popular movements; and the right hon. Gentleman who sits next him, while admitting the other day that the Judges formed a most competent tribunal simply for the investigation of questions of crime and questions of fact, stated that they were, in his judgment, not a competent tribunal for matters involving political considerations. I think, Sir, this is the distinction which is drawn by the two right hon. Gentlemen between the two classes of charges into which the Judges have inquired; but I would venture to point out that the distinction between those two classes of charges really depends upon the opinions of those who consider them. It may be all very well for right hon. Gentlemen opposite to say that there is nothing infamous and dishonouring in a particular class of charges, and that there is something infamous and dishonouring in the other. But I am bound to say, without using the word infamous, I do think that there is something dishonouring in some of the charges which have been proved against hon. Members opposite; and if the matter were looked at from the point of view of a "member of the physical force party" in America who advocates the use of dynamite and assassination, such a person might contend that all the charges related to matters involving political considerations. You cannot classify charges of this kind in this way. I think that the right hon. Gentleman, at any rate by the length of that part of his speech which he devoted to this matter, admits in his own mind the gravity of some of the charges which, in his judgment, are matters involving political considerations. No doubt they are now matters of history; but there is this advantage in that respect—that perhaps we can consider them with somewhat greater calmness, and that we have with regard to them placed upon record the opinions of the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues in the Government of that day—opinions which singularly corroborate the findings of the Commission. I will venture to divide the charges which have been reported to be true under two heads. In the first place, the Judges find that some of the respondents, including the two most active leaders of hon. Members below the Gangway, established and joined in the Land League organisation with the intention by those means to bring about the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation. Now I quite admit, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) stated the other day, that in that there is no overt act of treason which could be indicted; but, on the other hand, surely it is a treasonable intention? When right hon. Gentlemen go on to compare this treason with other acts in the past history of the world—with the cases, for instance, of Jefferson, Franklin, and Washington, who, of course, were legally traitors in their day—I thought to myself, would men like Jefferson, Franklin, and Washington have done, in carrying out their treason, what has been proved to have been done by hon. Members below the Gangway? [Sir W. HARCOURT: Yes, and a great deal more.] Now, let me just proceed to the points which were hardly at all dwelt upon by the right hon. Gentleman, but which surely have a very close and intimate bearing upon this charge of treasonable intention. The Commissioners report that the respondents disseminated newspapers tending to incite to sedition and the commission of crime. Now the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian passed very lightly over that. He called it a trumpety charge——

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, I said that it was a constructive charge.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I beg pardon. But at any rate he passed very lightly over it. But the Commissioners report that among those newspapers was one purchased by the hon. Member for Cork, maintained by the Land League funds, and the columns of which—as is shown by quotations in the Report—I venture to say contained as outrageous suggestions upon the use of dynamite and assassination as were ever reprobated by the right hon. Gentleman in American newspapers nine years ago. Well, Sir, that is one way in which treasonable intentions manifested themselves in the actions of those whose conduct is reported upon. But there was another way still. It is found that the respondents invited the assistance and co-operation and accepted subscriptions of money from Patrick Ford, a known advocate of crime and the use of dynamite, and the physical force party in America, including the Clan-na-Gael, and that in order to obtain that assistance they abstained from repudiating or condemning the action of that party. Sir, the members of that party in America are men—and were men—guilty not only of treasonable intention and treasonable action, but guilty of the most atrocious designs, such as I will venture to say have never been paralleled in any of those political movements of which the right hon. Gentleman spoke—the execution of which has been happily frustrated mainly by their miserable squabbles among themselves. Now, Sir, I do not suppose that there is anything in this—in the conduct which is proved by this Commission to have been committed by the respondents—to justify any indictment for treason. But this I will say, I do think it strange that such conduct as that should be excused and palliated by ex - Ministers of the Crown, who may some day occupy that position again, as involving political considerations. Then there is the second group of charges. What are those charges? That the bulk of the respondents, including the bulk of the party below the Gangway, are found to have been guilty of a criminal conspiracy, one of the objects of which was by a system of coercion and intimidation to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled the English garrison. It is shown that boycotting, the instrument of this combination, was a system of intimidation of the most severe and cruel character, that the object of this elaborate and all-pervading tyranny was not only to injure individuals, but the class of landlords, and to drive them out of the country, and that the intention of those who devised and carried out this system was to terrorise, and that it led in many cases to actual outrage. Further, it is found that the respondents incited to intimidation, and that the consequence of that incitement was that crime and outrage were committed by the persons incited; that the speeches made by the respondents, though the speakers did not intend it, had the effect of causing the peasants to carry out the laws of the Land League, even by assassination; that the respondents did not denounce the system of intimidation, but persisted in it, with the knowledge of its effect; that they, through the Land League, systematically and indiscriminately paid for the defence of persons charged with agrarian crime and supported their families; and that the knowledge that such assistance would in all cases be afforded must have had the effect of encouraging persons to commit outrage. Well, now, I was surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid-Lothian should have turned no small portion of his speech into an absolute apology for—nay, justification of—such conduct as that. He stated in so many words that it was the conduct so described by the Judges which led to the passing of the Land Act of 1881. He justified the agitation, the methods, and the procedure which the Judges have so described. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby agrees with him in that view, for he said the other day, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has said to-night, that all this evil came from unjust and impossible rents. Why, Sir, it is obvious to any one who reads the Report of the Judges that this was no case of an attempt on the part of the Land League to deal simply with cases of unjust eviction or the payment of impossible rents, but that it was a conspiracy deliberately formed against a whole class, and carried out by methods such as are described. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby knew a great deal better than this in 1881. In that year, speaking as a responsible Minister of the Crown, with all the responsibility of office as Home Secretary, with the knowledge of these matters fresh in his mind, he addressed a meeting in Glasgow, and what did he say? He referred to the men who are defended and apologised for by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite, and who, he said,

"had not for their object, or at all events for their principal object, the advantage of the Irish tenant, but were pursuing schemes of political revolution. The land agitation in their hands was not merely a Constitutional agitation to redress land grievances, which was perfectly justifiable, but was an agitation whose object was to destroy the union of the Empire, and to overthrow the established Government of the United Kingdom. Mr. Parnell admits now that what he wants is not fair rent; he wants no rent at all. He wants to get rid of the landlords in order that he may get rid of the English Government, and for this object every kind of intimidation has been employed to deter honest men from doing their duty and fulfilling their obligations. The Land League has employed terms whose avowed object is to set aside and over-rule the laws of the land. It is utterly impossible that any Government responsible for civilised society can tolerate such a condition of things. The Land League has thrown over the false colours of fair rent; it has hoisted the red flag, and the buccaneering craft sails under its true colours. Men who stood by it before, like Archbishop Croke, have repudiated the doctrines of which they must and do disapprove, and the Government have consequently felt it their duty to put in force all the powers that Parliament have granted them, in order to put down a public danger and a public nuisance."

"It is a great comfort and a great support to us to know that our conduct has generally been approved."

The right hon. Gentleman is of a very comfortable disposition, and I do not doubt that, with perfectly changed opinions, he is equally satisfied with his present position. There is a point in the findings of the Commissioners which I have quoted, which, I think, deserves some further notice—the payments for the defence of persons charged with agrarian crimes, and the support of their families, and payments made to compensate those injured in the commission of crimes. This is the charge which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian described as a trumpery charge. He said only two cases were quoted by the Commissioners, proved by a few letters that were all that could be found out of the very large correspondence of the Land League. But the facts detailed by the Commissioners in their Report are sufficient to show those were not isolated cases, but may have been samples of the regular course of dealing. [An hon. MEMBER? "May have been?"] May have been: Yes, but why was it not proved that they were not? There is nothing more remarkable in the whole of this inquiry than the absolute disappearance of the books, papers, records, and accounts of the Land League. If there is suspicion not only that large sums of money have been spent for such purposes, but even for worse and graver purposes, those who were responsible for the management of the Land League in those years have no one to thank but themselves. What do the Commissioners say as to the singular disappearance of those documents and the absolute failure to account for the large expenditure of the Land League?—

"Thus we have over £100,000 of Land League funds received—(from Mr. Egan)—but no details of the manner in which it was expended. It is proved that the books and documents of the Land League were numerous and bulky. . . . We have been unable to obtain these documents, and no valid excuse has been given for their non-production. . . . Mr. Justin M'Carthy, M.P., stated that he had obtained a list of books relating to the Land League of Great Britain, and which he was willing should be produced. . . . When called for he was unable to produce them or explain the reason for their non-production."

Mr. Parnell refused to give authority to Messrs. Munro, of Paris, to produce the accounts relating to the Land League.

*MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The right hon. Gentleman does not follow that up by saying that Messrs. Lewis gave an explanation.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH [Continuing the quotation]:

"We have therefore been deprived of evidence upon the question how the moneys of the Land League were expended in the years 1881-82. We may say generally that we have not received from Mr. Parnell and the officers of the Land League the assistance we were entitled to expect in the investigation of the Land League accounts, in order that it might be seen how its funds were expended."

I venture to say that that is as remarkable a part of the Report as any in it, that no satisfactory explanation of these circumstances has yet been given at all, and that there must be elements of very grave suspicion, until, in defence of their own honour, those who are able to give an explanation, give it. I now turn to the main part of the second group of charges—the question of intimidation and boycotting. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian said hardly anything to-night on the question of intimidation or boycotting. When it is his fortune to take part in debates upon boycotting at the present time, he describes it always, I think, as exclusive dealing. But he did not venture to apply that definition to it in the years now under review by the House. At that time he described boycotting as combined intimidation used for the purpose of destroying private liberty of choice by fear of ruin and starvation, sanctioned by the murder which is not to be denounced: as a monstrous public evil, threatening liberty and interfering with law and order; applied whether the landlord has been tyrannical or harsh; whether he has been indulgent or overbearing; to prevent the occupation of a farm from which, even in the last extremity and to meet his own personal wants, a landlord has felt it necessary to remove a tenant. That is in accordance with the description of boycotting and intimidation given by the Judges in their Report; and I venture to say there was nothing in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman to-night to show why he had absolutely changed in 1890 the opinions on that subject which he expressed in 1881, when this terrible system was in full force, except that he now finds it necessary to constitute himself the apologist for this agitation upon political grounds. We were told to-night that evictions and distress, and the action of the House of Lords in rejecting the Compensation for Disturbance Bill, were the causes of the increase of crime in those years. Yes, but the right hon. Gentleman did not charge the increase of crime to those causes in 1881. In those days what he said was this—and it is what the Commissioners report—that “with fatal and painful precision the steps of crime dogged the steps of the Land League.” Then the hon. Member for Cork was denounced as prominent in the attempt to substitute anarchial oppression for the authority of the law, and imprisoned by the right hon. Gentleman as reasonably suspected of treasonable practices, and inciting to intimidation. Now the hon. Member’s wrongs are dwelt upon, and his agitation almost applauded, as having given to Ireland the benefits of the Land Act of 1881. Well, Sir, it does seem to me that by the admissions of right hon. Gentlemen upon the Front Opposition Bench in the past the gravity of the circumstances on which the Judges have reported adversely to the respondents is sufficiently proved, and that for this House to adopt a Resolution dealing with only one portion of that Report—that portion which acquits the respondents—and to take no notice of that other portion of the Report which condemns them, would be as far from an act of justice as can well be conceived. Is there any reason why it should be done? There was an argument, stated by the right hon. Gentleman to-night, which was this:—

“All this conduct happened 10 years ago, and has been condoned by what is called the close treaty and alliance between hon. Members below the Gangway and the Conservative Party in 1885, when all these things were perfectly well known to the country.”

I demur to both those assertions. I demur to the assertion that all these findings, so far as the respondents in this Report are concerned, were perfectly well known to the country in 1885. I contend that there are important facts brought to light by this Report which were not known to the country at that time. As a sample, I would quote the close connection of hon. Members below the Gangway with the dissemination and production of newspapers inciting to crime and sedition, and the relations between the Irish Parliamentary Party and the physical force party and the Clan-na-Gael in America. In so far as those matters were known at all, they were known to us, who were then out of office, solely by the statements of right hon. Gentlemen opposite, and if some of us—I confess I was one—did not place the fullest confidence in those statements at that time, I think we may be absolved for not having done so when they are so absolutely disregarded by their authors on the present occasion. The other point is this—was there a close treaty or alliance between hon. Members below the Gangway opposite and the Conservative Party in order to turn out the Government of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian in 1885. No doubt the hon. Members below the Gangway, on the occasion of several important Divisions, voted in the same Lobby that we did, but they voted with us for reasons of their own, which were absolutely and entirely different from our reasons. We recorded our opinions on important matters at that time—the question of Egyptian policy, the question of the relief of General Gordon, the Budget, on which the right hon. Gentleman was finally defeated—we recorded them in Resolutions expressing our own opinions; and if hon. Members chose to vote for those resolutions, how could we help it?

SIR W. HARCOURT: No arrangement?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: No, none whatever. The right hon. Gentleman asks me whether there was no arrangement. Let me go a little more into that question, because the other day the right hon. Gentleman made a definite charge with regard to it. The charges of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian have been indefinite; but the right hon. Member for Derby made a definite charge with which I will deal. He said that the Tory leaders in 1885 gave a pledge to the Nationalist Party that, if they would only turn out the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, the Tory leaders would not renew the Coercion Act, and further, that Lord Salisbury went to Newport and made an apology for boycotting. Now, what are the facts? In August, 1885, the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. H. Gladstone) said that Lord Salisbury had made a compact with the hon. Member for Cork, and that the noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill) and Mr. Winn, now Lord St. Oswald, had promised the Parnellites three things in return for their support: firstly, the dropping of the Crimes Act; secondly, a Bill for the benefit of the Irish labourers; thirdly, a Land Purchase Bill on liberal terms. The hon. Member for Leeds made that statement to his constituents, and challenged a denial; and that denial was immediately forthcoming. It was absolutely and completely denied by letters which were published in the Press from Lord Salisbury, from my noble Friend the Member for Paddington, and from Mr. Winn.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I beg pardon.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Will the right hon. Gentleman wait a moment?

SIR W. HARCOURT: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken. My statement was founded upon a speech the noble Lord the Member for Paddington made in Yorkshire, in which he stated that a decision was taken by the Conservative Members sitting on this Bench that the Crimes Act should not be renewed; and that was before the Liberal Government was turned out. He made that statement in public.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Yes, Sir, but that is not the charge of the right hon. Gentleman. Of course we had considered that matter among ourselves before the Liberal Government was turned out. Of course we had to decide, as far as we could without access to official documents, what might be our course; but the charge of the right hon. Gentleman is this, that we communicated our intention to the hon. Member for Cork, and that there was a bargain between us that he should support us if we did not renew the Crimes Act.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I said nothing about a bargain; I said it was communicated, and I say now it was communicated, to the hon. Member for Cork.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The words of the right hon. Gentleman were these—that the Tory leaders in 1885 gave a pledge to the Nationalist Party that if they would only turn out the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian they would not renew the Crimes Act.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I say so now.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The right hon. Gentleman says so now, after I have told him that it was absolutely and completely denied by the three parties I have named. But it was denied by someone else; and if the right hon. Gentleman will not accept denials from this side of the House, perhaps he will accept the denial of the hon. Member for Cork. The hon. Member wrote upon this subject a letter to Sir Frederick Milner, which was published in August, 1885. The hon. Member wrote:—

"Dear Sir Frederick Milner,—I have just received your letter enclosing report of Mr. Herbert Gladstone's speech at Leeds, and directing my attention to a passage in which Mr. Gladstone asserts that there is an alliance for Parliamentary purposes, and also for the purpose of the general election, between Lord Salisbury and Lord Randolph Churchill on the one side, and myself and my colleagues on the other, upon the basis—first, of the dropping of the Crimes Act; second, of the Bill for the benefit of the labourers; and, third, of the passing of a Land Purchase Bill.

"Your letter also points out a further paragraph in the same speech, in which Mr. Gladstone is reported to have defied me among others to contradict these alleged facts. I can only say that there is not the slightest foundation for any of these statements of Mr. Herbert Gladstone. I have no knowledge of any such alliance, nor have any of my colleagues. I have held no communication upon any of the public matters referred to with any Member of the present Government, or any of their officials, directly or indirectly, except across the floor of the House of Commons. The first intimation I received of the intentions of the Government in respect of these matters was from Lord Carnarvon's speech in the Lords, and that of the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the Commons.

"Yours truly,

"CHARLES S. PARNELL.

"Irish Parliamentary Office, Palace Chambers, 9, Bridge Street, S.W., July 31."

After hearing that letter, I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will see that his charges have been calumnious, and that when he comes to address the House he will express his regret for having made them.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I repeat them.

Sir M. HICKS BEACH not giving way,

SIR W. HARCOURT: I rise to order. I wish to know whether indeed it has been so ruled in this House, when a right hon. Member addresses another Member across the floor of the House, and states that his charges are calumnious, that Member has not the right upon the instant to repudiate such a charge? I do repudiate it, and I say there can be no order in this House unless a Member is allowed to do so.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am the judge of order in this House. I am glad to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity, but so many interruptions are inconvenient when a right hon. Gentleman addresses the House.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: But the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian made another statement to-night. He said the conduct of the hon. Member for Cork and his followers had been condoned by the Conservative Party because—[Sir W. Harcourt rose to leave his seat]—I have not done yet.

SIR W. HARCOURT: Yes, I know; but I am not going to stay to be abused in this manner.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Because of Lord Carnarvon's interview with the hon. Member for Cork. Now, I must say that the extraordinary statements which have been made and persisted in with regard to that interview are not warranted by the facts of the case. In the first place, it was never sanctioned by the Cabinet, or known to the Cabinet until long afterwards. In the second place, Lord Carnarvon has distinctly denied that at that interview he promised anything or held out any hopes whatever, or did anything more than ascertain the views of the hon. Member for Cork. But the right hon. Member for Derby also charged Lord Salisbury with having gone to Newport that autumn, after the dissolution of Parliament, and made an apology for boycotting, implying, I suppose, that this was an attempt to gain the Irish vote. I absolutely deny that accusation. So far from apologising for boycotting, what Lord Salisbury said was this—he pointed out the impossibility of dealing by law with all kinds of boycotting; he instanced a certain kind—that of declining to sit in the same chapel with a boycotted person, with which he said the law could not deal. That is perfectly true; it was true then; it remains true now. Only the other day I saw a statement relating to several cases in Ireland in which that kind of boycotting had taken place. How had it been dealt with? Not by the law, but by the interference of the Bishop of the diocese, who had closed, or threatened to close, the chapel. After that admission, Lord Salisbury went on to say—

"As far as boycotting is liable to the law, as far as legal remedies can reach it, do not imagine that the Irish Government are passive in putting remedies of the ordinary law into action. At the present moment there are 35 prosecutions for boycotting, and that alone will show you that the Irish Government are doing their best with what they consider a difficult evil. I believe that Parliament possessing a full mandate and the Government in power are bound above everything else to exhaust every possible remedy in order that men may pursue freely their lawful industry in any station in life."

I have always been reluctant to trouble the House by reference to any expressions of opinion of my own; but at that time I had the honour to occupy the responsible post of Chancellor of the Exchequer and leader of the House, and, therefore, what I publicly said may, I think, have been received in the country as said with some authority. At the end of September, 1885, in a speech at Salisbury, I admitted that boycotting was rife in certain parts of Ireland. I said—

“Prosecutions have been instituted, and are now being instituted, against persons who were supposed to be guilty of this offence of boycotting, and I can assure you that no efforts will be spared on the part of the Government to conduct their prosecutions to a successful conclusion, so as to punish the guilty and to institute prosecutions in all cases where any evidence can be found to justify them.”

Then I went on to say—

“But if these means do not succeed we must look for others. The law must be upheld; a combination against it cannot be allowed to prevail.”

Just before the General Election, on the 4th of November, speaking at Bristol, I said—

“The Conservatives had undertaken the government of Ireland at a time of very serious difficulty, and they had undertaken it in the spirit that had always governed the Conservative Party in the matter, and they had resolved that they would not introduce exceptional legislation for the prevention of crime unless it was perfectly clear to their minds that crime could not be prevented by the ordinary law. They were exerting now all the powers of the ordinary law to preserve peace and order in Ireland, and they were exerting them with very considerable success; but he could assure his hearers that, if it should be found that the powers of the ordinary law did not suffice to preserve peace and order in Ireland, the Ministry would not let months elapse, as Mr. Gladstone's Government had allowed months to elapse during their tenure of office, before coming to Parliament to ask it to help them in the matter.”

I think I may ask the House whether, at any rate, that was not perfectly plain speaking upon the determination of the Conservative Party to put down boycotting and crime, even by exceptional legislation? It is impossible that any one considering such speeches could have supposed the Government would hesitate, as when the moment came they did not hesitate to appeal to Parliament to strengthen the law; and if at the General Election of 1885 the Irish vote was to a certain extent given to the Conservative Party, that vote was not given out of any feeling of affection for us. It was given, as is notorious, because the Irish Party desired to equalise the two great Parties of Great Britain so as to be able to hold the balance between them. I think I have shown that nothing that occurred in 1885 justifies the charges that have been brought against our conduct in that year by the right hon. Gentleman on the Front Bench opposite; and I would add that nothing that occurred then can, to my mind, be urged as a reason why we should condone now matters which, as I have stated already, have been for the first time completely disclosed and authoritatively established by the Report of the Commission. I will go further and say that I can hardly understand why right hon. Gentlemen opposite should object to record the Report in the Journals of the House, and to adopt the conclusions at which the Commissioners have arrived. I do not understand it having regard to the numberless occasions on which they have expressed opinions absolutely identical with those expressed by the Commissioners. If it be true, that thanks to the “union of hearts,” all these things are things of the past—that crime and boycotting, and all those evils which are referred to by the Commissioners no longer exist, or, at any rate, are now absolutely discountenanced by those to whom they are attributed in the Commissioners' Report—if that be true, I cannot see why the Motion for recording the Report in our Journals and adopting its conclusions should not be accepted unanimously by this House. Some persons have represented the Report as a verdict amounting to a triumphant acquittal. In my opinion, this cannot be fairly stated as the effect of the Report; but if there be any persons who really believe that to be its effect, they certainly cannot object to the Motion to record it on the Journals of the House. On our side we believe that the Report contains condemnation as well as acquittal, and we think it right and just to record both. If it contains acquittal upon those issues which, as affecting chiefly personal honour, are more important to individuals, it contains condemnation upon those issues which are more important to the country at large. Those evils which were rife in the days to which the Report refers are evils, whatever may be the exculpation or apology tendered for them by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. They may now be dormant or suppressed; but, however that may be, they still remain evils, and their revival under any form of Government would be fatal to liberty and prosperity to Ireland.

(8.38.) Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

(8.40.) MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): As one of those alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Bristol in the opening part of his speech, as one of those referred to by the Judges in their Report as having established and joined the Land League organisation with the intention, by every means, of bringing about the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation, I desire to say a few words on this debate. The evidence on which this serious conclusion is based is, that on August 21st, 1880, I delivered a short speech reprehending the action of those who passed a resolution in reference to the men who made a raid for firearms upon the ship Juno, lying in the river Lee, at Cork. In that speech I am reported to have said—

“I recognised the services the League had done, but failed to receive, either in that service or in the period of their existence, anything to give them a right to criticise the action of other people.”

Now, this is the evidence upon which this serious charge has been founded. For myself, I do not submit the finding to the critical examination of a legal mind; but it occurs to me, as a matter of common sense, that never was a more serious charge based on so flimsy a foundation, and this particularly so because of the fact that, when I was examined before the Commission, I stated that my motive for making that speech was that I was endeavouring to save the new Constitutional movement from the hostile hands of men who looked upon it with jealous and unfriendly eyes. But I am not concerned to defend myself against the charge. The Judges, if they like, may feel themselves justified in ascribing to me ulterior and treasonable motives, but I deny that the Judges had any commission whatever to try me for my motives. Was any overt act proved against me for which I could be arraigned before a jury? I have examined the Report, and I fail to find any such act cited, and therefore I assert that I have been judged by the Commission open to this serious charge for motives, and for motives only. Probably, the Judges did take into account my admission that I was a Fenian. I have sworn it in Court, I have admitted it on platforms, I avow it here, and I am not ashamed to avow it here to-day. Sir, I could not help being a Fenian. I cannot fix the hour of the day when I began to hate England; when I began to hate the English people, the English Government, and everything that bore the name of England. To be a Fenian, to be discontented, was a tradition to me handed down through generations of forefathers. I was brought up in the very atmosphere of disaffection. I might say I lisped what you call treasonable language almost when I began to talk. In this way I grew up and read the history of my country. Then I found the Black Chapter that relates the English conquest of Ireland, the confiscation of Irish land, the robbery and murder of the Irish people. I read this chapter until my mind was so affected that the enthusiasm of the boy became the conviction of the man, the conviction that it was the duty of every Irishman, at no matter what cost, to strike at the hereditary enemies of the Irish race and the Irish nation. The struggles of the Irish people, their battles for freedom, were my studies, and the lives and deaths of Irish patriots were examples I desired to follow. I continued in this state of mind even when in maturer years. I arrived at the conclusion that the policy I was pursuing was the policy of despair. It was to me a patriotic duty that demanded the sacrifice, and I was willing to make that sacrifice. I have run a thousand risks for these convictions. For many years my liberty and my life were not worth an hour's purchase, yet I worked on, toiled on without hope, and with no prospect before me but the convict's jacket or the hangman's rope. I now look back at that period of my life without shame and without remorse. Judges may condemn me, and this House may ratify their Judgment, and place upon its Journals the record of that Judgment; but I have nothing to recall, nothing to regret. I have everything to be proud of, everything to glory in. A change came over the land. The hon. Member for Cork, my friend and leader, whose leadership I feel a pride in following, and to follow whom I esteem to be worthy of life itself, started a movement and I joined the movement with an honest desire to further its objects. I had no ulterior motive, as attributed to me by the Judges. It is true, perhaps, as well as I can recall my feelings, that I reserved to myself the right, as even now I reserve to myself the right, should Constitutional means fail to re-establish the Constitutional liberties of the Irish people, to be free to adopt whatever course shall seem to my judgment right and proper. But if that unhappy moment should arrive there will be no deception, no two ways about me. If I commit an overt act of treason I shall be prepared to stand the consequences of my action. I repeat that I honestly joined the Land League organisation with the honest intention to further its programme. I had no ulterior motive beyond giving effect to the objects to be found in the constitution of the League, and I am on those same lines still. I am encouraged to remain on those lines by the proposal that has been brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, a proposal that makes for the granting to the Irish people Home Rule—the right to govern themselves. I will go farther and say that proposal, generously made, and I will say loyally and without reservation accepted by the Irish people, has eradicated from my mind and heart the bitterness I once felt towards this nation and this people. Therefore I say I have adopted in its fulness the Constitutional mode of action, and I have now no desire to depart from it. Whether I continue to pursue that course of action it remains for the English Parliament and the English people to decide. But I will say this much, in conclusion, that whether I strive to serve Ireland by Constitutional means or by an appeal to physical force, my life belongs to my country.

*(8.50.) MR. J. FORREST FULTON (West Ham, N.): Whatever view may be taken of the sentiments of the hon.

VOL. CCCXLI. [THIRD SERIES.]

Member who has just sat down, on this side of the House, at any rate we must feel that he has acted a frank and manly part. He has honestly confessed that he is a traitor at heart. He hopes by Constitutional means to win the object he desires, and so long as he entertains that hope he will follow these means, but if he finds that Constitutional means do not bring about the desire of his heart then he reserves to himself complete freedom of action. I do not think I in any way misrepresent the statement of the hon. Member made in his place in the House. It is a position he has deliberately taken up, and which it appears to me he will have to stand by. We are about to consider the details of this Report. It is a very remarkable document, and will have to be examined in very considerable detail. We are asked to affirm the proposition that it shall be entered upon the Journals of this House, and it will be my endeavour to give the reasons that induce me to think it is right and proper the Report should be so entered on the Journals of the House, and before I sit down I shall express an opinion that, in addition to that, it would be well for the Government to consider if stronger and sterner measures should not be taken. In order to appreciate the real effect of the Report of the Commission there are two preliminary facts it is well to remember. In 1877, say the Commissioners, Mr. Parnell became the virtual leader of the Home Rule Party, and at that time, the Report goes on to say, there existed in Ireland an organisation known as the Irish Republican Brotherhood. This interesting association was referred to by the hon. Member for Cork in his evidence when he said he always understood that it was the practice of the Brotherhood to "assassinate traitors." There existed in addition to this body in Ireland a kindred body in America known by the name of the Clan-na-Gael. The Commissioners find that these two conspiracies were one and the same. At page 6 of the Report I find that in December, 1877, when Mr. Davitt was released from Portland Prison, and the Commissioners insert this remarkable paragraph, to which I would draw very serious attention. Upon Mr. Davitt's release from prison, in 1877, upon ticket-of-leave, the Report says:—

"A Committee to receive him, together with Charles McCarthy, Thomas Chambers, and John P. O'Brien (three persons recently released from imprisonment under sentences for seditious practices) was formed, and a public address, signed by Messrs. Parnell, Biggar, Dillon, D. Curley, Patrick Egan, James Carey, Thomas Brennan, and others was presented to him. This address contained the following words:—'With a self-denying patriotism, like the patriot Marcus Curtin, you made an offering of life, fortune, and liberty on the altar of your country, and if by such sacrifices as yours her freedom has not been achieved, her honour has been saved.'"

It is very well to remind the House that Michael Davitt was released upon ticket-of-leave, having been convicted of treason-felony. Then came the "new departure," the ostensible subordination of the Fenian views to Mr. Parnell's constitutional plan. A telegram was despatched to Ireland proposing a union with the supporters of Mr. Parnell's Party and a letter was addressed to the Freeman newspaper in which he referred to this as a "new departure." One of the gravest charges, it seems to me, which has been brought against the Member for Cork is that he was closely identified with the American Fenian Irish Party; that his Party have subsisted for many years on the funds supplied by that party. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to pass lightly over many pages of this Report, as if they had no concern for the Members of this House, but it seems to me that they should have referred to the findings of the Commission as to what took place when Mr. Parnell visited America. Mr. Parnell and Mr. Dillon were warmly received by all sections of the party in the United States, and among them by the Clan-na-Gael. And then the Report goes on to say that Le Caron afterwards became a member of the Clan-na-Gael for the purpose of giving information to the British Government. It is desirable to quote this—

"Major Le Caron, a British subject, who had served in the United States Army during the Civil War, afterwards became a member of the Clan-na-Gael for the purpose of giving evidence to the British Government. His evidence, corroborated by the documents he produced, establishes that the Clan-na-Gael endeavoured to arrange and control the meetings held in various places for the reception and hearing of Mr. Parnell. But the evidence does not establish that this was done with the consent or knowledge of Mr. Parnell, who, moreover, stated in his evidence that he did not know, except by rumours in some instances, the antecedents of the persons who organised the meetings which he addressed, and supported him on the platform."

But it must be read in connection with other paragraphs, and the Report goes on to say that—

"Captain O'M. Condon took a leading part on the Committee which procured for Mr. Parnell this hearing before the House of Representatives. Mr. Parnell knew this, and that Condon was a member of the Clan-na-Gael, and one of the released prisoners in connection with the murder of Serjeant Brett."

I am very anxious not to state anything in this House which is not stated in the pages of this Report. Here we have a direct and distinct finding that upon the visit of the Member for Cork to America, we find him acting in the closest connection with the members of the Fenian Party. And now, Sir, I come to matters connected with the hon. Member for the City of Cork, to which it will be my duty to call the attention of the House. I come to a matter on which the Commissioners, having on the one hand the oath of the Member for Cork, and having on the other hand evidence pointing in a different direction, deliberately accepted the evidence in preference to the oath of the hon. Member for Cork. The first matter is with regard to the speech which the hon. Member is said to have made at Cincinnati on the 20th of February, 1880. I need not refer in detail to that speech, but only to concluding words which are set out in the Report at page 21. Mr. Parnell says:—

"None of us, whether we are in America or Ireland, or wherever we may be, will be satisfied until we have destroyed the last link which keeps Ireland bound to England."

The importance of that declaration is no so much in connection with the words themselves, which I am perfectly ready to admit are old and have been quoted over and over again, but the importance is this: that that speech was printed for years in newspaper after newspaper, and was circulated throughout the length and breadth of the land, absolutely uncontradicted by the hon. Member for Cork. It was not until one night on the Second Reading of the Bill of the Member for Mid Lothian for the better government of Ireland, when it became of the utmost importance to the hon.

Member for Cork to show, if he could, in the House of Commons, as many were then wavering whether they should support the Member for Mid Lothian or not—that he had not said these words, that he for the first time stated that he never uttered the words which he was reported to have used at Cincinnati. [Ministerial Cheers.] We have that denial of the hon. Member for Cork in this House recorded in the pages of Hansard. Now let us see what the Commission says. I observe that when he was giving evidence on oath he does not deny using the words in the same clear and pointed way in which he denied them in this House. The Commissioners say—

“Mr. Parnell will not undertake to say that he did not use the expression ‘that he would not be satisfied until the last link between Ireland and England was destroyed,’ but says it was improbable he did so, and that if he did it must have been largely qualified by other matter, as it is entirely opposed to anything he has ever thought or said.”

Now, Sir, in this House he utterly denied using the words, but the Report goes on to say—

“We find that Mr. Parnell did use the words attributed to him, and they certainly are not inconsistent with some of his previous utterances.”

But his first charge, and the evidence set out in the Report in connection with it, does not merely confine itself to a finding upon that matter. It sets out another matter in which they positively and distinctly affirm that they decline to accept the word of the Member for Cork. On the same page of the Report the Commissioners say—

“Mr. Parnell left the United States on the 12th of March, 1880, his tour having been shortened in consequence of the Dissolution of Parliament. Before his departure he summoned a conference of prominent Irishmen at New York to which he invited Patrick Ford, for the purpose of forming an auxiliary organisation of the Land League in America, in harmony with the organisation in Ireland, and to assist its objects.”

In other words, the Commissioners find that as early as 1880 the Member for Cork was in close connection with Patrick Ford, and being compelled to leave America he is careful to invite Patrick Ford to the Conference for the purpose of forming an auxiliary organisation, for the purpose set forth in the Report. Upon this part of the case, we see that in a speech in the Rotunda, Dublin, in 1880, Mr. Parnell said—

“At one of our meetings in America a gentleman came on the platform and handed me 25 dollars, and said: ‘Here is 5 dollars for bread and 20 dollars for lead.’”

The report of this speech in the Freeman newspaper adds that loud and long cheers followed this. It is not for the loud and long cheers that I trouble the House with this quotation, but for Mr. Parnell’s explanation. The Commissioners says—

“Mr. Parnell stated in cross-examination that his narration of this offer of ‘20 dollars for lead’ was stupid and more than stupid, as there was no object in it, because by lead he understood the person who gave the dollars to mean the Land League. It appears to us, however, that there was an object in it—namely to give his hearers evidence that he had the support of those who advocated the use of lead, and that his hearers were not intended to think and would not be likely to understand that by ‘lead’ the Irish Land League was signified.”

These matters are a little important, because the House is asked by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian to extend our sympathies to the hon. Member for Cork.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): He does not require your sympathy.

*MR. FULTON: I did not say the hon. Member required sympathy, but that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) had asked us to extend our sympathies to the hon. Member in consequence of these allegations. The Commissioners go on to make this very significant observation—

“After this meeting at the Rotundo, Mr. Parnell does not appear to have encountered any hostility from the physical force party.”

I am not at all surprised after that speech that the hon. Member for the City of Cork did not meet with any hostility from the physical force party, because the impression left upon their minds must have been that the hon. Member was in entire unison with their opinions and regarded them as being in the highest degree praiseworthy. On page 23 of the Report I find another instance in which the Commission have failed to agree with the views of the hon. Member for the City of Cork—

“Mr. Parnell, indeed, asserts that the organisation of the Irish Republican Brotherhood constantly and consistently opposed the Land League from the first, but the account of his views given in the Nation newspaper of the 2nd October, 1880, does not agree with this:”

and they set out a remarkable interview the hon. Member for Cork had with Redpath. The Commissioners go on to say that "Mr. Parnell stated in cross examination that the opposition of the Fenian Party became stronger after this, but we find no evidence of it. On the contrary, Mr. M. Harris told us that had it not been for the Fenian organisation the Land League never could have assumed the proportions it did, and he added, 'I know that what I am saying will tell a good deal against what has been put forth in the witness-box, but I want to tell the truth.'"

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian passes over as one of no importance the finding of fact that

"In our judgment the charge against the respondents collectively of having conspired to bring about total separation is not established. But we find that some of them, together with Mr. Davitt, established and joined in the Land League organisation with the intention, by its means, to bring about the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation. We think that this has been established against the following among the respondents:—Mr. Davitt, Mr. M. Harris, Mr. Dillon, Mr. W. O'Brien, Mr. W. Redmond, Mr. J. O'Connor, Mr. Joseph Condon, and Mr. J. J. O'Kelly."

It is well we should not forget what that finding amounts to. It is not merely a finding, as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would have us believe, that these persons named in the Report were fighting for the repeal of the Union. It is not the question of the repeal of the Union which is connected with the finding. It is the question of the total separation of England and Ireland, and the establishment of Ireland as a separate nation. That is the matter upon which the Commissioners report. There is a further point on this finding which affects each and every one of the persons named who are Members of Parliament, I mean in connection with the oath of allegiance which they have taken at the Table. A Member of the House of Commons when he takes the oath of allegiance is not entitled to join in a criminal conspiracy, having for its object, not the repeal of the Union, as the right hon. Gentleman would have us believe, but the total separation of England and Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: None of these Members had taken the oath of allegiance at the time when these things occurred.

*MR. FULTON: I am glad to hear that none of these persons had taken the oath of allegiance at that time. I was under the impression they were all Members of the House of Commons. Will the hon. Member deny that the Member for East Mayo was a Member of the House at that time?

MR. SEXTON: No; the League was formed in 1879, and the hon. Member became a Member of the House in 1880.

*MR. FULTON: At any rate, the Member for East Mayo was a Member in 1880, and the Commissioners do not find that this conspiracy ceased in 1879. On the contrary, a proper reading of the Report will show it as a continuing conspiracy, continuing through 1879, 1880, 1881, and 1882, and probably until 1885; and if that be so, I think the hon. Member will, at any rate, admit I am entitled to argue that the Member for East Mayo, and all the other Members, if they were engaged in 1880 in the conspiracy, which the hon. Member seems to admit, they were engaged in it in 1879.

MR. SEXTON: The Commissioners find nothing whatever of an intention, they find no act, and whilst they fix the period when the combination began, they do not say that it continued for any length of time.

*MR. FULTON: My contention is a fair reading of the finding of the Commissioners in regard to the first charge is that this was a continuing conspiracy. I pass to the second charge—a very remarkable and important charge brought against them—

"The second charge," say the Commissioners, "we have to investigate is that one of the immediate objects of the conspiracy was, by a system of coercion and intimidation, to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents, for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled the English garrison."

The Commissioners give a very interesting account of boycotting. The right hon. Gentleman for a very long time past has spoken of boycotting in a manner which would lead us to suppose he always regarded it as a praiseworthy occupation. This is what the Commissioners say about boycotting:—

"It will be seen from these instances of boycotting, which might be largely added to, that it constituted a system of intimidation of a most severe and cruel character. . . . We are of opinion that the combination of which boycotting was the instrument is illegal, both in its objects and in the means which were adopted."

Elsewhere the Commissioners describe boycotting as "an elaborate and all-pervading tyranny." But what the Commissioners say with regard to boycotting is certainly not stronger—perhaps not so strong—as the condemnation which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian made of that abominable practice in 1882. I am not going to detain the House with the numerous instances which the Report contains of the abominable system which was at that time carried out in Ireland. I desire, however, to refer to one case, which is a comparatively light case, but it is important because there is a finding of the Commission upon it with regard to the Member for West Kerry (Mr. E. Harrington.) The Commissioners say:—

"Herbert's father, an old man of over 70 years of age, was stoned and wounded; his child, ten years of age, was pursued and terrified; and on the 24th June, 1886, Herbert himself was attacked on his way home from the County Court Sessions at Tralee by three or four men, who fired at him, riddling his coat with bullets, one of which struck him on the right arm, causing him to be confined in the infirmary for about six weeks. Mr. Edward Harrington, M.P., when these extracts from his paper were put to him, upon cross-examination, suggested for the first time that he did not believe Herbert had been wilfully shot, but that the wound had been accidentally inflicted by Herbert himself. This suggestion, however, in our judgment, is entirely unfounded, and, moreover, Mr. Harrington had, in the Kerry Sentinel, of the 25th June, 1886, published an article narrating the outrage with great particularity, and stating that a most determined and desperate attempt had been made on the life of Edward Herbert, and, never suggesting that the injury Herbert received was self-inflicted, the article added that no arrests were made."

Then comes the finding of the Commission on the second charge.

"In our judgment the leaders of the Land League who combined together to carry out the system of boycotting were guilty of a criminal conspiracy, one of the objects of which was, as stated in the second charge, by a system of coercion and intimidation to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled the English garrison. We consider that this charge has been established against the following respondents—C. S. Parnell, Jeremiah D. Sheehan," and forty others. I come to the fourth charge made against the Member for

Cork and his followers. This was passed over by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian as almost beneath his notice—

"We now proceed to consider the fourth charge, that the respondents disseminated the Irish World and other newspapers tending to incite to sedition and the commission of other crimes. . . . During 1880, 1881, 1882, the League disseminated throughout Ireland a paper called the Irish World. It was edited by Patrick Ford, who, in conjunction with O'Donovan Rossa, had originated the Skirmishing Fund. During these years Patrick Ford was requested by Messrs. Davitt, Egan, Quinn (Secretary of the Land League), and Brennan to send this paper to Ireland, and it was proved that it was disseminated by the League, marked for 'free distribution.' Down to the middle or autumn of 1882 this paper was admittedly favourable to the League, and we have been told by Mr. Davitt that three-fourths of the news coming from America were subscribed through the instrumentality of the hundreds of branches of the Auxiliary American League, by reason of the appeals made by Ford in the Irish World. Mr. Parnell stated to us, that up to 1882 the Irish World had most actively supported the Land League, and that, till then, it never wavered, and that it then ceased to co-operate with the Land League; but that since the introduction of Mr. Gladstone's Bill (of 1886), Patrick Ford again changed his policy. . . . On the 5th of May, 1880, Davitt telegraphed to Patrick Ford as follows:—'Copies of the Irish World shall be sent to all parts of Ireland. Bishop Moran of Ossory (a nephew of Cardinal Cullen) denounced it and the Land League. May Heaven open his eyes to the truth! Spread the light.'"

The Report sets out an atrocious article published in the Irish World, on the 28th August, 1880, advocating the destruction of London, of the House of Commons, and other public buildings, by dynamite.

"On the 30th Oct., 1880," the Report goes on to say, "Mr. Davitt, speaking at Leadville, in America, characterised the Irish World as one of the noblest friends of the Irish people."

Michael Davitt, who is in the most intimate connection with the hon. Member for the city of Cork, who was received when he came out of Portland with an address, signed by the hon. Member for the city of Cork, and I think we may reasonably infer that the hon. Member for the city of Cork did not disapprove of the language Michael Davitt so used in speaking of the Irish World as one of the noblest friends of the Irish people. Quinn, the secretary of the League, who was in Ireland, telegraphed on the 5th October, 1881, to Patrick Ford—

"Numerous applications are daily received at the Land League Office for copies of the Irish World. I appeal to our friends in America to furnish us with as many copies as they can, so that we may be able to meet the constant demand for it. Its circulation just now can be of immense service to the cause."

The Report goes on to say—

"It would seem that from October, 1881, till December, 1883, Patrick Ford suspended his advocacy of the Skirmishing Fund policy, but in December, 1883, he opened an Emergency Fund, the object of which he thus described in his paper: 'The object of this fund will be to aid the active forces on the other side in carrying on the war against the enemy. It is unnecessary to enter into details. I can only say in a general way what I believe in myself. I believe in making reprisals. An eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. I believe that every informer ought to die the death of a dog. I believe that all the material damage possible ought to be inflicted on the enemy, and that the war against the foeman ought to be persisted in without quarter to the end. I believe that England ought to be plagued with all the plagues of Egypt—ought to be scourged by day, and terrorised by night. I believe that this species of warfare ought to be kept up until England, hurt as well as scared, falls paralysed upon her knees, and begs Ireland to depart from her. This is my idea of making war on England.'"

I find it also said by the Commissioners—

"Mr. Davitt told us that whenever he went to America after 1878, Patrick Ford's was the first house to which he bent his footsteps upon arriving in New York, and that Ford was a man altogether misrepresented in England, and that he (Davitt), knew a large number of people in America and in Europe, and that he had yet to meet a better man morally, both as a Christian and as a philanthropist, than Patrick Ford."

That is the description of Mr. Davitt, the man who is responsible for the matter circulated throughout the length and breadth of Ireland in the Irish World, and that is the gentleman whom the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) thinks worthy of the sympathy of the House. Then there is another matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the House. In the Irish World of 18th December, 1880, the following appeared:—

"Outrages, outrages! They haven't begun yet. Out ye vipers of darkness! Out ye hungry wolves! Ye bloodhounds! Out from God's holy isle ere ye are overtaken by that punishment which caught the wicked land-wolves of France from 1779 to 1793."

If any Member of the House will turn to pages 81 to 85 of the Report he will find that miserable prophecy has been fulfilled. Outrages were bad enough in 1880, but they were worse in 1881 and 1882, and I think we may fairly presume from the findings of the Commissioners that those outrages were certainly not diminished by the teachings of these newspapers. There is yet another newspaper mentioned: United Ireland. Hon. Members of this House are so familiar with its contents that I need not trouble them with extracts from that paper; but as there is an attempt by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to ignore the facts and appeal to history, I should remind the House that the editor of that remarkable journal was the Member for East Cork, Mr. Wm. O'Brien. The Commissioners state that—"A large number of extracts from United Ireland were read in evidence before us. We do not think it necessary to set out many of these extracts. The obvious intention of many of them was to appeal to men of extreme views."

Then the Commissioners give an extract as an example:—

"On the 26th May, 1883.—Mrs. Curley Fund.—Sir,—As the strangling Commission is over, and honest Dan Curley is killed off by the British Government, I enclose 10s. for his helpless family. I only wish it were pounds."

Daniel Curley was one of the persons convicted of the Phoenix Park murders. In a leading article of the 22nd December, 1883, O'Donnell, the murderer of Carey, is described as "Having slain a monster for whose destruction he would, in most civilised communities, have been esteemed a public benefactor."

On the 30th of June, 1883, we find Mr. Finnerty described in United Ireland as an "Irishman brave and daring almost to a fault." In the Nation of 31st of March, 1883, it was reported that Mr. Finnerty had said, in regard to the blowing up of the Government buildings in London, that "he was very sorry that it was not more successful." Then I come to the paper which the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian dismisses with the most contemptuous notice. He apparently obtains his facts from the hon. Member for East Fife (Mr. Asquith), who said it was a wretched organ, only about 4,000 copies weekly were sold, and it was a matter so insignificant that it was quite unnecessary to take notice of it. If the House of Commons will read what the Commissioners point out about the Irishman, they will find it is not quite so insignificant as the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian would have us believe. They say:—

“The Irishman newspaper, which was purchased by Mr. Parnell and others, as above mentioned, first appeared under the editorship of Mr. William O'Brien, M.P., on the 6th of August, 1881, and was continued down to August, 1885, notwithstanding, as we learn from Mr. Parnell, that its publication involved a loss. Mr. Parnell stated in evidence that he purchased the Irishman because it was a disreputable paper which he wished to get rid of, but the editorial notice of the 6th of August, 1881, upon the change of proprietorship, contained these words: ‘The Irishman has changed hands but not minds. The history of its past is the programme of its future. Thrice in its career a transfer of management has taken place, but not once has it swerved from the great principles for the advocacy of which it was first established. As there has been, so there shall not be, any change in its spirit.’”

Now that is one of the organs—

MR. GOSCHEN: Edited by Pigott.

*MR. FULTON: Yes, as I am reminded, that was one of the organs edited by the patriot Pigott [Home Rule laughter and ironical cheers]. Hon. Members opposite, I think, still regard him, as they regarded him then, as a patriot. The Irishman newspaper had been the organ of the Physical Force or Fenian Party, and the Commissioners say—

“We draw the inference from Mr. Parnell's purchase of that paper, coupled with the manner in which it was conducted until its extinction in 1885, that Mr. Parnell's object was to address his Fenian supporters through that medium, while United Ireland was more particularly the organ of the Land League organisation.”

This is the third instance in which the Commissioners, having on the one hand the oath of Mr. Parnell, and on the other hand evidence pointing in a contrary direction, have deliberately accepted the evidence as the more worthy of belief. On this point we have this finding in the Report—

“No denunciation by Mr. Parnell of the action of the Physical Force Party, either in Ireland or America, has been given in evidence, and Mr. Parnell stated before us that he could not say that he had, by speech or action, found fault with the Fenian organisation. We think that the articles from the Irishman above cited were deservedly characterised by Archbishop Walsh as most abominable. Upon this part of the case we find that the respondents did disseminate newspapers tending to incite to sedition and the commission of crime.”

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) may think that a trifling accusation to bring against Members of this House. He may think that the real interpretation of the facts does not altogether support that finding; but if it be admitted that the evidence given before the Commission was true, and that the charge was made against hon. Members, then I think it must be also admitted that the conclusion to which the Commissioners have arrived does not reflect any particular credit upon the persons against whom these charges are made, and the findings are made against all the respondents. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) said—“I dismiss this from my consideration, because it is not direct but constructive.” I say it is direct. I say it is not constructive. The worst of all these newspapers was the Irish World, because it advocated murder in its most atrocious form, and it was circulated by “free distribution” at the request of the Secretary of the Land League, the President of which was the Member for Cork. Now, Sir, I come to another point which I think is of very great importance. That is the effect of speeches and agitation upon the amount of crime. I desire to remind the House of what the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) said in a very important speech which he delivered, I think, in the County of Lancashire, in 1879. At that time the Conservative Party were holding Office, and were occupying the same Benches as they are occupying now. The Member for Mid Lothian was holding them up to ridicule and denouncing their policy, and generally conducting a crusade against them. At that time there was in existence an Act known as the Peace Preservation Act, which was about to expire, and the question was whether it should be renewed or not, and an agitation was being got up in the country against its renewal. In 1879, in Lancashire, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“That in the whole of his political experience, then approaching to 50 years, never was Ireland so peaceful as it was at that time.”

It was quite true that was so, for in 1877 there were only 236 reported outrages; in 1878 only 301; and in 1879 only 863. But it was a very remarkable coincidence, to say the least, that the moment the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid

Lothian became the Prime Minister of this country and responsible for the government of Ireland (whether it was due to the fact of his becoming Prime Minister or for some other reason) the fact remains, that the previously peaceful Ireland became a sea of crime. That was a fact that could not be denied. The hon. Member for South Hackney (Sir C. Russell), in his eloquent and exhaustive speech before the Commission, was most desirous of convincing the Commissioners that that stupendous outbreak of crime, which began in 1880 and continued until the passing of the Crimes Act in 1882, was due to other causes than to which it was contended it was due, and amongst other causes he was anxious to show that it was due to evictions. It is interesting to see that the Commissioners say—

“That the landlords in such circumstances should oppose the League and resort to the only weapon they had for their protection, namely, eviction, is not to be wondered at, and, in our judgment, the increased evictions which began in 1879 and continued during subsequent years was the result of the agitation against the landlords. It was sought to liken the crime of 1880-1-2 to that which existed in the years following the great famine of 1846-48, but when the figures as to these years are examined the analogy fails.”

Having set out the figures for those years this is the conclusion to which the Commissioners come—

“So that with 3,415 families evicted in 1881 there was more agrarian crime (4,439) than in all the four years together (1849-52), with 58,423 families evicted.”

In that way, and by reference to figures and facts, the Commissioners find, in spite of the eloquence of the hon. Member for South Hackney, that—

“We are not able to accept that as the explanation of the crime of 1880 to 1882.”

Then I wish to refer to another suggestion of the hon. Member for South Hackney—that crime was caused by secret societies acting in antagonism with the Land League. On this the Commissioners say—

“As to the suggestion that the crime was caused by secret societies acting in antagonism to the Land League, Mr. Parnell, in the House of Commons on the 7th of January, 1881, stated that secret societies had then ceased to exist in Ireland. Mr. Parnell was then alluding to secret societies other than that of the Fenian conspiracy, and in our judgment Mr. Parnell was accurate when he made that statement. Mr. M. Harris has also stated in evidence that no secret societies except that of the Fenians then existed. We find no trace in the evidence of the League, or any of its chiefs or officers, suggesting that the crime which existed was the act of any such societies. It appears to us that this suggestion was first made during this inquiry. Mr. Loudon, when in the box, stated that the crime in his part of the country was perpetrated by a society called the Herds League; but upon cross-examination it appeared that he had no facts on which to base his suggestion. As to the third suggestion, namely, that the throwing out of the Compensation for Disturbance Bill in August, 1880, was the origin of the increase of crime, we are of opinion that it was not the effective cause of that increase, but that it arose from the agitation of which the rejection of the Disturbance Bill was made the occasion.”

So that it follows from the findings of this Report that the Commissioners rejected each and every one of the suggestions made by the hon. Member for Hackney as accounting for the agrarian outrages during those years. Now, with regard to the fourth charge, namely, that the respondents, by their speeches, and by payments for that purpose, incited persons to the commission of crime, including murder, the Commissioners find—

“That the respondents did not directly incite persons to the commission of crime other than intimidation, but that they did incite to intimidation, and that the consequence of that incitement was that crime and outrage were committed by the persons incited.”

Then comes this very remarkable finding, upon which I wish to address a few remarks to the House—

“We find that it was not proved that the respondents made payments for the purpose of inciting persons to commit crime.”

In a few moments I will endeavour to show the House that the reason why it was not proved that the respondents made payments for the purpose of inciting to crime was that they declined to produce the books which might have demonstrated, I agree, their innocence, but which might, and probably would have demonstrated their guilt. With regard to the question of the Land League books, let me refer to page 56 of the Report. It is stated by the Commissioners that the Land League was suppressed on October 18, 1881, and that most of the books were removed to London by Messrs. Campbell, M.P., and P. J. Sheridan, a gentleman who had been concerned in getting up outrages in the West of Ireland

*SIR C. RUSSELL (Hackney): Where is the paragraph saying that P. J. Sheridan was engaged in getting up outrages in the West?

*MR. FULTON: I may be wrong as to that. If I am, I withdraw that statement; but there is no doubt as to who he was.

*SIR C. RUSSELL: Where is it stated? Where does the hon. Gentleman find it stated that P. J. Sheridan was engaged in the commission of outrages?

*MR. FULTON: I do not know that there is such a statement in the Report; but in the voluminous pages of the evidence I believe it will be found to be so stated. I shall be glad if anyone will get up and deny that the P. J. Sheridan referred to in page 56 of the Report is not the person constantly referred to in Debates in this House in connection with the Kilmainham Treaty. Now with regard to the funds of the League, I see the Commissioners say—

“Of the item of £148,000 mentioned on the expenditure side, about £40,000 has been accounted for in the evidence before us; of the remaining £108,000, over £70,000 went to the Ladies Land League. No account has been given in evidence of the expenditure of the money handed over to the Ladies Land League, or of the residue of the £108,000. Thus we have over £100,000 of Land League funds received, but no details of the manner in which it was expended.”

During the progress of the inquiry, Mr. Justin McCarthy stated that he had obtained a list of the books relating to this League which he was willing to produce, the Commissioners adding—

“During the progress of the case, the production of these cash-books and ledgers for the years 1881 to 1883 proved to be of importance. When called for Mr. Justin McCarthy was unable to explain the reason for their non-production. Mr. G. Lewis, the solicitor for the respondents, stated that a mistake had been made in the affidavit. Mr. Brady was in Court, but was not called; and how and in what way the suggested mistake arose, if any did arise, has never been explained, nor have the books for 1881-83 been produced.”

The finding of the Commissioners generally with regard to the non-production of the Land League books is given on page 97 of the Report, and is as follows:—

“In the course of the inquiry into the accounts of the League it appeared that after February, 1881, Egan kept an account in Paris at the bank of Messrs. Monro and Co. We appointed a Commission to examine the books in Paris; but Messrs. Monro declined to allow them to be seen, and as they were not subject to our jurisdiction the Commission was without result. We therefore requested Mr. Parnell to give authority to Messrs. Monro to produce the accounts relating to the Land League. This he refused to do. We have therefore been deprived of evidence upon the question how the monies of the Land League were expended in the years 1881 and 1882. On this subject we may say generally that we have not received from Mr. Parnell and the officers of the Land League the assistance we were entitled to expect in the investigation of the Land League accounts in order that it might be seen how its funds were expended.”

It is in regard to these findings of the Commission, anent the non-production of the Land League books, that I say we must attach particular importance to particular words in regard to the fifth charge, where the Commissioners find it was not “proved” that these respondents found money for the commission of crime. Therefore, it is practically found that these persons who had in their possession these books deliberately refused and declined to produce the books. Now I come to the ninth and tenth charges—the last I shall have to trouble the House with—but they are not unimportant, although they were lightly passed over by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. The ninth charge is as to the respondents having invited and obtained the assistance of the Physical Force Party in America; and the Commissioners have come to a conclusion not altogether favourable to the hon. Member for Cork as to that portion of the evidence, which sets out the remarkable interview between the hon. Member and Le Caron and the hon. Member for Roscommon. In the summer of 1881 Le Caron visited the House of Commons, and this is the account of the interview given in the Report—

“Le Caron asserts that Mr. O’Kelly on that occasion suggested to him that on his return he should use his influence with his friends on the other side to bring the Organisation into line on that side of the water. ‘That they were all working for one common object, and therefore there should and need be no misunderstanding.’

“Le Caron states that after Mr. O’Kelly left Mr. Parnell, who was present, continued the same line of conversation that Mr. O’Kelly had introduced, and said, ‘You furnish the sinews of war; you have them in your power; if they do not do as you tell them, stop the supplies: the whole matter rests in your hands.’ That he (Mr. Parnell) wished him as soon as he returned to New York to see John Devoy, to say to him from Mr. Parnell that he believed John Devoy could do more than any other one man in the Organisation to bring about an understanding such as was desired, and he wished to secure his presence as soon as possible on this side of the water, and would meet him in Paris on his arriving there, and that so far as his (Devoy's) expenses were concerned he (Mr. Parnell) would guarantee that he would defray them.

"Mr. Parnell states that he never sent any message either to the Clan-na-Gael or to any of the persons mentioned by Le Caron, and that he neither directly nor indirectly communicated with any of these persons for the purpose that is suggested by Le Caron.

"We think," say the Commissioners, "that these passages tend strongly to confirm Le Caron's testimony; and we come to the conclusion that Le Caron has given a correct account of the message he was requested by Mr. Parnell to convey to Devoy."

Is the House prepared to accept this finding of the Commission? We ask that the whole Report of the Commissioners should be adopted by the House, in order that it may be a matter of reference hereafter. Then, as to whether the hon. Member for Cork had no intimate or close connection with what is called the Irish-American Party, I will read the telegram which was sent by Mr. Parnell to Patrick Ford, and which was published in the Irish World on October 1, 1881—

"I heartily thank the Land Leaguers throughout the United States for their glorious work.

"I thank you for the invitation to visit America; but the movement will probably claim my constant attention and presence in Ireland this winter, rendering a visit to the States improbable.

"Mr. T. P. O'Connor will start for America early in October, and will represent my views and those of the Irish Organisation.—CHARLES STEWART PARNELL."

I find that modest patriot the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) did go to America, and arrived there in October, 1881, and during his visit he appears to have been on terms of the greatest intimacy with those whom I do not for a moment hesitate to describe as some of the greatest scoundrels in the United States—Patrick Ford, Finnerty, and Alexander Sullivan. If any proof were wanted as to the real ends and objects of these scoundrels we find it on pages 116 and 117 of the Report. One of the precious circulars sent by the Clan-na-Gael to its camps, dated as late as 18th December, 1885, shows how far they regarded this Constitutional movement as of any use.

Mr. Fulton

MR. SEXTON: Will the hon. Gentleman state what ground he has for the inference he is now drawing?

*MR. FULTON: I have it in every single one of the pages of the Report, which deal with the ninth charge of the Times, and which show that day by day, week by week, and month by month, during the visit of the hon. Member (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), he appears to have been in daily communication and intercourse with Patrick Ford, Finnerty, and Alexander Sullivan. That is the ground I have for the inference I have drawn. The hon. Gentleman may draw what inference he pleases. I am now dealing with pages 116 and 117 of the Report, which shows what importance the Americans attached to what is called the "Constitutional Movement." This circular of the Clan-na-Gael says:—

"The achievement of a National Parliament gives us a footing upon Irish soil; it gives us the agencies and instrumentalities of a Government de facto at the very commencement of the Irish struggle. It places the Government of the land in the hands of our friends and brothers"

—hon. Members opposite—

"It removes the Castle's rings and gives us what we may well express as the plant of an armed revolution. From this standpoint the restoration of Parliament is part of our programme."

I have always been of the opinion that establishment of a Parliament in Dublin was only a step in the direction indicated in this passage of the Report. The circular proceeds—

"When that is attained, if agitation will not go further, we will still go on with our forces unimpaired and strengthened. We therefore deem it advisable that you secure the election of as many delegates as is practicable or possible to the Convention of the Irish National League to be held in Chicago."

I would remind the House that the accusation has been made against hon. Members and followers of the Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) that they were maintained and supported by money coming from a tainted source. Let me refer them to page 118 of the Report, where the Commissioners say—

"We are of opinion that the evidence proves that the Irish American League of America has been, since the Philadelphia Convention, 25th April 1883, directed by the Clan-na-Gael, a body actively engaged in promoting the use of dynamite for the destruction of life and property in England. It has been further proved that while the Clan-na-Gael controlled and directed the Irish National League of America, the two organisations concurrently collected sums amounting to more than £60,000 for a fund called the Parliamentary Fund, out of which payments have been made to Irish Members of Parliament, amounting in the year 1886 to £7,556, and in 1887 to £10,500."

Well, now, I want to know what hon. Members opposite are going to do with this money. I have no doubt it is still in existence. I cannot for a moment believe that they have expended it, and if they have not expended it, now that they know by the finding in this Report that the Clan-na-Gael directed the movements of the Irish National League, are they prepared to repudiate that League in this House or in the country? Are they prepared to repudiate it, or will they say "We cannot return this money because we have spent it, but we will never receive another farthing from the same source." Will they do that, or will they continue to receive money from this tainted source? The source of the Irish-American League, controlled by the Clan-na-Gael, which, I think, everyone will agree was and is a murder society, is a tainted source. Will they go on receiving money, week by week and month by month, for the purpose of supporting this agitation? At page 119 of the Report comes this passage—

"It has been proved that they invited and obtained the assistance and co-operation of the physical force party in America, including the Clan-na-Gael, and in order to obtain that assistance abstained from repudiating or condemning the action of that party."

It has also been proved

"That the respondents invited the assistance and co-operation and accepted subscriptions from Patrick Ford, a known advocate of crime and the use of dynamite."

I think I have shown that this man Ford was in close connection with the hon. Member for Cork ever since 1879, when Mr. Davitt was released from prison. Unless it be said that hon. Members can be accused of want of intelligence, and I for one should not accuse them of that; it must have been manifest to them throughout the years 1881 and 1882, and afterwards, what was the character of the movement advocated by the Irish American Party. Yet they deliberately allied themselves to this Party and received money from it, and in no single instance did they condemn the action of those advocating outrages or abominable crimes. I think I have established, by these observations I have addressed to the House, these propositions. I think I have established from the Report that as to certain persons who were Members of this House that they were engaged in a treasonable conspiracy. I agree that I am at issue with at least one Member of this House as to whether that conspiracy continued after 1879. I say it continued in 1881, 1882, and probably longer, and that it continued after these persons had taken the oath of allegiance at the Table of the House of Commons. I agree that they have been acquitted of directly inciting to murder. No one supposed it possible that by the Commission hon. Members could be proved to have directly incited to murder in 1881. [Sir W. HARCOURT: Hear, hear.!] I should imagine that even under the emasculated rule of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) if they had incited to murder some attempt would have been made to bring them to justice. Although they knew that their policy did lead to crime and outrage they persisted in it, and disseminated this abominable newspaper the, Irishman, throughout Ireland. Further it is proved that at this time they were in, more or less, constant communication with the physical force party; and though it is not expressly found that they provided money in 1881 and 1882 for the purposes of outrage it is found that they did not produce the evidence in their possession, which would have been able in the most conclusive way to disprove the charge. [Cries of "No, no!"] Why did you not produce the books. Or at any rate if you did not produce them why did you not give some reason for not producing them?

MR. SEXTON: The Report does not say that we had the books.

*MR. FULTON: No; but a Member of this House made an affidavit setting out certain books which he said could be produced, and which the Commissioners find no satisfactory answer or explanation was given for not being produced. Each and every one of these circumstances establishes against hon. Members opposite a very strong case—a case which is very well worthy the consideration of the House and of the country. All the findings of this Report ought to be entered upon the Journals of this House, for these reasons. Firstly, they closely and intimately affect the honour of hon. Members opposite; and secondly for the much more important reason that they are closely connected and associated with the great movement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) for the establishment of a separate Parliament in Ireland. I know not what possible shape that measure may take if it ever comes into existence again, but this much must always remain—that the Executive must be controlled by the hon. Member for Cork and his associates, who have been the mainstay of this movement, and therefore it is important to see how and in what way this Constitutional agitation has been carried on. It is for that reason I am of opinion this Motion has been rightly brought before the House, and that we ought to enter upon the Journals of the House, not merely the findings of the Commission, but each and every word of the Commission Report, which throws a flood of light upon the real character of this movement, and a flood of light upon the motives which have actuated hon. Members opposite from the time they first commenced this agitation.

*(10.20.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.) : If I had consulted my own inclination I should not have taken part in this debate, but inasmuch as the Report is very voluminous, and the evidence is not accessible to hon. Members, and as the Attorney General is perfectly certain to take part in the debate, I will endeavour to address the House as temperately as I can. I do not think it necessary to say much about the speech of the hon. and learned gentleman who has just sat down. It consisted in so far as I could observe of the reading of a variety of extracts, selected indiscriminately from the Report, without much regard to the context, and certainly I thought the hon. and learned Gentleman would conclude by proposing the expulsion of the Irish Members. I cannot understand how the hon. and learned Gentleman can continue to sit so comfortably, or that he can observe us sitting easy, in close proximity with person, of so abandoned and profligate a character. The speeches delivered from the Government side of the House show the necessity for a right understanding of what the Report does and does not contain. Charges were made by the Times of writing the forged letters, of taking part in the Phoenix Park murders, of assassination carefully calculated and coolly completed, of the personal hiring of bravos for £20 or £30 to commit outrage, on the ground that my hon. Friends had not time to commit it themselves, of arson, and of the mutilation of men and cattle. Except upon the matter of the forged letters there was not the least evidence produced in support of any of these charges. Mr. T. Harrington was indeed charged with paying £7 for a midnight outrage; but the only witness called broke hopelessly to pieces in cross-examination, and finally made an affidavit in which he confessed that he had committed perjury. The Attorney General, I think somewhat hastily, went to Oxford recently. There he said he rejoiced that these personal charges had not been proved. I am not quite sure that is an appropriate attitude for the Attorney General; but I am inclined to think that an ounce of apology would have been worth more than a ton of thankfulness. It is much to be regretted that in the Report there is not one poor word of apology for all these frightful charges. I do not doubt that is because the Commissioners had been by the terms of the Act of Parliament, which was carefully framed—I do not know whether I may say contrived—prevented from inquiring into the conduct of the Times. The advisers of the Times knew from the first that all these charges could not succeed, and therefore they brought forward others involving the whole of the Land League. And if the latter charges were true of the Members of Parliament, they were also true of two-thirds of the Irish nation—Archbishops, Bishops, parish priests, and

I suppose Catholic curates, together with a vast number of respectable persons, who were all members of the Land League. The only point in these charges in which I feel concern is the personal complicity of hon. Members with crime. I never supposed that a great social revolution, extending over a period of 10 years, could be carried on without a good deal of crime, trouble, and agitation, or that hon. Members were always going to be wise in action or temperate in language, or that they never would be betrayed by agents or misunderstood by followers. But I am concerned to know whether there has been proved against hon. Members any moral obliquity or complicity with crime. Therefore I will deal with those charges which may be said to have been found adversely to the Irish Members. The first is the finding that many of the respondents established and joined in the Land League, intending by its means to bring about the absolute independence of Ireland. For my own part, though I should resist separation to the last, I do not think that there is any moral stain upon a man involved by him wishing to see his country independent of another country, unless he desires to effect it by criminal means. But, as it is, the finding relates to a period 11 years ago, and amounts to this : that 11 years ago seven out of the 85 Irish Members are believed by the Judges to have intended separation at the time they joined the Land League. The next finding is that the respondents defended persons charged with agrarian crime, and supported their families. Some of the Irish Party confess to having done that, and their reasons were, that there were indiscriminate arrests in Ireland, and that there was no confidence in the administration of justice, and that jury-packing in Ireland was habitual, inveterate, and deeply resented by the people. Was there, in such circumstances, any moral wrong in procuring counsel and solicitor to defend prisoners, provided that nothing dishonourable was done? It was found that nothing dishonourable was done. There does not appear to be a single case of spiriting away a witness, or of procuring perjury ; and yet we find so high an authority as Lord Selborne considers it a grave matter that gentlemen should provide solicitor and counsel to defend prisoners in a country where justice is believed to be habitually prostituted, and in a country where the packing of juries, which I consider the poisoning of the fountain of justice, is habitual and constant. That is all I have to say in regard to the charge of defending prisoners. The third finding is that the respondents made payments to compensate persons who had been injured in the commission of crime. I regard this as a very serious matter. But what is the evidence, for the Judges very particularly drew attention to it? In my view it means that the Land League did on one occasion give money, said to be for medical relief, to three men injured in the commission of crime. According to the doctrine of constructive responsibility, all members of the Land League were, therefore, responsible for this act. But there is not a fragment of evidence to show that any one of the respondents personally did this thing, or knew of its being done. Hon. Gentlemen will find the evidence set out, and it consists of this : There was a letter written in 1881 by a person named Timothy Horan, secretary of the Castleisland branch of the Land League, referring to the fact that three men had been injured, and asking for a grant for them. The letter was addressed to the Central Executive of the Land League, and was initialed by Mr. John Ferguson, of Glasgow, upon whose order, dated October 12, 1881, a sum of £6 was paid for compensation. It was not proved, however, that any one of the respondents was present at the executive meeting, or had any knowledge of the incident. It was true that Mr. Ferguson was reported to have said that on two or three occasions similar grants were made, but he challenged that statement; and if hon. Members would look at the evidence they would find that that was not a true construction of what was said. In addition to that, there is the absence of means to which the Commissioners refer. But it is found by the Judges that 65 of the respondents did pay money to compensate persons injured in the commission of crime. They must have arrived at this conclusion with difficulty, as only one such payment was made by the League, and there is not a fragment of evidence to show that the respondents, personally, knew anything about it. I do not wish the House to do any injustice to the Judges in regard to this matter, and I would, therefore, infer that what they meant was constructive responsibility. The Land League made only three payments of £2 each, which amounted to this one payment of £6; and inasmuch as those gentlemen are prominent members of the League, I suppose the Judges thought they must be held responsible. I will now say a few words about the League books. There seems to be a general impression principally pervading Cabinet Ministers and gentlemen of their way of thinking who prowl about the country making wild statements as to the conduct of this agitation, and it seems to be their impression that those books are all missing, and that there has been a general conflagration of the books and papers of the Land League. There never was a greater mistake. The conspiracy, as it is called—and I do not care whether it is a conspiracy or not—started with the foundation of the Land League in October, 1879. It was followed by the Ladies League and the National League, and has been in existence down to the present day. Ever since October, 1882, this organisation has been carried on by a system of books; as accurate, as complete, and as full as the books kept in the Bank of England. Moreover, these books were in all their completeness from October, 1882, down to the date of the Commission. They were submitted to the examination of a skilled chartered accountant, who, on being asked by me, stated that all the books were kept which he would expect to be kept, and were all in perfect order, and further that he got every book and document he thought fit to ask for. These books of the National League were not adverted to in the Judges' Report. They say nothing about the books which were produced, but a good deal about those which were not. It was some books of the Land League which were not produced. The cash books of the Land League, during 19 out of the 24 months of its existence, were produced; but other books and correspondence were not produced. And I will state why they were not. What was the evidence on that subject? The House must not suppose that the Land League was a regular and orderly body like the National League. On the contrary, I say it with a keen memory, not untinged with regret, the Liberals so hunted, cheated and bullied the Land League during a portion of its existence, that it can hardly be said to have had any sort of settled habitation. In the month of October, 1881, a raid was made on the offices of the Land League, and in the expectation of the raid a large number of books were sent over to England, only a few being left in Dublin. Those which were left in Dublin were sent to the Commissioners, but those sent over to England were dissipated, though I do not know where. Gentlemen who were examined before the Commissioners said they did know where. They may not have told the truth; but, at any rate, the Commissioners did not make that finding. It may be that those books were dissipated in a sort of whirlwind, consequent on the raid from Dublin Castle. At any rate, a great number of the books were produced, although it so happens that the ledgers and cash books of from 1881 to 1883 could not be examined. As to the books of the British National League, it was stated by Mr. Justin M'Carthy, who, I am sure, the House will not think likely to have indulged in gratuitous misrepresentations, that he had those books during two years. When he was called, however, he said he knew nothing about them; and although he had made affidavit, as a good many persons do, without looking very particularly at the schedules, he found when in the witness-box that what he had so deposed was a mistake. And Mr. George Lewis said there had been a mistake in his office which had led to this error. The only other books which were left in Paris in the hands of Messrs. Monro and Company, Mr. Parnell point-blank refused to allow to be inspected, and there were intelligible grounds for this refusal. He stated that those books contained an account of the investments and resources of the League, and that he was not prepared to disclose, either to friends or foes, the financial resources of the Organisation of which he was President. This, again, is not referred to by the Commissioners, and I do not think the House will attach much importance to that part of the subject. I pass now to another finding of the Commissioners and that is, that those respondents advanced newspapers tending to incite to crime. I hope I may be allowed to put this matter somewhat in detail, as the finding is rather an important one. To my mind, if it be shown that individuals circulating newspapers containing matter intending to incite to crime, that was a very cowardly and villainous proceeding, and those persons should have less sympathy than the men who were thereby led to the commission of crime. It is for this reason that I wish to draw particular attention to this subject. The Judges referred to three newspapers. First of those is the Irish World, published in New York, the tone of which was very hostile to Great Britain. The Judges set forth articles appearing in the years 1880, 1881, and 1882. They consist of letters, reports of meetings, and one leading article. Of these, three or four recommend the provision of arms for the purpose of fighting against Great Britain. Seven or eight speak in tones of hatred of this country, and one expresses an opinion that an appeal to dynamite is justifiable. The question here is, what is the responsibility of those gentlemen who were connected with the Land League? As the Irish World is published in New York it can hardly be pretended that any of those gentlemen can have exercised the slightest control over it. It is stated that it was distributed by the Land League, and that is perfectly true; but why, and how was it distributed? It was in this way—it had a fund of its own called “The Spread of Light Fund,” a fund which was for free distribution; and it so happened that consignments were sent from America to the Land League in Dublin, because the secretary of the Land League happened also to be the correspondent of the Irish World. There were 11 articles in the years 1881-82-83 which may be said to be of a reprehensible character, and which are set forth in the Report; it amounts to this—that, assuming the paper was published once a week, there are, roughly speaking, in about 150 sheets only 11 articles alleged to be objectionable, seven or eight of them being somewhat objectionable, and those even are not placed in a prominent position. If you wish to deal fairly with our brother Members in this matter, the point you would look to in connection with the Irish World is this, Was it shown during the inquiry that in those three years the respondents knew of the publication of those articles? It is not shown or proved that any single one of the respondents had brought home to him a knowledge of these objectionable paragraphs. In the year 1882 the Irish World ceased to support the Land League; it adopted a dynamite policy during 1883, 1884 and 1885; and in those years it was not even pretended in evidence that any one of the respondents had any knowledge of the contents of the paper, or that any copies of it were distributed in Ireland. The next paper I have to refer to is United Ireland, which was owned by Mr. Parnell and three or four of the other respondents as trustees of the Land League, and was edited by Mr. W. O'Brien. A good many extracts are set out by the Judges from this paper as objectionable, for a period extending over 10 years—indeed, practically speaking, all the extracts which could in any way be regarded as objectionable were set out. The first complaint made in regard to them was that they appeared under a column headed “The Campaign,” or “Incidents of the Campaign,” or a similar phrase—“the Land War,” and so forth; and the Judges thought that outrages by being so recorded were treated as incidental to the agitation. I think it rather far-fetched to come to that conclusion, for there was nothing except in one sentence in the whole column that was at all reprehensible; and the facts published simply record occurrences that have taken place. The objection was in the heading, and the House will find in the Report that Mr. Parnell took the same view. He objected to it, and although it began in 1881, it was stopped in February, 1882, having appeared for about six months only. After all it is a matter eight years old, and it should be remembered also that at the time Mr. Parnell and Mr. O'Brien were in prison, and it was only by sending a message in some subterranean manner that they were able to indicate their desire that this form of paragraph should cease. There are only nine other articles set out for the whole 10 years in the Report. Three of them are disrespectful to the Queen, or hostile to England, having nothing to do with dynamite or outrages ; one is an attack on Lord Spencer, and I must admit a most violent and unjust attack, but not nearly so violent or unjust as the attacks which habitually appeared in the Times and the Scotsman on the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian. Two others consists of letters from correspondents about the Phoenix Park murders, and those letters speak in sympathy with the criminals, but in detestation of crime itself. But if those letters are to be brought forward as evidence of bad spirit on the part of the editor and on the part of the other respondents it must be on the suggestion that they had sympathy with the Phoenix Park murderers. The Judges, however, have expressly found that they sincerely condemned and denounced the Phoenix Park murders, and therefore they were entirely acquitted of all insincerity in their copious denunciations of that crime. Another of those articles is one that has been referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman, in which it is stated that O'Donnell, for the murder of Carey, would, in most civilised countries, have been esteemed a public benefactor. I, of course, think that a most improper observation, and I will leave it without further comment. The last of the number is a leading article in September, 1885, violently hostile to England, but in terms condemning outrages and dynamite as being mad and sanguinary conspiracies. There, then, is an end of all the objectionable articles which are set forth in the report from United Ireland for over a period of 10 years, and it has been practically found that there are nine objectionable articles, only one of which can be said to be really objectionable during the whole of the nine or 10 years. It is sufficient for me to add that during the same time the paper abounded with denunciations of crime and exhortations to the people to live peaceably. The other paper was the Irishman, which lasted four years—from August, 1881, to August, 1885—and I confess that, in my opinion, the articles in it were most reprehensible. But the question is—how far were the respondents responsible for them? The paper was bought by Mr. Parnell and published—not edited, as the Judges stated—nominally by Mr. O'Brien. But the point before the Commission, and the point for the House to bear in mind, was that no one ever said that these articles were defensible ; but it was said by Mr. Parnell that he never knew of these articles, that he never saw the paper, which, in fact, was a very obscure rag, and had, indeed, escaped the notice of the Government of Lord Spencer. Mr. O'Brien also said that the paper was edited by a man named O'Connor, not a member of this House ; and that he (Mr. O'Brien) was not aware either of the contents or the character of that paper, having enough to do to attend to his other duties. Now, Sir, there are 14 articles from this paper set out by the Judges, and I put it again to the House whether there is anything in the Report intimating that any one of the respondents was cognisant of the publication of the articles. It was not even suggested in respect to 63 of the 65 Members of this House, and the two others swore that they had no knowledge of the issue of those articles. This, then, is the general result of the charges in respect to the three newspapers—that 63 out of the 65 members were not responsible in any way for the Irishman ; and certainly as regards the 65 they were not in any way responsible for the Irish World ; but as regards all of them I think that, to a great extent, they were morally responsible in regard to United Ireland, and as regards two of them, one was owner and the other editor of United Ireland, and one was owner and the other publisher of the Irishman. I believe that if hon. Members will consider the articles referred to in United Ireland they will come to the conclusion that, though strongly worded, they did not incite to crime. As regards the other two papers, there was no such responsibility. Therefore, it is a case of constructive responsibility as regards 63 at least out of 65 of these respondents. The next finding of the Judges to which I wish to allude is that the respondents invited the assistance and co-operation of, and accepted subscriptions of money from, Patrick Ford, a known advocate of crime and the use of dynamite. This relates to the receipt of money collected through the means of the Irish World. In 1881, and down to October, 1882, Patrick Ford and the Irish World supported the Land League, and the Irish-

Americans who subscribed chose Ford as the medium through whom they sent their money to Ireland. No part of this money, however, went to any of the respondents, unless it was about £2,000 spent in 1880 in election expenses: all of it was spent in the relief of distress and for the general purposes of the Land League. During this time, as I have already pointed out, the Irish World had occasional articles, in perhaps 15 or 20 numbers, of a reprehensible character, although it was not found that any of the respondents saw those articles, and when asked if they had seen them, they denied it. I am aware that opinions may differ as to the propriety of receiving money for charitable or even political purposes through the hands of persons who are themselves of notoriously bad character, but if the persons who subscribed the money are respectable, and the objects such as you honestly approve, I think moralists would fairly hold that, at all events, in a great emergency, it would be justifiable to accept money under those circumstances. Now, the actual subscribers in this case were millions of the Irish-Americans persons of excellent character, though it is really almost presumptuous to speak of the moral characters of millions, which will include, of course, the righteous and the unrighteous. The objects for which the money has been received are, in their view, objects of transcendent importance, the emergency being one of the greatest in their history, and it was received for innocent purposes from innocent people. In October, 1882, and down to the end of 1885, the Irish World had preached dynamite consistently. It had received in that time no support from the Irish Party, and no money was during that time received by them from it. But at the end of 1885, and in 1886 and 1887, and since then, the Irish World absolutely ceased to advocate dynamite, and adopted a policy more in sympathy with that of the Irish Party, and no objectionable articles have appeared in it since then; while, since then, the League has received money from America. It was found by the Judges that the Irish Party had received money from it at that time, but, in point of fact, they had not, the real reason of the mistake being a very curious one. There had been an entry in the Irish World of money sent to the Land League in England, but, in point of fact, that had been an entry copied from other papers, and money had not been received and transmitted as in the previous times of 1881 and 1882. The next point is that the respondents—

“invited and obtained the assistance and co-operation of the physical force party in America, including the Clan-na-Gael, and in order to obtain that assistance abstained from repudiating or condemning the action of that party.”

Now, I must point out that the physical force party in America and the Clan-na-Gael are here treated as being different, one from the other. I mention this in order to prevent confusion, because in some parts of the Report the two are mentioned as being convertible terms. The physical force party, which means the Fenian Party, have existed since 1867 in America. Undoubtedly it has always advocated insurrection, and has been in favour of a fair fight whenever an opportunity might arise, but until the middle of 1881 it has not been suggested that they have made themselves a party to dynamite or outrage. With the physical force party before 1881 before it had taken any part in dynamite—the respondents had undoubtedly had dealings. What their policy has been is plain from the following sentence in Mr. Parnell's evidence:

“With regard to the question whether I ought to have forbidden these men to enter our movement, I have always thought that in the history of Ireland there has been much justification for the views that they have taken up from time to time, and particularly their view as regards the utility of Parliamentary action, and I should have considered it an unreasonable course on my part to pursue at the threshold of our movement, when we were yet untried, when our movement was yet untried, to ask these men to abandon their views, and to accept unhesitatingly mine, and to shut the door of the Constitutional movement in their face at the very commencement of this movement, unless they agree to forego definitely, and to make public declarations definitely against any contingent recourse to physical force hereafter.”

It is undoubtedly the case—and the Irish Party have never denied it—that they are anxious, if they can, to disarm the hostility of the physical force party in America as well as in England, and to bring them into a common alliance, working for what they believe to be a Constitutional policy, without requiring any open or formal renunciation of their former views. But it is suggested by my hon. and learned Friend that it was found that the respondents had associated with the Clan-na-Gael, and that the Clan-na-Gael were undoubtedly a dynamite faction. That has been found, but in point of fact, for my own part, I do not say that it was so. But it is suggested that the Irish Party had, knowing this, associated with them and sought their co-operation. That would be a very different matter, but it is not the case. The Report said—

“ It has not been proved that the respondents or any of them, knew that the Clan-na-Gael controlled the League or was collecting money for the Parliamentary Fund.”

Nor did the Report find that in associating with them the respondents knew the operations of the Clan-na-Gael; indeed, it found that the operations of the Clan-na-Gael were secret. The ninth finding does not apply to the dynamite party at all, and I entreat hon. Members before they go about the country condemning these gentlemen for associating with dynamiters to realise that it has been found that they did not associate with any notorious criminals. The evidence did not refer to any association with criminals or dynamiters. The last finding to which I have to refer is that which finds that the respondents incited to intimidation. That finding crops up in various parts of the Report. Now, the facts are these: The respondents have admitted boycotting before the Commissioners, as they always have done. Now, of course, boycotting, as every one must feel, is a very severe weapon, but in rural

England there is plenty of boycotting. What I cannot endure is the cant and hypocrisy on this subject of well-fed and well-dressed men who practise boycotting through the Primrose League.

MR. R. G. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The hon. Member has stated that the Primrose League has been guilty of boycotting, but he has not mentioned any instance.

*MR. R. T. REID: I beg to say that more than once complaints have been made to me by people who said that they had been practically boycotted by the Primrose League. Of course, I am not going to give names. I did not mean to get into a conflict with hon. Gentlemen opposite, though I stand by every syllable I have said. Now I hope I may be allowed to proceed with my observations. I do not defend boycotting. I mean that I think boycotting is one of those things that ought not to be resorted to except under the gravest necessity. Whether such a necessity existed in Ireland in 1879, 1880, and 1881 was a thing the Judges were not, in their opinion, commissioned to inquire into. The result is, that we have in the Report a picture of boycotting, but no picture of the miseries which led to that boycotting. A few references to the evidence will explain the state of things out of which boycotting has arisen. On page 4869 will be found the evidence of the parish priest of Bantry, of whom, I am sure no one who took part in the proceedings before the Commission will speak in terms other than respect for an honourable and upright man. He tells how a parishioner named Macartney, of Ballycorey, was evicted with his family. Five of his children were ill at the time of measles or scarlet fever. They were put out in that condition, and one of the children died soon afterwards. Then, to take another case out of four within this priest's parish, in 1884 Charles Davis was evicted and lived for some weeks beside a ditch near by; and under these circumstances his wife gave birth to a child, she having crawled into an outhouse unprotected by a door, and there she was delivered. Near by a brother, Eugene Davis, had a holding from which he was evicted, with the result that he became insane, and is now a raging lunatic.

"However," says the witness, "I must observe he was insane some time before, but at the time of the eviction he appeared quite sane."

In another case Daniel Sullivan was evicted about 1882 or 1883. He lived on the border of the parish adjoining Bantry. He was evicted at a time when his child was on the verge of death, and the child died on the following day. His wife from that day became insane, though up to then quite sane, and is now in a lunatic asylum. The references to these four cases in the Parish of Bantry will be found on pages 4868-9. No attempt was made to contradict these facts sworn to by the reverend gentleman, and I ask any hon. Member, if he were one of the persons treated in this way, would he condemn boycotting with as much energy? It will be found on reading the Report that the Judges treat boycotting and intimidation as convertible terms, and, reading the Report in that light, it will appear that what the respondents are found guilty of is boycotting, and boycotting alone. None of the respondents are found to have taken part in any other act of intimidation. There is a case reported of Mr. Condon on page 48, but the Judges do not say whether he did or did not commit the act. There is no case reported of any branch of the Land League taking part in any act of outrage, except the case of the Killoo branch at Longford (p. 80), and it is there stated that the order to commit the assault, which ended fatally, was given at a meeting not of the Land League, but at a meeting of members of the Land League. The Judges do not report that the respondents, as members of the Land League, had any participation in the murder; they find that the respondents did not directly incite persons to the commission of crime other than intimidation. There is no case reported of any of the respondents committing any crime other than incitement to intimidation, which, as I have said, is treated as equivalent to boycotting. They also find that some of the respondents did express bond fide disapproval of crime and outrage. Only some of them made speeches at all, but none of them are reported to have been insincere. Again, it is said, they did not denounce intimidation, which is equivalent to boycotting. Turn it which way you will, if boycotting and intimidation are convertible terms, you find that the Report holds them responsible for boycotting alone. If boycotting means intimidation, they are responsible for intimidation, otherwise they are not. I will not examine for a moment the statistical and other arguments by which the Judges come to the conclusion that boycotting led to crime. It is well-known that the respondents have maintained (I do not enter into that controversy for the moment) that boycotting, far from contributing to crime, tended to diminish it. I do not enter into that, but I wish to point out that the finding of the Judges is founded on a variety of statistical and other arguments which show that the question in hand was never contemplated to be submitted to the Commission at all. For my own part, I must say if I were put to choose between the opinion of the people of Ireland and that of the Judges as to whether boycotting was warrantable or tended to increase crime, I should prefer the opinion of the people who live around these scenes, and amongst whom Irish Members come and go. It was proved by witnesses on both sides that most of the respectable people in three-fourths of Ireland belonged to the League, and that parish priests, curates, and Catholic Bishops supported it or sympathised with it. To say that the operations of the League increased crime is to condemn three-fifths of the manhood of Ireland. It is a direct condemnation if the League consists—as by all testimony it does—of the most respectable persons in Ireland, and is supported by the great Roman Catholic Church in Ireland. I must say myself when I find that all these classes support this Association, I find it very difficult to believe that the League is the author of the crimes and intimidation the Judges seem to think. I might further add, the composition of the Irish Parliamentary majority is inconsistent with the view that the League is exercising intimidation. I have gone through every one of the separate findings of the Judges, and the result comes to this: As to the charge that seven Members of Parliament have favoured Separation, that was several years ago. As to defending prisoners, I say that was nothing but honourable employment of solicitor and counsel. In regard to the finding that payment has been made for compensation for those who have suffered for commission of crime, there is only one case in which it is proved that compensation was paid by the League to those who had suffered injury, and in no case is it shown that Members of Parliament had any personal knowledge of what was done. In regard to newspapers, there was undoubtedly a want of supervision in some cases, but it is not proved there was any knowledge of the objectionable articles on the part of the respondents. I have said all I have to say, and I need not advert to these things again, as to the obtaining money from Patrick Ford, of the Irish World, from the physical force party, and in regard to boycotting, which is equivalent to intimidation. I do not say I have gone through every line, but I have gone through the substance of the Report, and I have few words to add. The House is entitled to expect from the Government a somewhat different attitude in this matter. The charges were made by the Times; but, in fact, the Times had the Government at its back from beginning to end. Whether any political persons were mixed up with the finding of money for the forged letters I cannot say. If there were any, I do not say they had any idea they were conniving at forgery. One thing, however, is quite certain, and that is that the Bill was so framed that the accusation against the Times could not be entered upon. Further, the Government offices were ransacked for the benefit of the Times, and all accessible information was placed at its disposal. I would take me some time to establish that, and I am not going to attempt it now. The Home Secretary must know something about it. Take an incidental illustration. It could not be without the sanction of the Home Secretary that records of searches for arms and of searches for letters by the police were placed at the disposal of any litigant. Does the right hon. Gentleman not know that the records of many searches for arms—15 or 20, probably more—searches for arms and letters by the police in England in our great cities were put at the disposal of the Times? It will be an interesting subject when it comes up for discussion. I do not wish to enlarge upon it now, for time forbids. I say we are entitled to have from the Government something different from their present attitude. Every private Member has the right to say to the Government: "Do you believe that Members of this House are guilty of moral complicity with crime, or do you not?" If you do believe it, it is your duty to move that they be expelled from the House. If you do not believe it, then, inasmuch as you were the authors of this ill-starred Commission, it is your duty to say so in plain and unmistakable terms. You are not entitled to do as certain Cabinet Ministers have done—to go about the country reading passages from the Report without explanation and context, and so to defame colleagues outside the House, when you have not the courage to make good your words in the face of your political adversaries. This is what you are doing—you are taking a pride, a foolish pride, in the humiliation of Members, in degrading the character of the House, and in lowering the standard of political life.

(11.30.) MR. A. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I think every man in the House must have recognised that the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just spoken, though he has ceased his labours before the Commission, yet has not altogether divested himself of wig and gown. Though he has given us an able argument upon the evidence given before the Judges, an argument that might have been, and probably was, delivered to the Judges, yet we in this House of Commons, however distinguished and honourable the counsel may be, prefer to take the Judgment of the Judges rather than the judgment of the counsel engaged. Some of the arguments, I am bound to say it does not surprise me to find, had little weight with the Judges. To go shortly into matters touched upon, I will take, for instance, the incident of the books. The hon. and learned Gentleman says these were not forthcoming. But what say the Judges? They say they were entitled to expect greater assistance from the hon. Member for Cork and his friends than was given them in this matter. How do the words of the counsel in the case weigh in the balance against this? My hon. and learned Friend said he did not care whether or not the hon. Member for Cork and his friends were actuated by the desire to obtain the absolute separation of Ireland from this country. The hon. and learned Member may not care, but the people of this country do care; and whether or not this is a crime, it is most material in the great controversy in which we have been engaged for the last four or five years, and in which we shall probably be engaged for years to come. It is of importance that the British public should understand the motives which actuated those who founded and supported the Land League and the National League of Ireland. Of the moral character of the hon. Member for Cork and his Colleagues we have, I think, heard too much to-day; for the Report of this Commission contains findings against them, as a body of politicians, such as have no parallel or precedent in the history of this country. A more serious indictment has never before been made against Members of Parliament, though in the course of the debate we may perhaps have some precedents a little more recent and a little more apt than those cited by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, who has gone back to the time immediately preceding the Civil War and the fall of the Monarchy before he could find an instance which was at all parallel to anything which has recently occurred. In those trying times 200 years ago, unfortunately, many things were done which no hon. Member could do now. The name of Algernon Sidney is respected by the Whig Party, and history makes it clear that he was free from any connection with crime. But what happened in those days cannot be made an excuse for hon. Members in respect of those matters as to which they have been held guilty. We have to deal with our own time and with the circumstances of this case. I am bound to say that when I heard the address of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian I felt something like a pang of regret that he should use the rhetorical force of his magnificent eloquence for the purpose of whitewashing these persons and minimising those offences which a few years ago, when sitting on the opposite side of the House, he was the loudest and most strenuous in condemning. Let us see what has been established by the findings of the Judges. It has been established by the evidence of the most strenuous of its supporters that the Land League was intended, by means of agitation against the landlords, to bring about the absolute separation of Ireland from the United Kingdom. That was what Mr. Davitt said. We were told a short time since that all this happened 11 years ago, and in times of distress in Ireland, and that the men who were then trying for separation are doing so no longer. But has that programme been departed from? Gentlemen go about the country telling the electors it is an absurdity; yet Mr. Davitt, the founder of the Land League, himself told the Commission that he was still of the same opinion as he was then. I maintain that such an object for politicians to set before themselves as the end to which they are working has never been known before—it is new to our political life that we should have a political party working for an end absolutely unconstitutional. But when I come to look at the means by which that end is sought to be attained, I regret still more the speech of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian. The object of the supporters of the League is, I maintain, hostility to the British Crown and people; and, according to the finding of the Judges, they adopted the most active and energetic means to carry it out. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian has complimented the Judges upon their learning and their ability; but he has omitted altogether to compliment them upon that which is their most conspicuous merit—their impartiality. But I will now go back to the instruments which this Party used to bring about their ends; the first was boycotting, the second and most important instrument was the use they made of the Press, and the third was the assistance they received from Irishmen in America. Too much attention cannot possibly be devoted by the people of this country to those three instruments which the hon. Member for Cork and his friends used to attain their ends. My hon. and learned Friend was not ashamed to stand up in the House of Commons and compare the boycotting, which was practised by the hon. Member for Cork and his Colleagues, with the action of the Primrose League. How can the hon. and learned Member justify the comparison between the action of the

Primrose League and a boycotting which was “Illegal both in its objects and the means which were adopted,” and the object of which

“Elaborate and all-pervading tyranny was not only to injure the individual landlords against whom it was directed by rendering their land useless to them unless they obeyed the edicts of the Land League, but to injure the landlords as a class and drive them out of the country?”

In the opinion of the Judges, the leaders of the League, who include almost all the well-known men in the Party, were guilty of a criminal conspiracy, the object of which was, by a system of coercion and intimidation, to promote an agrarian agitation against the payment of agricultural rents, for the purpose of impoverishing and expelling from the country the Irish landlords, who were styled the English garrison. Yet it is this abominable system which hon. Members are not ashamed to compare to the action of the Primrose League. The second instrument made use of by the hon. Member for Cork and his Colleagues was the Press. We are told that the Land League was only constructively responsible for the circulation of the Irish World in Ireland. In June, 1880, the Irish World published an article suggesting that London should be fired in 50 different places simultaneously; and afterwards attempts were made to fire London, the schemes of the scoundrels being only defeated by the vigilance of the police. Over and over again the Irish World advocated the use of dynamite. Why, then, was it sent into Ireland? Because Mr. Davitt, the chief of the Land League, wished that it should circulate there. In 1881 Mr. Davitt telegraphed his thanks to Ford for the services of the Irish World. We are told that these things are repented of, but what says Mr. Davitt? He was acquainted with the writings of Ford, he knew that Ford had advocated the firing of London in 50 different places, and yet, in the witness box, he declared that he had seldom made acquaintance with a better Christian and philanthropist. Surely here the connection is close enough. As to the Irishman, the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries says that it was an unimportant publication, and that Lord Spencer hardly knew of its existence; yet we know it was established to carry out the designs of the Land League. Unimportant or not, the hon. Member for Cork knew of it. He bought it from Pigott just before the appearance in its columns of the rascally articles which all must condemn. The Irishman, owned by the hon. Member for Cork City, and edited by the hon. Member for North-East Cork, was used for carrying on the work of the Land League. In this paper an article headed "The Strangling Commission" likened the preliminary inquiries into the circumstances of the murder of Lord F. Cavendish to inquiries under the Spanish Inquisition, and in the same journal paragraphs were published about the wonderful heroism of Joe Brady, one of the murderers. In 1885 the Irishman praised the hon. Member for Cork for not denouncing the use of dynamite. The methods which were disclosed in this and other publications are disgraceful. Bearing them in mind, it is very difficult to understand how hon. Members can come to this House and say that after all they were only politicians taking part in a political movement. These are not the instruments which Members of Parliament have hitherto used in this country, and they are not the instruments which the British electors think ought to be adopted. And now I come to the third means ruthlessly and recklessly adopted by hon. Members for Ireland in order to attain their objects, the use made of the League in Ireland, and its connection to the Clan-na-Gael. I was much struck by a speech recently, in which Lord Spencer alluded to his gratification at finding that the hon. Member for Cork was weaning deluded Irishmen from nefarious practices and immoral methods, and inducing them to adopt Constitutional means for effecting their objects. Let the noble Lord, and those who are of the same opinion, read the last 15 or 20 pages of the Commissioners' Report. There they will find described and laid bare a hideous conspiracy—a conspiracy as hostile as any could possibly be to the Queen and people of the United Kingdom. Those pages do not show that the hon. Member is weaning the Clan-na-Gael from their nefarious practices. What they show is that year after year the Clan-na-Gael kept control over the National League, moulded it to their own purposes, and used the hon. Member for their own ends. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian has said that the Report of the Judges does not extend to matters later than 1885. In one very important matter, however, that limit is overstepped. With reference to the receipt of money the inquiry extended to 1886 and 1887, long after the "Union of Hearts" had become established. In those years some £18,000 or £19,000 were transmitted to the Nationalist Members from America, and it is well that the British electorate should know that so recently as this Irish Members received thousands of pounds which had come largely out of the pockets of the Clan-na-Gael and other enemies of this country. The Judges found that in 1886-7 nearly £19,000 was transmitted by Irish-American organisations which were under the control of the Clan-na-Gael, in aid of the objects promoted by Members of this House, who profess their zeal for Constitutional methods. Whatever the knowledge of hon. Members may be, that money came from the enemies of the Queen and the British people. I do not care so much about the quibble as to what is personal in these charges. I will not argue on the distinction between what is personal crime and what is not. There is something more important than the personal characters of these Members. It is infinitely more important that the British electorate should know the means by which this controversy for Home Rule is being carried on. It should be known that in 1886 and 1887, as in 1881 and 1882, the sinews of war have been found and the movement kept going by enemies of the British people. You talk about the terrible criminality of the Times newspaper, but whatever was the criminality of the Times, it has paid £5,000, the amount assessed by the hon. Member for the City of Cork as his own damages. No one contends that the Times was guilty of deliberate fraud, though it may have been guilty of reckless conduct. I should, indeed, be surprised to hear any hon. Member say that Mr. Walter of the Times knew the letters were forgeries. But whatever its recklessness or folly in trusting Pigott, it was only guilty of involuntary mistake, and its conduct was not comparable in point of criminality with that which has been brought home to those who are fellow-workers of the hon. Members below the Gangway.

Debate adjourned till to-morrow.

BARRACK (CONSOLIDATED FUND).

Resolution [27th February] reported,

"That it is expedient to provide for the building and enlarging barracks and camps in the United Kingdom, and in certain colonies, and for that purpose to authorise the charge upon and the issue out of the Consolidated Fund of a sum or sums not exceeding £4,100,000, to empower the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury to borrow moneys for the re-payment of part of the sum so issued; and to authorise the payment out of moneys to be provided by Parliament of the principal and interest of such borrowed moneys."

Resolution read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Committee in the said Resolution."

*(11.53.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I hope the Government will not ask us to proceed with this debate. The Resolution was agreed to after a short debate, and I do not think that either the House or the country understand the real nature of the principle to be applied to this question. It is proposed, I believe, to spend about four millions. A dangerous and un-Constitutional principle was applied to the Navy expenditure last year, and it is now proposed to repeat the experiment, and to declare that the House of Commons is incapable of dealing annually with the expenditure of the country. It is now proposed that in 1890 we shall control the expenditure of 1891-2-3-4.

Mr. A. Elliott

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

COLONIAL COURTS OF ADMIRALTY BILL.—(No. 29.)

SECOND READING.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Lord KNUTSFORD): My Lords, the main object of the Bill to which I have to ask you to give a Second Reading is to make a more satisfactory arrangement as regards the constitution of Vice Admiralty Courts in the colonies, and to confer upon the chief Courts of the colonies the Admiralty jurisdiction which is now possessed and exercised by the High Court of Justice in England. The existing state of things is shortly as follows: By the Act of the 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 45 a Vice Admiralty Court may be established in any colony, whether it be a Crown Colony or a colony possessing a representative and independent Legislature, but the Court is Imperial and not Colonial. The appeal from it, speaking generally, is direct to the Queen in Council. The Admiralty have the power of appointing the Judges and officers to that Court; but, as a rule, they very rarely exercise that power. In the absence of any appointment by the Admiralty, the Chief Justice or the highest Judicial officer in the colony is the Judge of the Court ex officio; and it rests with him also, in the absence of any appointment by the Admiralty, to appoint officers and registrars to the Court. The Chief Justice may also appoint one of the puisne Judges to act as Deputy Judge; but, of course, that Judge acts as Judge of an Imperial Court, although he is also a Judge of the Colonial Civil Court, and no appeal lies from any judgment or decision of his given in Admiralty matters to the full Court of the colony, but only direct to the Queen in Council. This state of things is not satisfactory.

We have thus in a colony two Courts side by side—the Civil Colonial Court and the Imperial Vice Admiralty Court, with separate Rules of Procedure, and separate Judges and officers, and although the same persons are acting as Judges and officers of the two Courts, yet it is clear from what I have brought to your Lordships' attention, that they are acting under separate jurisdictions and authorities. This matter is somewhat more complicated from the fact that the Colonial Civil Court and the Vice Admiralty Court in the colony have very often concurrent jurisdiction, as, for instance, in cases arising under the Customs Acts. In 1883 a proposal was sent out to the colonies for consolidating, and in some measure extending, the jurisdiction of the Vice Admiralty Courts in the colonies, but not altering the constitution of those Courts, or taking away their Imperial character. When the replies were received to that Circular Despatch, the question arose whether it would not be better to altogether abolish Vice Admiralty Courts in the colonies, and to transfer all their jurisdiction to the Chief Courts in the colonies. The replies showed, in fact, that the Vice Admiralty Court was more and more regarded as a Colonial Court—a Court of the colony—and that the Colonial Courts required more and more Admiralty jurisdiction to be vested in them. Her Majesty's then Government decided in favour of this scheme; and a Bill was drafted and sent out to the colonies by the noble Lord the Earl of Derby with a Despatch in March, 1885. That Bill was, in substance, the same as is now under the consideration of your Lordships. It was accepted by all the colonies but four—Victoria, New South Wales, British Honduras, and St. Helena. The first two of those colonies are, of course, colonies of great importance, and their fear seemed to be lest Imperial control was to be exercised over the Colonial Courts; a fear which, I think, arises from a misapprehension of the provisions of the Bill. However, I need not trouble your Lordships further with any objections that were raised, because those four colonies have been placed in Schedule I of this Bill; and the Act will not apply to them unless they subsequently desire to be admitted under.

it. Broadly speaking, then, the object of this Bill is to do away with the Imperial Vice Admiralty Courts in the colonies, and to transfer the Admiralty jurisdiction of the High Court of Justice in England to the Colonial Courts, and also to allow inferior Courts in the colonies, if the colonies so desire it, to exercise the partial and limited Admiralty jurisdiction which the County Courts in England exercise. It is provided, therefore, by the 3rd section of this Bill that the Colonial Legislatures may declare what Courts of unlimited jurisdiction shall act as Colonial Courts of Admiralty, and also what inferior Courts shall have that partial and limited jurisdiction to which I have referred. By Clause 4 the laws upon this point are to be reserved for Her Majesty's pleasure, or else there is to be a suspending clause which will prevent their coming into operation until Her Majesty's assent has been signified. By Section 5 an appeal is given to the local Court from decisions of the Admiralty Court, thus avoiding the necessity of a direct appeal to the Queen in Council; but in case there is no local appeal, or in case there is no further local appeal, the right to appeal to the Queen in Council is preserved. I think I need hardly trouble your Lordships with any further details upon the sections of this Bill. But perhaps I might bring one point under the notice of your Lordships: As the Admiralty jurisdiction is one of an Imperial character, and as it deals with acts committed on the high seas all over the world, and as, therefore, it may affect our relations with foreign nations, and thereby place some responsibility upon the Imperial Government, it is thought right that some control should be reserved over these Colonial Courts of Admiralty. Such control is clearly important for the purpose of securing uniformity of practice through the Empire, and of laying down the lines by which the Courts would be guided in the exercise of their jurisdiction when dealing with questions of International Law. That control is secured partly by a provision which requires that all Rules of Procedure, except Rules of mere detail of Procedure, shall, in the first instance, be submitted to the Queen in Council, and partly by providing that the Crown shall have the right, as heretofore, of creating a Vice Admiralty Court in any colony.

Lord Knutsford

It is manifest that with regard to some small colonies—as, for instance, in Heligoland, where the Governor is Chief Justice, as he is also in the Falkland Islands and St. Helena—it would be important to make provision, if the necessity should arise, for constituting a Vice Admiralty Court for the time, and to appoint thereto a man having a legal training. My Lords, the Bill is one of considerable importance; but I refrain from going now further into the details of the question because, if your Lordships will grant the Second Reading of the Bill, I propose to refer it to the Committee on Law.

Bill read 2^a (according to order), and committed to the Standing Committee for Bills relating to Law, &c.

IRELAND—THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

*EARL BEAUCHAMP: It is not my fault that this question was not put to Her Majesty's Government some days ago; but it has been postponed for the return of the noble Marquess the Prime Minister, whom we are all, I am sure, glad to see among us again with renewed health and vigour. The question is a very simple one. It is to ask Her Majesty's Government what course they propose to take in this House in reference to the Report of the Special Commissioners appointed under the Special Commission Act 1888. I am not going to refer in any way to the circumstances which called forth that Act, but your Lordships will remember that under it three eminent Judges were appointed to decide the matters referred to them. Those eminent Judges have applied themselves during the greater part of two years with the utmost public spirit, ability, and energy to the discharge of the duties which were entrusted to them, as mani-festated by their Report. That Report has been presented to the House of Commons, and it has been presented to your Lordships. I understand that in another place (as I learn from perusing the Parliamentary Notices) that a most wise and temperate Motion has been moved by the First Lord of the Treasury; and it appears to me that if it is right and proper that the House of Commons should take notice of that Report, it would be an abdication of your Lordships' functions if you did not also pronounce an opinion upon the subject. It seems to me that the Report, being as it is a Report to both Houses of Parliament, challenges an expression of opinion from both Houses. I might even say that I think the labour and pains which the three Judges have bestowed upon the matter deserve an expression of thanks from this House in the most formal manner, and I do not know any reason which can be alleged why your Lordships should not take action in the matter. If, indeed, the three Judges had been appointed under a Resolution of the House of Commons, it would then have been a matter entirely under the cognisance of the House of Commons, or if the matters referred to the Judges had concerned only the conduct of Members of the House of Commons, then, perhaps, a reason would have existed for your Lordships not interfering in the matter. But your Lordships must remember that the matters referred to the Judges were not merely limited to the conduct of certain Members of the House of Commons, but other persons, too, were implicated, and their conduct also was referred to the Judges for investigation. It appears to me, therefore, that your Lordships would be failing in part of your duty if you did not take some action in the matter. It is therefore that I ask Her Majesty's Government, to whom we naturally look for guidance in these matters, what course they intend to pursue with respect to the Report of the Special Commissioners appointed under the Act of 1888?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I concur with my noble Friend in saying that the Report prepared in obedience to the prescription of both Houses of Parliament, the result of so much labour and energy, ought not to be passed by on the part of the House of Lords without notice. But the position of the two Houses is not exactly the same in respect to this Report. It deals very largely with imputations made against Members of the other House of Parliament. I do not know that there is any Member of your Lordships' House in that position, and, therefore, it is natural that the House of Commons should first deal with that Report, and I think, as a mere matter of courtesy, it is well that we should allow the House of Commons to take what action it thinks best before we move in the matter. I suppose the House of Commons will come to some decision in the matter, and I see no reason why, as far as I know, the action of this House should differ materially from the action of the House of Commons.

EARL GRANVILLE: Do I understand the noble Marquess rightly that it is proposed by Her Majesty's Government to recommend this House to do not what is now proposed to be done in the House of Commons, but anything which may be settled by the House of Commons which takes the same line?

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: That, perhaps, would be a bold promise. It might be a safe one, but I do not think I have ventured so far as that. The only thing is, we shall not resolve upon the Motion which we shall ask your Lordships to accept until we have seen what the action of the House of Commons is.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five o'clock, to Thursday next, a quarter past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

QUESTIONS.

CYPRUS.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Post-Master General whether, in view of the Report of the High Commissioner of Cyprus (p. 41, Rep. 1887—8, published 1889), that,

"A marked feature in the import trade has been the decline in the value of imports from Great Britain since the discontinuance of the weekly mail service from Alexandria," he will take into his favourable consideration the expediency of re-establishing direct postal communication between Great Britain and Cyprus in British Ships?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Mr. RAIKES, University of Cambridge): I can assure my hon. Friend that proposals to re-establish a British Packet Service between this country and Cyprus have more than once occupied my attention, and I recognise the importance of the consideration to which he refers as bearing upon the question. But the matter is one in which my Department is not free to act alone, and has to be decided by Her Majesty's Government as a whole.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can state the total amount of money transmitted from Cyprus to England under the head of "Tribute to the Porte" from the year 1879-80 to the present time; the amount transmitted by the British Treasurer to France during the same period; and the amount reserved for a sinking fund on the Turkish loan guaranteed by Great Britain and France?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The total amount transmitted from Cyprus to England during the 11 years in question as "tribute to the Porte" is £959,361 14s. 9d. The amount transmitted to France in repayment of interest on the Imperial Ottoman Guaranteed loan is £30,501 1s. 3d. The amount at present standing to the credit of the Cyprus tribute account is £55,828 4s. 7d.

MR. S. LEIGHTON: Do I understand my right hon. Friend to say that the sum of only £30,500 has been transmitted to France?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am sorry to astonish my hon. Friend; but so it is.

Mr. Stanley Leighton

RIOTING IN THE PUNJAB.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he will lay upon the Table the Papers relating to certain disturbances and rioting in Rohtak, in the Punjab, in August and September last, and the Reports of the trial of certain persons accused in connection therewith, and of the appeal and judgment thereon?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): The Secretary of State has no Papers relating to the riot at Rohtak. The persons implicated were dealt with by the ordinary tribunals, and no Report of the trials or judgments would, in ordinary course, be sent to the India Office.

EXCISE ADMINISTRATION IN INDIA.

MR. CAINE (Barrow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India if he has yet received the reply of the Indian Government to the Despatch of the Secretary of State for India, "Revenue No. 52, Excise Administration Resolution of the House of Commons," dated 16th May, 1889; when it will be laid upon the Table of the House; and will it be circulated to Members?

SIR J. GORST: The Despatch has just been received, and if the hon. Member will move for it, it will be laid on the Table.

THE VOLUNTEER FORCE OF INDIA.

MR. CAINE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India is aware that, while admission to the Volunteer Force of India is refused to the inhabitants of that country as such, Indian Christians are permitted to become members of these organisations; and whether, if he finds the facts are as stated above, the Secretary of State will give instructions to the Government of India to remove a disqualification which depends solely upon the profession of a particular religion, and make it possible for any Indians who may desire to do so to join the Volunteer Forces of the country?

SIR J. GORST: No, Mr. Speaker. There is no such exceptions in favour of Christians. All natives of India are alike eligible for admission to Volunteer Corps.

SCHEMES OF THE CHARITY COMMISSIONERS.

MR. C. ACLAND (Cornwall, Launceston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Penrith (Mr. J. W. Lowther) whether the Charity Commissioners will be prepared to send to the Clerks of the Councils of the Counties of Devon and Cornwall a copy of every draft scheme to be published by the direction of the Commissioners, for the regulation of a charity administered for the benefit of any parish or place within the said counties?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith): The Charity Commissioners will comply with the request of any County Council which passes a resolution requesting to be supplied with a copy of every Draft Scheme in that county, published after the date of such resolution.

THE CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when the Civil Service Estimates will be in the hands of Members?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Class I. will be circulated on Monday next, and the remaining Classes within a few days.

THE DELAGOA BAY RAILWAY.

MR. SETON-KARR (St. Helen's): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is a fact that the Delagoa Bay Railway Concession is about to be offered at auction by the Portuguese Government, and that a group of capitalists is being formed to purchase it; whether, if this is the case, the purchase-money will be paid to the Portuguese Government unconditionally or otherwise; and how it is proposed to protect the interests of the present shareholders?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): We are not informed as to the railway being sold by auction, or as to the terms on which it will be paid for. On page 59 of the Papers will be found a Royal Decree approving a contract for the completion of the line by a Dutch Company. I stated rather fully yesterday the actual condition of the affairs. If my hon.

Friend, after reference to that statement, desires further information, I shall be glad to afford it, if possible.

THE CIVIL SERVICE.

MR. RICHARD POWER (Waterford): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he will state the intentions of Her Majesty's Government as regards the proposals of the Ridley Commission, as set forth in their Second Report, presented in August 1888, in connection with the Higher Division of the Civil Service; and when the Superannuation Bill will be laid upon the Table, the interests of the Service having suffered by the prolonged anxiety occasioned in the various Public Departments owing to the uncertainty as to the steps that may be taken to give effect to the proposals referred to?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am afraid it is impossible, within the limits of an answer to a question, to state in more detail than was done in the Treasury Minute of August 10 last what our intentions are with reference to the recommendations of the Royal Commission in connection with the Higher Division of the Civil Service. I am, however, engaged upon a Treasury Minute on the subject, which can be framed with comparative facility as regards future entrants, but presents many difficulties as regards existing Civil Servants. The Royal Commission recommended that the hours of attendance should in future be seven, and stated that—

“In the case of the Higher Division, we do not think that it necessarily follows that a requirement of seven hours' attendance should involve increased pay.”

The Treasury Minute of August prescribed compensation on a certain scale and within certain limits for the extra hour. The Higher Division clerks plead that the compensation is not sufficient, and that the limits should be extended. The Royal Commission recommended a scale of salary rising from £200 to £1,000; the Treasury accepted this scale as a maximum, but decided in their Minute to retain the various existing scales within this maximum, in accordance, I believe, with the views of the Royal Commission. The Higher Division clerks urge that the scale proposed by the Commission should be generally adopted.

The Commission strongly recommended a reduction of the numbers of the Higher Division. The clerks urge that this reduction should be carried out with due regard to the reasonable prospects of promotion of existing Civil servants. It is obvious that the demands of the Higher Division, if generally conceded, would result in a considerable augmentation of expenditure in direct contradiction to the economical intentions of the Royal Commission. The Treasury is endeavouring, however, in correspondence with the other Departments, to carry out the reduction of the Higher Division in the spirit of the Royal Commission Report, but without undue harshness being inflicted on existing clerks. The hon. Member will see that it is no easy matter to find an equitable solution of these difficulties; and that the fixing of the future establishment of the Higher Division, involving as it does minute inquiries into the constitution of the several Departments and frequent conferences and consultations with the permanent heads, requires much time. As regards the second question, I am unable to state the precise time when the Superannuation Bill will be introduced; but, speaking broadly, it will proceed upon the lines of the Bill introduced last year.

THE OATHS ACT.

MR. BRADLAUGH (Northampton): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the fact that, on 25th February, John Laidler, at Newcastle-on-Tyne Assizes, before Mr. Justice Day, claimed to affirm as a juror as being a person without religious belief, under the Oaths Act, 1888, but that the Clerk of the Court was unable to find the proper form of affirmation, and ultimately partially read an incorrect form of affirmation; whether it is correctly reported in the Newcastle Chronicle of 26th February that thereupon the Court became convulsed with laughter; and whether directions can be given to the officers charged with the administration of oaths in Courts of Justice which will prevent the repetition of such a scene?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I have made inquiry into this case, and am informed by the Clerk of Assize that some slight delay was occasioned in consequence of the form of affirmation which should have been used under the Oaths Act, 1888, not being forthcoming, and the Associate having repeated from memory the form applicable in the case of those persons who object to be sworn on the ground of religious belief. The Clerk of Assize, however, informs me that it is a gross exaggeration to say that the Court was convulsed with laughter. The fact is that the case, being the last but one at the Assizes, and it being late in the day, Mr. Laidler was informed by Mr. Justice Day that he might be discharged from the Court, and he then left the jury box. I have suggested to the Associate that cards with proper forms should be kept, as is the practice at the Royal Courts of Justice.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Do I understand the Attorney General to suggest that there were two forms of affirmation—one for persons without religious belief, and another for persons who desire to affirm rather than take an oath?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: No; I suggested nothing of the kind. I merely said that the Associate repeated from memory the form previously in use for persons who object to be sworn on the ground of religious belief. I know that there are not two forms of affirmation.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: Was the form in which the affirmation was proposed to be administered the form which was repealed by the Act of 1888? Is the hon. and learned Gentleman aware of that fact?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I am perfectly aware of it; but the Associate was not the officer who ordinarily performs the duty, and he repeated from memory the form to which he was accustomed. He did his best under the circumstances.

*MR. BRADLAUGH: I beg to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether his attention has been called to the fact that F. W. Smith, summoned as a juror at an inquest at the Khedive Hotel, William Street, Wakefield, claimed to affirm under "The Oaths Act, 1888," as a person without religious belief; but that the coroner, Mr. Taylor, refused to allow Mr. Smith to affirm, declaring that there was no Act authorising such affirmation; and whether any steps can be taken to make the coroner give effect to the law?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The following is the information which has been given to me by Mr. Taylor, the coroner of Wakefield:—

“At the holding of the inquest in question a person, whose name he did not know, and whose name was not mentioned, said, ‘Mr. Coroner, I am summoned on this inquest; I object to take an oath; I am an atheist.’ The Coroner then replied that there was no necessity to make any such statement; that Acts had been passed to enable Quakers and others to affirm, but that there was no Act enabling an atheist specially to do so; and that if the person wished he could make an affirmation under the provisions of the recent Act. The person in question did not claim to affirm or mention any Act of Parliament to the coroner. As there were 12 jurymen without him, the coroner told him that his services would not be required. The name of F. W. Smith did not appear in the list of persons summoned as jurors upon the inquest.”

THE BERLIN LABOUR CONFERENCE.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, at the Berlin Conference, the British Delegate will be empowered to discuss the question of the international limitation of the hours of labour in mines, inasmuch as the subject is specially mentioned in the German Emperor's Rescript?

*THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. W. H. SMITH, Strand, Westminster): The reply of Her Majesty's Government to the invitation to a Conference accompanying the programme placed before them by the German Government will be laid before Parliament as soon as it has been received by the German Government. Until then it would not be usual to state what the purport of that reply will be, or what instructions will be given to the British Delegates.

THE COLONISATION COMMITTEE.

MR. SETON-KARR: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury how soon he proposes to re-appoint the Colonisation Committee?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I hope that the Committee will be re-appointed in the course of a few days.

LICENSING LAWS—THE DEATH OF WILLIAM JENNINGS.

MR. HENRY J. WILSON (York, W.R., Holmfirth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the circumstances disclosed at the inquest held at Castleford on the 15th of February, relative to the death of William Jennings, whose head was battered into a shapeless mass by the revolutions of the wheel of the conveyance in which he was being driven by a relative from the Junction Inn, Methley, where they had been drinking for a considerable time, and which they left in a state of intoxication; whether the keeper of the Junction Inn or any of his servants were called as witnesses at the inquest; whether any proceedings have been taken against the landlord, who appears to have supplied both men with drink until they were in a condition which led to the death of one of them; and whether any such steps will be taken?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Report from the Chief Constable on the subject, from which I learn that the two men called at the Junction Inn on their way home in the evening, and remained there for three-quarters of an hour. The landlord denies that he supplied them with any intoxicating drink, and this is corroborated by a miner who was in the house a part of the time. The deceased man was the worse for drink when he arrived. The police, who made the fullest inquiries, were not able to obtain any evidence to show that the landlord supplied the deceased or his companion with intoxicating drink. Neither he nor his servants were called at the inquest, and there was no ground to justify proceedings against him. The police believe that the men got most of their drink at the houses of private friends whom they visited in the course of the day.

POST OFFICE WORKING EXPENSES.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it is the custom for the Post Office to give bonuses to Inspectors or other officials for cutting down working expenses; and whether continual complaints are being made of the arbitrary stoppage of payment for overtime?

*MR. RAIKES: In reply to both of the questions of the hon. Member the answer is in the negative.

IRELAND—ALLEGED INTIMIDATION AT FALCARRAGH.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he has seen a report of the Falcarragh Petty Sessions, held on Tuesday, 25th February, before Messrs. Burke and Beresford, Resident Magistrates, and at which Edward M'Ginley, an evicted tenant, was charged with intimidating one Charles Gallagher by interfering with the sale of the latter's pig at a fair; if it is true, as reported in the newspapers, that the only overt act of intimidation deposed to consisted in the defendant's "winking at the pig;" and the magistrates held there was no proof that the pig buyers were intimidated, and dismissed the summons, but yet bound the defendant in sureties to keep the peace, or in default to be imprisoned for three months; and was the prosecution brought under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act; and, if not, under what Statute?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, University of Dublin): I am unable to answer the question, as I have not yet received a Report.

LAND COMMISSION—SITTINGS AT CAVAN.

MR. O'HANLON (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he will name a day upon which the Commissioners will sit in the town of Cavan to fix fair rents; whether it is a fact that many of the tenants have served notices for fixing fair rents so long ago as October, 1887, which have not yet been considered; whether many of the landlords are insisting upon the payment of the old rack rents; and whether the Government will allow this injustice to go on; and, if so, how long?

MR. MADDEN: I have not yet received a Report, and must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question.

CHARGE AGAINST AN EMERGENCY MAN, M'KEEVER.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to a case heard at Woodford Petty Sessions on the 24th inst., before Messrs. Hickson, R.N., and Burke, J.P., in which an emergency man named M'Keever, was summoned by Constable Sheehan on a charge of being "drunk in the streets of Woodford on the 14th inst., and having a loaded revolver in his possession"; if it is true, that a few hours after his arrest he was brought before Mr. Burke, J.P., by whom he was discharged, and who added that no further action should be taken; has his attention been called to the report of the trial, from which it appears that it was proved by Constable Sheehan that M'Keever, on being arrested, threatened to shoot him; that Mr. Burke, notwithstanding the protest of the presiding magistrate, persisted in cross-examining the policeman, and finally called him a "blackguard;" and that after M'Keever had been fined £2 and costs, and had paid that sum, Mr. Burke stood up in Court, advised M'Keever to appeal, and ordered the money to be handed back; and if the above facts are correctly stated, whether the Lord Chancellor will make inquiry into the action of this magistrate?

MR. MADDEN: The facts are as stated in the first two paragraphs of the question. As regards the third paragraph it appears that M'Keever did not threaten to shoot the constable, nor did Mr. Burke direct the amount of the fine to be handed back. The report, however, of what actually occurred at the trial disclosed matters of a serious nature which shall be brought under the attention of the Lord Chancellor.

In reply to a further question by Mr. FLYNN,

MR. MADDEN said: If the hon. Gentleman requires further information he had better put a question upon the Paper.

THE SPECIAL COMMISSION.

MR. JOHN O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether the evidence given before the Special Commission has been yet presented to Parliament; and whether it is to be accessible to the public in the usual way on payment; and, if not, by what authority are the volumes now being distributed to Members?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: The evidence given before the Special Commission has not been made a Parliamentary Paper, but copies are obtainable by the Members of both Houses on application at the Library or the Public Bill Office. The number of copies printed will probably only be sufficient to meet the applications of Members of Parliament; and if there is any general desire on the part of the public to obtain copies by purchase it would be necessary to reprint the volumes, which would involve considerable delay and a large expenditure of public money. In redemption of a pledge given by me on the 20th ult., all the copies which are available have been placed at the disposal of Members on their application.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): Arising out of that answer, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the type has been broken up; and, if so, why it was broken up?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I believe that, as a matter of fact, it has been broken up. It was broken up some time ago. Copies were printed at the request of the Special Commission; but it is not contemplated to print additional copies of the evidence.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: By whose authority were they distributed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: They were distributed to Members who applied for them in consequence of the pledge which was given to hon. Members in February.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Does not the right hon. Gentleman propose that the evidence on which the Report of the Commission is founded shall be laid on the Table of the House?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; I do not propose to lay it on the Table.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say how many copies were distributed?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: No; I am not able to say.

IRISH NATIONAL TEACHERS BILL.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: In the absence of the Chief Secretary, may I ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, as the place for the Second Reading of the Irish National Teachers Bill has been unhappily lost, the Irish Government will give facilities for the Second Reading on a future day, or will do anything to ameliorate the condition of the teachers in redemption of the many promises which have been made to them by the present Chief Secretary and his predecessors?

*MR. MADDEN: The first part of the question ought to be addressed to the leader of the House; and in regard to the second part, if the hon. Member addresses a question to the Chief Secretary it will be answered by him.

MR. STACK (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that it is the intention of the Government to appropriate next Wednesday for the Debate on the Commission Report, he can promise that facilities will be given for the Second Reading of the Irish National Teachers Bill, fixed for Wednesday?

*MR. W. H. SMITH: I am unable to promise facilities for the Second Reading of the Bill to which the hon. Member refers.

THE WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING COMMISSION.

SIR W. LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I wish to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state when the Report of the Welsh Sunday Closing Commission will be laid on the Table?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not able to give the hon. Baronet any definite date; but the Chairman of the Commission stated, a fortnight ago, that it would be produced very shortly.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Has the Commission concluded its labours in taking evidence?

MR. MATTHEWS: Yes.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (SPECIAL COMMISSION (1888) REPORT).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That the Order for resuming the Adjourned Debate on the Special Commission (1888) Report have precedence, on every day for which it is set down, of all other Orders of the Day and Notices of Motion.”—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

*(3.55.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The Irish Members had the good fortune to secure the second place for to-morrow for a Bill in reference to the salaries and pensions of National school teachers in Ireland. They had every hope that the Bill would be brought on, and that they would be able to discuss a question which has been hung up for very many years. The repeated promises which have been made to the teachers of Ireland have never been fulfilled, and the consequence is that these important public servants feel that they have been grievously ill-treated. We therefore feel that we are entitled on their behalf to press their claims this Session, and we shall undoubtedly be obliged to find an opportunity for ourselves, unless the right hon. Gentleman can find one for us. We are disposed to assent to the proposal he has now made; but, at the same time, we ask him to allow us a day for considering this important question, which, by a fortunate ballot, we had an opportunity of discussing.

*(3.57.) MR. W. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): My claim is, I think, even stronger than that of the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton). Great as is the grievance of the Irish National teachers, I think the political enfranchisement of women is a question of even greater importance. [A laugh.] Some hon. Members may laugh; but it is to women a subject of the very highest importance. I had much rather that the Motion which stands first on the Paper to-night was not in my name, because I should have greater freedom in speaking upon the subject. I do not complain because it is my opportunity that is taken away, but because I feel the importance of the subject. I had intended to move an Amendment to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman to except the Motion in reference to the extension of the Parliamentary franchise to women; but I have no wish to divide the House, and will not press it. But considering the increasing interest which is growing in the country upon this question, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to promise that if I or any other Member again obtain a day for this Motion he will not take it from us a second time.

(4.0.) MR. WOODALL (Hanley): I must commend my hon. Friend the Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren) for the discretion he has exercised in not pressing the Amendment; and I hope that his request for facilities for the discussion of the question on a future day will be conceded by the First Lord of the Treasury.

*(4.1.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I wish to utter a feeble protest against the taking away of private Members' rights. As we have been accused of following the right hon. Gentleman's lead like sheep, it is only reasonable that we should say a word upon the subject. The House has now been in Session for 15 days, and six-and-a-half of those days have been devoted to Irish business. The English Members have not had their fair share of the time of the House. And what are the private Members asked to sacrifice their rights for to-night? Simply to hear long speeches from Queen's Counsel who have already addressed the Commission. If the question before the House was whether those Members who have been found guilty of offences should be punished or expelled from the House, then I could understand that the discussion might be a lengthened one; but at present the whole thing appears to me to be a sham.

fight, and I protest against the time of private Members being taken in order to carry it on.

*(4.5.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): On this side of the House I wish to commend the appeal of the hon. Gentlemen opposite, namely, the hon. Members for Crewe and Hanley (Mr. M'Laren and Mr. Woodall) to the favourable consideration of the House.

*(4.6.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I admit that there is a hardship in the case of the Motion of the hon. Member for Crewe (Mr. M'Laren); but I am afraid that the circumstances under which the House is placed by the length of the speeches to which my hon. Friend has referred form a difficulty which it is not in the power of any leader of the House to remedy. The circumstances of the case are known to the House, and I believe that the House desires to continue this Debate until it is concluded, as is the usual practice in Debates of this character. Therefore I am obliged to pass by what are called the rights of private Members, in order that this Debate may be taken up and finished as speedily as is consistent with the gravity of the question. With regard to the request of the hon. Member for Crewe for an undertaking that if he is fortunate enough to secure another day it would not be taken away from him, I do not think that any Minister would be justified in making an absolute promise of that kind, because he could not tell what might be the circumstances of the case at the time. I can only say that I am most anxious that the hon. Member should have his opportunity, and I may add that I will not wilfully or mischievously, so to speak, deprive him of it. With regard to what has fallen from the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton), I can only express my regret that I cannot give a positive undertaking in the absence of the Chief Secretary; but I admit that the question put to me by the hon. Member is a reasonable one. The hon. Member will have his opportunity of calling attention to the question on the Estimates, and if that is not satisfactory the Government will consider the matter.

(4.10.) MR. SEXTON: By the indulgence of the House, perhaps I may be allowed to say that one of my hon. Friends did propose to move an Amendment exempting the Irish National Teachers Bill from the operation of the Resolution. But we are unwilling to put the House to the trouble of a Division if the right hon. Gentleman will give us any hope that he will be able to give a day for the discussion of the Bill without compelling us to take it upon the Estimates.

*(4.12.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am afraid that I am not in a position to add anything to what I have already said. I hope, however, that it may be possible to afford the hon. Member the opportunity he desires.

Question put, and agreed to.

PRIVATE BILL COMMISSION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Arthur Elliot, Bill for establishing a Commission to examine and report on Private Bills in Parliament, and for other matters relating thereto, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Arthur Elliot, Sir John Mowbray, Mr. John Morley, Sir Lyon Playfair, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Howorth, Mr. Cameron Corbett, and Mr. Haldane.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 176.]

ORCHARDS RATING EXEMPTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Hobhouse, Bill to amend the Laws relating to the Rating of Orchards for sanitary purposes, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Hobhouse, Mr. Charles Acland, and Mr. H. Knatchbull-Hugessen.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 177.]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SPECIAL COMMISSION (1888) REPORT. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [3rd March] to Question,

"That, Parliament having constituted a Special Commission to inquire into the charges and allegations made against certain Members of Parliament, and other persons, and the Report of the Commissioners having been presented to Parliament, this House adopts the Report and thanks the Commissioners for their just and impartial conduct in the matters referred to them; and orders that the said Report be entered on the Journals of this House."—(Mr. William Henry Smith.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the first word "House" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "deems it to be a duty to record its reprobation of the false charges of the gravest and most odious description, based on calumny and on forgery, which have been brought against Members of this House, and particularly against Mr. Parnell; and, while declaring its satisfaction at the exposure of these calumnies, this House expresses its regret for the wrongly inflicted and the suffering and loss endured through a protracted period, by reason of these acts of flagrant iniquity,"—(Mr. W. E. Gladstone,) —instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

(4.15.) MR. LOCKWOOD (York) : Like my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid), I certainly feel a considerable amount of diffidence in taking any part in this debate, and my position has not been made more comfortable by the remarks which have been made by my hon. Friend the Member for North Islington (Mr. Bartley), as I suppose he included me among the persons who are about to inflict long speeches upon this House, and among those whom he accused of having already inflicted long speeches on the Commission. For myself, I may say that I inflicted no speech upon the Commission, and I do not intend to inflict a long speech upon this House. At the same time I feel bound to say that I shall record my Vote in favour of the Amendment, because to my mind it is absolutely and literally the truth. I should be surprised indeed to hear that contention denied by hon. Gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the House. We have had from the Attorney General and the Minister of Agriculture admissions which distinctly assert the truth of the Amendment of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). The Report had not been circulated for more than two days, when the Attorney General went down post-haste to Oxford to deliver himself with what he called an unfettered tongue. Having performed that somewhat delicate, and, I venture to think, somewhat dangerous, operation, my hon. and learned Friend proceeded to inform his audience that he personally was rejoiced that Mr. Parnell and those who were associated with him in this indictment had been able to clear themselves from the graver charges which for 12 months he had been trying to prove. There was also the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, which will be remembered from the fact that for two or three days after it was delivered it was impossible to take up a morning paper without finding that some portion of it had been withdrawn. When the expurgated edition of that speech comes to be published I apprehend that those who enthusiastically cheered it when they heard it delivered at Cambridge will hardly recognise it. He, too, expressed his personal satisfaction, and was able to tell his hearers that he rejoiced in the acquittal of Mr. Parnell and his Colleagues. But why all this personal satisfaction and all this rejoicing if there is nothing to rejoice about? I give the hon. and right hon. Gentlemen credit for all sincerity in their declaration. We heard the hon. Member for Roxburgh (Mr. A. Elliot) in the speech which he made last night accuse my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries of quibbling because he had drawn a contrast between the original charges and those which the Commission declared to have been proved. All the grave and material charges have not been proved, and it is only the venial ones upon which a verdict of guilty has been pronounced. I want to maintain, if I can, that this Amendment is absolutely and literally true. It is true that there have been false charges made, that they are of the gravest and most discreditable character, and that they have been based on calumny and forgery. Let us go back to a very interesting occasion. It was on the 17th of September, 1888, that the Times newspaper in the history of this inquiry was first brought face to face with the men it had maligned and traduced. I call attention to the incident for the purpose of pointing out that the Times, when for the first time it found itself face to face with the men it had traduced and maligned, began to endeavour to shirk the responsibility of the charges it had made and to put them upon the shoulders not of men, but of an organisation. That incident shows not only what was the attitude of the Times, but what was the view taken by the President of the Commission. On the 17th of September, 1888, counsel applied to the Court to have particulars supplied to them as to the individuals who were charged, and the charges which were made against them, and this interesting and instructive dialogue took place between the learned counsel representing the Times and Sir James Hannen, the President of the Commission.

"The President: Do you propose to substantiate any charges?—Counsel: I don't know."

Then later on—

"The President: Who are implicated in the charges and allegations?—Counsel: We don't charge."

"The President: They have not made charges and allegations against you?—Counsel: Nor I. I have not made charges and allegations against them."

"The President: Who did make these charges and allegations which the Legislature has directed us to inquire into? Did nobody make them?—Counsel: Certain charges—" and I beg the attention of the House to this—

"Certain charges and allegations have been made against the Irish organisation."

"The President: No, no. It is more than that; it is charges and allegations against particular persons."

Later on the President said—

"Did the Attorney General make no charges against individuals?—Counsel: Not here. He made charges against an organisation."

"The President: But not against individuals?—Counsel: The individuals, of course, were members of the organisation."

If the Attorney General accepts the view that he did not make charges against individuals, but against an organisation, then the House was induced to pass the Commission Bill on false pretences. If, on the other hand, the Attorney General accepts the view that he did make personal charges, then he has failed to establish a single case. The charges are not charges against personalities or against individuals, but, if established at all, they are charges against an organisation and against a policy. In his speech the Attorney General said—

"I am here to inquire into some very specific charges. Those charged shall have no reason to find fault with me for not making the allegations clear with regard to the details as to the part each person played. The word organisation is not used for the purpose of evading the responsibility cast on us of dealing with the charges and allegations against individuals."

[Sir R. WEBSTER: Hear, hear]. My hon. and learned Friend cheers that statement. Has that undertaking been carried out? I have had some acquaintance with the course of procedure before the Commission, and I protest against its being suggested that that was the spirit in which the inquiry was conducted. Hon. Members of this House came down to the Commission, and waited there day after day in the hope that names might be mentioned, in order that they might ascertain in some way what kind of personal accusation was being made against them. They waited in vain; that was not the line that was to be adopted. All that was done was to make general and sweeping charges against an organisation and against a policy with which the Government do not agree. Let me call attention to the kind of charges which were made, and which I take from three sources—Parnellism and Crime, the speech of the Attorney General in the case of O'Donnell against Walter, and the speech of the Attorney General at the opening of the Commission. I will read some extracts from each of these three sources, so that the House may realise the class of charges that were made, and may compare them with the charges which have in some degree been proved. In the article on Parnellism and Crime, which appeared in the Times, there is this passage—

"But treason is not our main charge against Mr. Parnell. Murder still startles the casuist and the doctrinaire, and we charge that the Land League chiefs based their movement upon a scheme of assassination carefully calculated and coolly applied. Be the ultimate goal of these men what it will they are content to march towards it in company with murderers. Murderers provide their funds; murderers share their inmost councils. Murderers have gone forth from the League offices to set their bloody work afoot, and will have presently returned to consult the Constitutional leaders upon the progress of the cause."

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Where is that?

MR. LOCKWOOD: Does my hon. and learned Friend deny that?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I merely asked for a reference—I did not deny anything.

MR. LOCKWOOD: I have been careful to verify the extract; not a tittle of evidence was offered in support of that charge, and the finding of the Commissioners is directly in favour of the gentlemen who were specified in the speech of the Attorney General in the case of "O'Donnell v. Walter" as having been guilty of it. Are we, on this side of the House, to be accused of quibbling because we protest against this charge not being recognised as a most disgraceful one, which ought to be apologised for, and the apology recorded on the Journal of the House? Here is another extract from a leading article that appeared in the Times on March 7, 1887—

"There are plenty of authentic utterances fixing upon prominent Members of the Home Rule Party the guilt of direct incitement to outrage and murder."

That charge is absolutely negatived by the finding of the Commissioners. The same article, speaking of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, says—

"Merely to have his revenge upon his countrymen for rejecting his advice, and to prove his declaration that all other business shall be made impossible to be no idle threat, Mr. Gladstone and his party are deliberately allying themselves with the paid agents of an organisation whose ultimate aim is plunder and whose ultimate sanction is murder."

I hope I do not weary the House by reading these extracts, but I feel that it is necessary that the House should appreciate what was the real nature of the accusations hurled at the hon. Members below the Gangway. In "O'Donnell v. Walter," the Attorney General said, on the question of a particular organisation being diverted to improper purposes—

"Do not let it be supposed that I am going to deal with the small fry of the organisation."

Yet in the Commission case we were compelled to sit day after day whilst representatives of the Times put on record the utterances of the smallest of fry in the hope of implicating hon. Gentlemen by blackening the League, and, indirectly, of blackening those who belonged to it. On the second day of the Commission, a very grave accusation was made, on the authority of the Attorney General, of course on instruction, but not a tittle of evidence was brought forward to support it, and I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman will take the opportunity during this debate of expressing his regret that he was led to make the charge against prominent Members of this House. In his speech the hon. and learned Member said—

"Though the leaders did not themselves go and personally plan the outrages. They could not do it because they had not time, and of course would not be connected with it directly, but there were the men doing it for them, and of that system they took charge."

Will the hon. and learned Member say now that he believes that it was simply because the leaders had not time to do this bloody work that they did not do it? That is the construction to put on these words. I appeal to hon. Gentlemen opposite, some of whom, I am sure, are prepared to deal fairly with these men, if I am not using a right construction. I shall watch with anxiety the course which the hon. and learned Member will take with reference to this terrible and groundless accusation. Then the hon. and learned Gentleman said—

"I think it will appear that an emissary of the Land League used to get the money from the treasurer—either Mr. Biggar, or Mr. Brennan, or Mr. Egan, or any one of the officials who might be in charge—used to take down the money, £20 or £30—having received the money, of course, from Mr. Biggar or from any of the other officials who handled it—used to take down the £20 or £30 into the district, and then distribute it locally to the men who were to carry out the outrages."

Sir, Mr. Biggar has died since that accusation was made. He is not here to defend himself, but I entreat the hon. and learned Member, by a frank disavowal of that statement, to clear this man's memory from the gross aspersions which he was instructed to cast upon his character. Not wishing to weary the House, I will only refer very briefly to one other utterly groundless charge, namely, that the Invincibles were one with the Land League. The Attorney General having said that Mr. Parnell had declared that the Invincibles belonged to some other organisation, went on—

"I think you will have no doubt as to the organisation from which the Phoenix Park murders proceeded."

Do I misinterpret the words of the hon. and learned Gentleman when I say he meant the Land League? What has the hon. and learned Member to say in reply? He does not answer.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: It is impossible that I should interrupt to answer all the questions that are put to me. As far as I recollect, in the passage to which the hon. and learned Member refers, there certainly was no reference to the Land League. My recollection is that the passage refers to some organisation of Fenians, worse than the Fenians themselves.

MR. LOCKWOOD: Of course, I am anxious that I should in no way come in conflict with the hon. and learned Gentleman, but I must say I wish he could have assured me in more definite language as to what his meaning was. I understand him to say that, so far as his recollection goes, he said——

*SIR R. WEBSTER : Those are not my words.

MR. LOCKWOOD : Yes, indeed—in the case of “O'Donnell v. Walter,” page 101 of the Blue Book. In a sense these are not the hon. Gentleman's words, because they were the words he was instructed to speak. I have been very careful to point out all through that the hon. and learned Gentleman was speaking according to his instructions. So much, then, for these charges. I hope that by this time, I have proved that the Amendment in its terms is absolutely and entirely true from beginning to end. It has been admitted in speeches made by supporters of the Government. Then, has not the time arrived at last, when, upon the Journals of this House, there should be recorded an ample withdrawal of the terrible charges which have been made against Members of this House? It has been suggested in the course of the debate that, upon various occasions, statements have been made which ought to satisfy the House. From that suggestion I entirely dissent. There have been occasions, no doubt, when the Attorney General and others have made use of expressions, which by some might be considered sufficient and satisfactory. I, on the other hand, hold that there never has been adequate and ample recompense offered to these men for the terrible slur that has been cast upon them. I recollect what occurred in the Commission Court on February 27, 1889. We had met on the previous day, when the Court was crowded in every part. No; there was one vacant place, the witness-box. The Times' witness had gone, and the Attorney General, feeling, no doubt, that it would be very difficult to continue the play—I was about to say the play of Hamlet with the “Prince of Denmark” left out, but it would be more appropriate to say the play of Faust without “Mephistopheles”—the Attorney General asked for an adjournment. Next day he returned, instructed to withdraw a portion of the case and to express regret. Now, when a man has committed a wrong, and is anxious to set matters right, he does not find it difficult to make a straightforward apology, but the position is one of considerable difficulty when the person who has done wrong wants to give an indication of an apology without the substance of an apology. The Attorney General came into Court with his instructions written out this time. Can it be suggested that the words read by the hon. and learned Member contained that ample and adequate retraction which can alone be satisfactory to the maligned Members? What the Attorney General read was this—

“My Lords, under these circumstances it seems to us that the course which we ought to take is clearly defined, and, believing that we are merely doing our duty, I now, on behalf of those whom we represent, ask permission to withdraw from your consideration the question of the genuineness of the letters which have been submitted to you, the authenticity of which is denied, with the full acknowledgment that, after the evidence which has been given, we are not entitled to say that they are genuine. My Lords, although it is possible that any expression of regret used by me in making this statement may be misrepresented, those whom I represent request me to express their sincere regret that the letters were published. That feeling, which most truly exists, will, at the proper time, be more fully expressed by themselves.”

I have no doubt that is perfectly true; they do regret it. They regret exceedingly that the character of the Times as a respectable journal is shattered for ever. Then the Attorney General went on to say that, when the proper time came, a more full and ample expression of regret might be expected. Well, that time has not come yet, and so far as I can gather from that newspaper they sail as near the wind as they dare every day it is published. But they know now something about the law of libel—they have been taught by hon. Members below the Gangway, and they are careful not again to offend those laws. I appeal again to Gentlemen sitting opposite whether they can say that the Times has recognised that the occasion has come to do fuller and more ample justice to hon. Members below the Gangway. If they agree with me, do not hon. Members opposite think that the opportunity has arrived on the consideration of this Amendment? My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Roxburgh (Mr. Elliott) has referred to the damages accorded to the hon. Member for Cork as an adequate reparation to that hon. Member on his own showing. But that is not on the Journals of the House. In the future when the Journals of the House come to be consulted, no record will be found on them of that action. I do not think the Attorney General represented the Times on this occasion. But it is the fact that although the Times dare not assert that the letters are genuine, yet they bind up with the record numbers of charges against the Member for Cork, and endeavour, if they can, to blacken his character with aspersions which are equally base and false, and equally disgraceful to that newspaper. I think it will be agreed that there was no reparation such as the hon. Member had a right to expect made on the occasion of the action to which I have referred. I ought, however, to acknowledge that, after the speech of the hon. Member for Cork in the Privilege debate, the leader of the House said a few words in answer to the appeal which was made to him which were, if I may respectfully say so, worthy of the right hon. Gentleman, and of a straightforward English Gentleman. Let my hon. and learned Friend's clients take pattern from the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. But that, again, was no formal record. There has been up to now nothing to which hon. Members below the Gangway can point as showing that these charges have been made and disproved. I now want to say a word or two in regard to another matter which, no doubt, is a proper matter for our consideration. It may be said that although the charges made against hon. Members below the Gangway have been disproved, and although no reparation has been offered to them, yet in some way they are estopped from the relief they seek on account of the other charges that have been held to be established against them in this Report. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid), with a skill which I admired, dealt yesterday with all these charges, and I do not propose to go again over the ground which he so ably covered. It has been suggested that the Irish Members are debarred from the relief which is claimed for them by the charges which have been established against them. But the learned Judges themselves said that with respect to the amount of guilt which attached to these gentlemen they could offer no opinion to this House. The Judges also felt constrained to leave out of consideration matters which will be admitted to be of the first importance. I contend, therefore, that the finding on that head, which loses sight of all considerations in favour of these gentlemen, is a finding which reflects no dishonour on them, and does not disentitle them to the relief claimed by the Amendment. No reparation has been made, and I would ask hon. Members opposite to take these matters into their serious consideration, and to consider whether the time has not come for justice to be done to gentlemen who are their colleagues in the House.

*(4.55.) THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, East): It is no doubt interesting to the House to hear the learned Gentlemen who were concerned in this inquiry renew in our presence the arguments which were fully ventilated before the Commission. The hon. and learned Member who has just sat down has thought fit to make a personal attack on my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir R. Webster). My hon. and learned Friend is perfectly able to take care of himself, and I shall leave it to him, when he takes his turn in the Debate, to answer these personal observations with regard to his conduct. I would rather confine myself a little more strictly to the subject which is really before this House, namely, the Resolution and the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The hon. and learned Gentleman has said that the Amendment is absolutely true. Well, I am not concerned to contest that proposition. But I will add this, that it is only part of the truth. It is part of the truth, tainted with passionate and inflammatory adjectives. The Motion of my right hon. Friend is that we should adopt and record the whole of the findings of the Commissioners and show no favour to either side; and we should record both those findings which tell for the hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway and those which tell against them. We desire to record the finding that the letters attributed to the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) are forged, the findings which acquit that hon. Member and his colleagues from anything like complicity with the Phoenix Park murders——

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Oh, thanks.

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have not searched these charges and allegations, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has; but I understood him to allege that that would be found in the record. Well, all the exonerating findings will be recorded by adopting my right hon. Friend's Motion. What we decline to do is to adopt a one-sided treatment of the Report of the Commission. We decline to adopt a course which gives the go-by to all the findings to which hon. Members opposite object, which gives them no record at all in our memory or upon the Journals of the House, in order simply to express the condemnation in which we hold the falsity and vile origin of certain other charges which were disproved. Now, what is there to justify this mode of treatment of the findings of a tribunal appointed by this House? Certainly no reason has been assigned for reflecting upon the character of the tribunal. I have listened with great interest to all the speeches which have been made, particularly to that of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone). It is admitted that the tribunal showed zeal, industry, honour, and good faith. There is, therefore, nothing in the character of the tribunal to induce this House to disregard their findings. Is there, then, anything in the nature of the findings which disentitles them to the notice of the House? I cannot forget, Mr. Speaker, the origin of this inquiry. I cannot forget—I have here before me the record of the debate in this House—I cannot forget that it was at the instance of Members below the Gangway that we were invited to try these questions by another tribunal, to inquire into every charge which could be extracted from Parnellism and Crime. That was the contention of the hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon), and the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) desired that the whole matter from beginning to end should be inquired into. The right hon. Member for Newcastle desired that the whole body of charges made by the Times against the Irish Members should be inquired into. What was it which interested the bulk of hon. Members of this House? It was the question whether the allegations in these articles, that the purpose and modus operandi of this organisation, which have become so familiar to us all, were or were not criminal. What was alleged in these articles was that the purpose of the organisation, both of the Land League and of the National League, was of a treasonable character. What was alleged was that the means were illegal, aye, and even criminal; that the methods employed were not constitutional, legal, regular, or justifiable, but constituted a system in itself naturally leading to and producing outrage and crime. That was the question raised by these articles, and it was further desired to ascertain what complicity there was in each and all of the persons incriminated in bringing about that state of things. The Commissioners find that the Land League was established and founded with the intention and for the purpose of bringing about the absolute independence of Ireland. The Commissioners say—

“In our judgment the object aimed at by Mr. Davitt and the other founders of the Land League, with regard to the Revolutionary Party, was not to put an end to or restrain its action by merging it in the new movement, but to point out to those holding Fenian opinions that the two Parties did not clash, and that they might be of material aid to one another.”

And again—

“In our judgment the charge against the respondents collectively of having conspired to bring about total separation is not established. But we find that some of them, together with Mr. Davitt, established and joined in the Land League Organisation with the intention, by its means, to bring about the absolute independence of Ireland as a separate nation.”

These are almost the very words I used, and which have been challenged. [“No!” and laughter from the Opposition Benches.] I said that the Commissioners have found that the Land League was established with the intention of bringing about the absolute independence of Ireland.

MR. SEXTON: Would the right hon. Gentleman read the ultimate conclusion of the Commissioners, or will he allow me to read it?—

“We find that the respondent Members of Parliament, collectively, were not members of a conspiracy having for its object to establish the absolute independence of Ireland.”

*MR. MATTHEWS: Yes; but the Commissioners go on to say that Mr. Davitt, who was the founder of the Land League, had that intention and object, and I say that the findings of the Commissioners amount to this, that the organisation had for its object and purpose the absolute independence of Ireland. Further, I say that the National League is the Land League under another name, and that, therefore, when the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian (Mr. Gladstone) says that the idea of the absolute independence of Ireland is dead, he is in conflict on this point with the findings of the Commissioners. The right hon. Gentleman yesterday, in a passage of splendid rhetoric, inveighed against the means by which the Act of Union was brought about. It is only in recent times that the right hon. Gentleman has taken to giving us these lessons in history. I do not read history in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman, but this is a controversy wholly immaterial to this finding of the Commissioners. For the Commissioners find that the Land League had for its object, not the reform or alteration of the Act of Union and its replacement by some federal scheme or plan of delegation, but total separation between England and Ireland. The hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. Reid) and my learned Friend who has just addressed the House appear to be of opinion that when treason is 11 years old it becomes immaterial and unworthy of notice. That is not our view. Now, I should like to refer next to the means which were employed. According to the Commissioners there existed a criminal conspiracy to stop the rents and drive the landlords out of the country. How? By coercion, intimidation, and boycotting. The Commissioners find that the respondents did incite to intimidation, and that crime and outrage were committed by the persons incited, and that they persisted in this incitement with knowledge of its effect. The Commissioners find that by speeches and the dissemination of certain newspapers they caused an excitable peasantry to carry out the orders of the Land League, even by assassination. These findings amounted to this, that the Land League used criminal methods to further its ends. We are told that all this is to go for nothing, because the personal complicity of A B or C has not been established. That is a proposition upon which it seems to me to be hardly safe to challenge the judgment of the House of Commons. What was the nature of the speeches which were proved before the Commissioners? Speeches in which land-grabbers were denounced as "man-eating tigers," as "enemies of God and man," as "a thousand times worse than murderers," speeches in which young men were recommended to arm and drill. Do not speeches such as these involve the speakers in personal responsibility? Is there no personal responsibility for such words as these, uttered by the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. O'Brien)—

"We have an organisation at our back which has proved sufficient to make land-grabbing in any shape a very disagreeable and risky profession."

And the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. Dillon) with the candour which marks his utterances and which I cannot help admiring, said—

"There never was the slightest success until we hit upon the dodge of making it too hot for him who took his neighbour's land."

Do you mean to say that speeches like that made to an excited peasantry do not involve some kind of personal responsibility on those who utter them? Then as to the dissemination of newspapers. What were the newspapers? The House has been made sufficiently acquainted with the character of those newspapers. Archbishop Walsh called them abominable. The answer made is that the dissemination of these newspapers only amounts to constructive conspiracy. Thousands of copies of the Irish World scattered throughout Ireland is a matter for which no one is responsible, and so with regard to another paper owned by one of the respondents, who, it is represented, never knew its contents. I do not find that this method of criticism is applied to the editor of the Times, who is to be responsible for everything that appears in his paper. In my opinion neither law nor common sense will admit of such a plea as this. The doctrine, both of law and common sense, is that where a number of men are acting together for a joint purpose, when daily operations are carried out by each in furtherance of that joint purpose, all are responsible for the acts of each, save for those acts which may be disowned. The theory of the hon. and learned Member for Dumfries (Mr. R. T. Reid) appears to be that the only person answerable for an outrage is the man who commits the deed, and that those who may have suggested the deed are free from all responsibility. That is a doctrine which the House will, I think, be slow to accept.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman to refer to any passage in the Report showing that the respondents suggested outrages?

*MR. MATTHEWS: I have stated to the House what the Commissioners have found, namely, that the respondents incited to intimidation, that intimidation led to crime and outrage, and that the respondents persisted in their incitement to intimidation with knowledge of its effect. Will any one venture to assert that that does not amount to responsibility for the crime and outrage committed? If I invite a man to cross a bridge which I know to be rotten, or to partake of a dish which I know to be poisoned, am I not answerable for the consequences of his crossing the bridge or partaking of the dish? The Commissioners have found that the respondents were guilty of carrying on an Association whose object was treasonable by means that I must describe as criminal. Nothing seems to me to have been more clearly established than the truth of the words spoken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in 1882, that "crime with fatal precision dogs the footsteps of the Land League." Another plea that has been set up by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian is that offences of which the Commissioners have found certain hon. Members guilty are 10 years old. It is free, of course, for the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian and hon. Members opposite to argue that after 1886 came that magic change over Ireland which has disconnected the leaders of the National League for crime; but the Commissioners thought that that was not so, and that the continuity between the Land League and the National League still exists. The remarkable case of Mitchell, in page 47 of the Report, shows that a man with whom all had gone well prior to 1881 was boycotted in that year for letting out on hire agricultural machines to boycotted persons, and that he was persistently persecuted from 1881 to 1887. In the latter year his son, a boy of 11 years of age, going home with bread for his father, who had been two days without food, was attacked by three men, who hit him in his side with a large stone, which, to use Mitchell's expression, "rendered him worthless for his life." That was a case of outrage which was persisted in throughout the existence of the Land League and of the National League with a similar purpose and a like design. It is open to hon. Members opposite to maintain that the findings of the Commissioners on this point only concern ancient and musty history; but it is open to us to contend that the crime that existed at that time was exactly similar to the crime that led this House to pass the Crimes Act of 1887. Then another plea that has been set up by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is that the very grave crimes that the Commissioners found had been committed were due to some other causes than agitation—such as iniquitous rents and evictions. The finding of the Commissioners, who have dealt with that argument, is, we are told, to be set aside on the ground that their finding is non-judicial; but, in my opinion, the evidence before the Commissioners showed that the crime that prevailed was due not to distress, iniquitous rents, and evictions, but to agitation. The Commissioners have given 16 instances of outrages in one part of their Report. In five of these instances men were shot for having paid their rent. What had those outrages to do with iniquitous rents or evictions? In another case a man was shot for buying out a tenant, and in two other cases men were shot for being caretakers. Thus, out of 16 instances of outrage, eight examples had no connection with iniquitous rents, evictions, or other agrarian wrongs. Then, the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian asks the House not to record these adverse findings, because, according to him, the agitation which occurred during the years to which the Commissioners allude did more good than harm by preventing rather than causing crime, and because that agitation brought about the passing of the Land Act of 1881. The policy of the Land Act of 1881 may be open to a great deal of criticism. It was an exceptional

Act, which ran counter to many ancient principles and to economic science. It was justifiable only if it was a measure resorted to in a great public emergency; but it became odious and oppressive if it was a concession to turbulence and crime. The right hon. Member for Mid Lothian told us that an agitation which led to all these results in the judgment of the Commissioners deserved, not the censure of the House, but to be passed by in silence, because it had led to the passing of the Land Act. This is the second time that the right hon. Gentleman has enunciated the most dangerous and disastrous doctrine that those who are guilty of crime, who commit outrages and make law and order impossible, are to be rewarded by the passing of an exceptional Act such as is not granted to any other class of the community. The right hon. Gentleman told us yesterday that the Act for the disestablishment of the Irish Church and the Land Act of 1870 were free gifts to the Irish people, and he drew a distinction between those Acts and the Act of 1881. But his memory misled him; for, on a previous occasion, he told his audience in Mid Lothian that it was the blowing up of Clerkenwell Prison and the murder of a policeman at Manchester that made the disestablishment of the Irish Church a practical question of politics. I believe that the House of Commons will not accept that reasoning as sufficient to set aside the condemnatory findings of the Commissioners. The House will not admit that outrages and crime were really beneficial to the country because they brought about the Land Act of 1881. Then there is another question with regard to the connection that exists between the constitutional and lawful organisation in this country and the other organisations in America. With regard to that, the Commissioners have taught me many new facts which I did not know before. The Commissioners have taught me that the Clan-na-Gael is certainly as desperate and infamous a society as was ever known in history. It is a society which deliberately recommends the use of dynamite, and is continually engaged in the promotion of its use, and it is a society which rejected a man of the name of Collins as its temporary President, because he had been guilty of the enormous crime of offering a reward for the discovery of the Phoenix Park murderers. It has lately been distinguished by the facts that have appeared in connection with the trial of Dr. Cronin's murderers. Connected with that society is Mr. Patrick Ford, the editor of the Irish World. That is a newspaper which preaches the use of dynamite as a political weapon, and which suggested the laying in ashes of English towns, and advised that England ought to be plagued with all the plagues of Egypt, and that she ought to be scourged by day and terrorised by night, and wished success to the National League and more power to dynamite. The Clan-na-Gael and Mr. Patrick Ford and the Irish World were taken under the special protection of the Land League. Why was it that the Irish World was disseminated? Was there any social science to be learnt from that newspaper? Did it contain items of news which Irish readers could not obtain from any other source? What reason can ingenuity suggest why this paper was circulated by the Land League if it was not to accustom its readers to the kind of doctrine it advocated? I am unable to suggest any other reason for the anxiety to disseminate this paper throughout Ireland. It was not only disseminated, but the editor received the thanks of the hon. Member for Cork on the part of the Land League. The Secretary of the Land League in July, 1881, declared—

“That the success of the cause is to be measured by the acceptance of its principles. When the Irish World is read in every hamlet in every county, it will be beyond the power of earth and hell to perpetuate landlordism in Ireland.”

It is found that the respondents did invite the assistance and co-operation of Patrick Ford and the Irish World, that they accepted his money, and that the payments made by him were received by various persons, including the respondents. It is found that the respondents invited the assistance and co-operation of the Clan-na-Gael in order to get help from it, and that the hon. Member for Cork in particular abstained from any denunciation or condemnation of the Irish World for that purpose. Forsooth, the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian compared that with the case of the different bodies of Catholics in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, when there were Catholics who were loyal, and others who were inspired from abroad to assassinate the Queen. If Lord Montagu and his son had taken the money of the criminal conspirators, if they had circulated their correspondence and disseminated their views in the way that the Land League did in regard to the Irish World, I would not have given five minutes' purchase for their lives. Then the action of the Clan-na-Gael is also stated for us by the Commissioners. The Clan-na-Gael sent dynamitards to this country in 1883. One was named Lomasney, and the other, Dr. Gallagher, is still alive in this country. Then it is said that from 1883 to 1885 there was a lull in the outrages that occurred; because, as stated in one of the circulars of the Clan-na-Gael, a more active policy would be perilous to the leaders of the public movement in this country. This was the most disinterested friendship on the part of the Clan-na-Gael. Then, on December 16, 1885, there appeared in the Leeds Mercury, after a good many rumours, the first announcement of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian's famous scheme of Home Rule. Then began the first dawning of those sweet hopes which we are told will bring about a union of hearts and peace and prosperity to Ireland. No doubt the Clan-na-Gael was informed by telegraph what had happened, for two days after they issued a curious circular in which they announced their readiness to accept Home Rule, because they would have their friends in the Castle, and the plant of an armed revolution, and they recognised Home Rule as a step in the progress of their own designs. Then on December 23 there is another circular of an equally interesting character, in which it is said—

“We expect to resume active operations after the present exigencies of the Constitutional Party are passed.”

Here is a touching support given by the Clan-na-Gael to the Parliamentary Party. The Clan-na-Gael said they purposely abstained from doing anything which would embarrass the Constitutional Party during the crisis of the elections. As soon as the exigencies of the Constitutional Party demanded it the Clan-na-Gael ceased its outrages, and when the exigencies of the Constitutional Party no longer demanded it they declared their readiness to begin again.

MR. SEXTON: Where is that?

*MR. MATTHEWS: “We expect to resume active operations after the present exigencies of the Constitutional Party are passed.” They declare their readiness to begin again. It is a finding that cannot be passed over in silence. All these findings show the connection between the organisation which claimed at home to be a Constitutional organisation and the Clan-na-Gael, with Patrick Ford and his newspaper, the Irish World, at their back. It appears that these persons in America held the “throttle valve of crime” in their hand, and were ready to turn on and turn off steam as it suited the exigencies of the party in this country and the leaders of the open movement. I do not in the least wish to withhold from the record of the Commission that the hon. Member for Cork was not aware that the Clan-na-Gael had by a contrivance, explained in the Report, obtained control of the American organisations. That is perfectly true; but the observation does not controvert the fact that there is in America a body of persons perfectly lost to all the ordinary rules that govern men, perfectly regardless of what duty and morality require, and who are ready to interrupt or continue proceedings—which must be characterised as desperate and criminal—just as it suits the purposes and desires of the so-called Constitutional Party in this country. Is the House of Commons to pass by these facts without notice? The excuses that have been made for these things seem to me to make the matter worse. That facts so grave and so alarming as these found by the Commissioners are palliated and excused on such grounds as have been set forth by the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian seems to me to make it more than ever necessary that they should be recorded on the Journals of this House for the instruction of the country.

(5.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think the course of this debate, and especially the speech to which we have just listened, shows most conclusively both the unfairness and the unwisdom of using the weapon of the Criminal Law for the purpose of attacking our political opponents or for dealing with political issues. The whole of the Debate hitherto, so far as it has gone, on the other side has been a systematic attempt to insinuate to the House that the character of hon. Members from Ireland who sit below the Gangway is unworthy, unconstitutional, criminal, and of a censurable description, and quietly, without saying it openly, speeches are being made which are speeches against any change of Government in Ireland supported by those hon. Members. Now that seems to me an extraordinary position to take up, because if I entertained their view—the view of the so-called Unionist Party—and if the Commissioners had found that not one single line of censure ought to be distributed to these hon. Members, if they had eulogised them as patriots of the highest order and had commended every act and speech of the respondents, it would not affect by a hair's breadth my opposition to Home Rule. The character of the men is immaterial; in the issue you are dealing with a nation, and leaders come and leaders go; but the great Constitutional question remains. But dealing with a great Constitutional question, I think it is most unfortunate, most unfair, one of the most unfair things in this inquiry, thus imparting into a political question the weapon of the Criminal Law, endeavouring to fight those to whom we are politically opposed by charges of criminal offences which, if you believe them to be true, it is your bounden duty to follow up by a Motion to expel the accused Members from the House. Now, last night the President of the Board of Trade made the following remark—

“On our side we believe that the Report contains condemnation as well as acquittal, and we think it right and just to record both.”

Condemnation and acquittal! Yes, but for what are the respondents condemned and of what are they acquitted? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. H. Smith) last night gave us a history—and he was quite right in giving us that history—of the circumstances under which this Commission was instituted, and he very properly said we could not appreciate the findings of the Commission unless we recalled to recollection the circumstances under which that Commission was issued. I propose to supply one or two points that the right hon. Gentleman

did not refer to. My hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Lockwood) has to-night called attention to one or two passages which form the basis of the original charge, but I think the House should have a rather more extended prospect put before it of what was the original charge in Parnellism and Crime, and what was the charge which the Attorney General made in “O'Donnell v. Walter.” It was these two together that formed the basis or instruction for the inquiry ordered by Parliament. Let us see whether the main objects for which this inquiry was directed are not the objects upon which hon. Members have been acquitted. I am going to give the House four or five quotations. I will not repeat the quotations my hon. and learned Friend has given, although his contention is singularly illustrated by the speech just made, namely, that the Times in its first article said that treason was not the main charge against the hon. Member for Cork and his friends—

“Treason in these days of flabby tolerance is leniently regarded as personal indiscretion. We regard that as one proof of the decay of public opinion.”

And the article goes on to say they have to deal with something more serious, and they go on to connect their accusation against Irish Members with murder from first to last. They stated the Land League was a movement based on a scheme of assassination “carefully calculated and coolly applied.” They stated—it cannot be repeated too often—that the League was provided with funds by the murderers who shared their councils, and that murderers had gone from the League offices to set out on their bloody work, and returned to consult the Constitutional leaders on the progress of the cause. The next quotation I will give is one we have not heard very much about. I do not recollect if any evidence was produced in regard to it, but it is absolutely rejected in the findings. A distinct charge was made in Parnellism and Crime that the hon. Member for Cork, when he was let out of prison in order to attend a funeral in Paris, at a meeting with Land League members at Willesden, was made cognisant of the intended Phoenix Park murders. That is clearly set out on page 24 of Parnellism and Crime, and though it is not stated in the words I have used, the innuendo is clear and conclusive. Then again, on page 29, it is stated that Carey's evidence did not directly confirm the universal conviction that prevailed, that the League controlled the throttle valve of crime. The right hon. Gentleman said just now that that control was with the Clan-na-Gael. Here the charge is that Members of this House were actually accessories to the crime. In another passage the Times says—

“Not only was this murder club organised by one of Mr. Parnell's official chief organisers, but its victims were selected by Mr. Parnell's organisation.”

Then we have a charge distinctly bearing on Members of this House. The Times says—

“We have seen how Mr. Parnell's ‘Constitutional organisation’ was planned by Fenian brains, founded on a Fenian loan, and reared by Fenian hands; how the infernal fabric ‘rose like an exhalation’ to the sound of murderous oratory; how assassins guarded it about and enforced the high decrees of the secret conclave within by the bullet and the knife. Of that conclave to-day three members sit in the Imperial Parliament; four are fugitives from the law; against one a true bill for murder stands recorded: all the exiles consort with professed assassins since their flight. It remains to show that the ‘distinguished representatives’ at home have continuously maintained their relations with the murderers who fled and the murderers who harbour them.”

Then, on page 36, we find that the evidence put forward by the Times has “Revealed nearly all the chief Members of the first Home Rule Ministry—Mr. Parnell himself, Mr. Justin M'Carthy, Mr. T. P. O'Connor, Mr. Sexton, Mr. Arthur O'Connor, Mr. Healy, Mr. Biggar, the Messrs. Redmond, Mr. William O'Brien, and Davitt—in trade and traffic with avowed dynamiters, and known contrivers of murder.”

Those were the charges which Lord Salisbury said sent a thrill through the country, and which induced Parliament to interfere. When the Attorney General addressed the Court in the case of “O'Donnell v. Walter” he repeated those charges, and stated that they were the very worst libels which could be brought against a public man. The First Lord of the Treasury quoted some extracts from Lord Coleridge's judgment, but the most important extract was not given by him. Lord Coleridge says—

“The charges made against them were charges of complicity in murder, that they shut their eyes when crime was contemplated; in some cases they actually knew that murder was going to take place, and on other occasions they were present when murder was being talked about and did not disavow it.”

As the Lord Chief Justice summed up the charges he said the main issue was whether Parnellism was sustained on murder, rapine, and robbery. Those were the facts which were brought before Parliament, and which caused Lord Salisbury to say that they sent a thrill through the country—not what the late Mr. Forster said in 1881 or 1882, not the ravings of the Irish World or the Irishman, or any other newspaper of the kind. They created no indignation; we have heard them over and over again. What did send a thrill through the country was the charge that men on these Benches were contrivers and accomplices in murder. The debate on the Commission Bill in the House of Lords was distinguished by a speech from Lord Herschell which I will venture to say if delivered in this House would have stopped the progress of the Bill. It was an admirable masterly statement of the objections to the Bill, and every one of the noble Lord's prophecies has been implicitly fulfilled. But after Lord Herschell, Lord Carnarvon rose to call attention to the subject matter of the Bill, and he said—

“Your Lordships will remember that about April or May last year there appeared in the Times a series of charges which were followed up by the publication of a letter in fac simile of Mr. Parnell's writing. Such a charge happily had never been made before, and such a charge had never been attempted to be substantiated in the same way.”

Then he went on to discuss the reasons for appointing a Commission. He alluded to the fact that it would not be appointed to discuss any ordinary case, but an extraordinary and exceptional case. He said—

“I can conceive nothing so ruinous to the fair fame of the House of Commons as to allow such a charge as this to remain unsettled. Consider what it really means. It means that you have a large section of the House of Commons so condoning and so conniving at the most hideous crimes that they become participators in those crimes. I can only recall two cases in any degree analagous to this state of things in the whole history of the House of Commons. In the beginning of the last century you had a large Jacobite Party in the House of Commons. There were many serious and grave charges levelled against them, and history has failed to clear up many points. They were pledged to upset, if they could, the present dynasty. They plotted with outside opponents of the existing state of things, and grave charges were brought against them. But I venture to think none of those charges were so grave as that with which we have to deal at the present moment."

What does he mean but the charge of murder? I am sure the right hon. Gentleman who gave us an exaggerated statement of the doings of the Clan-na-Gael will admit that the charges are graver than those against the Jacobite Party. Lord Carnarvon went on:—

"At the close of the same century, there was a Party in the House of Commons who sympathised warmly with the French Revolution, and whose language carried them to the extreme verge of disloyalty to the Crown and the country. But no one ever brought such a charge against them as has been repeatedly and unequivocally levelled against the followers of Mr. Parnell."

What did he mean by that? He was dealing with the charge of murder, and nothing else. Now my argument is this, that the real purpose for which the Commission was constituted—I think it was an un-Constitutional tribunal; I think it was an unfortunate tribunal—but the real object for which it was constituted was to find out whether there was any truth in the fact that the Irish Members were knowingly guilty of complicity with murder, and every one of the charges has been proved to be absolutely worthless and baseless. The Irish Members are acquitted of complicity with murder, of a knowledge of the Phoenix Park murder, and of associating with known murderers, of providing money to allow criminals to escape from justice; and if this is so then it justifies the position we take up, that the main object of the Commission being to find out whether they were guilty or not guilty, and those hon. Members having been pronounced to be not guilty, it is the duty of the House specially to record, in the language of the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian, what the House thinks of such charges, falsely and foully made against the Irish Members without a tittle of evidence to support them, and which ought not to have been made or listened to for a moment. The First Lord of the Treasury said that the House is precluded by the terms of the Act from inflicting any criminal penalties, or indeed any penalty whatever, on the incriminated persons. But I ask the right hon. Gentleman, as Guardian of the House of Commons, himself a man of spotless honour and integrity, whether, if the Judges had found those men guilty of murder, if they had found that the hon. Member for Cork knew of the Phoenix Park murder, he would have abstained from moving his expulsion from the House. If the right hon. Gentleman omitted to perform this duty, then I can tell him that we on these Benches would have done it. And no technical objection ought to stand in the way of the House of Commons vindicating its own fair fame and character. What are the other charges? The Home Secretary has gone through them, but there is nothing new in them. Those who remember the memorable evening when Mr. Forster, standing where the noble Lord the Member for Paddington now sits, made his tremendous speech, will come to the conclusion that there is nothing in the Report of a graver character than was uttered by Mr. Forster at that time. The worst charges which Mr. Forster made, how have they been dealt with by the Judges? The Judges have found that the Irish Members are innocent of them. I remember that one of the first things I heard on coming into the House was a speech from a right hon. Gentleman now sitting opposite, the First Commissioner of Works (Mr. Plunket), and I am sorry that now we seldom hear that accomplished oratory we all admire so much. I remember the First Commissioner of Works denouncing with tremendous force, and with his almost inimitable rhetoric, the whole Plan and Campaign of the Irish League. He dwelt on the points which the Home Secretary has been dwelling upon to-night; but the House of Commons is familiar with all this; there is nothing new about it. The House of Commons knows this thing as it knows its multiplication table. We remember the "leper" speech, in which the hon. Member for Cork said that if a man committed any offence as a land-grabber he should be treated as a leper. There is, I think, hardly a debate in 1881 and 1883 in which that "leper" speech is not quoted over and over again. So far as these things are concerned, there is nothing new. But, before dealing with the main part of the charge, I want to refer to what the Home Secretary has said, first upon the law of conspiracy, and, secondly, upon the Clan-na-Gael. The Home Secretary said—

“It is true these hon. Gentlemen did not incite to murder, but they made speeches which caused murder, and knowing that murder would be the result, they are responsible;”

and he gave us these illustrations—

“If,” he said, “I know a bridge is rotten and I send a person over the bridge, and he loses his life, or if I know a dish is poisoned and I invite a man to partake of it and he loses his life, I am responsible. And so in like manner hon. Members are responsible for the crime which followed their speeches.”

True, if they knew that crime would follow their speeches; but the Judges say they did not know it. They say that the charges have not been substantiated, that no proof has been given, and that they do not believe that there was any intention on the part of the respondents, or any of them, to procure murder; and, further, that those who used the most dangerous language did not intend to cause murder. Therefore, the charge of constructive murder and constructive knowledge of murder goes to the winds. Then, as to the Clan-na-Gael, I recognise the zeal and impartiality with which the Judges discharged their difficult duties, and the Report, as a whole, is a signal monument of the uprightness of English Judges. But the Attorney General and the right hon. Gentleman know that nothing is more usual than to move for a new trial on the ground of misdirection or mistake in point of law, or, where a Judge is sitting without a jury, on the ground that the decision is wrong. Now, the whole of the Clan-na-Gael case, as I understand it, depends on the evidence of Le Caron, or rather the man Beach. The learned Judges believed Le Caron. With all respect for them, I do not believe him; and if I had been sitting on a jury and Le Caron had been brought forward as a witness, I would have rejected his evidence. I do not believe there is a single Judge on the Bench, including the three Commissioners, who would have directed a jury to find a man guilty of a capital offence on Le Caron's evidence. Le Caron was, by his own admission, a perjurer. He made one statement about the hon. Member for Cork so preposterous, absurd, and ridiculous that any person who has the slightest knowledge of the hon. Member for Cork would reject that statement.

He said that in the Lobby of this House the hon. Member for Cork told him—a perfect stranger just arrived from America—that he did not see any reason why a successful insurrectionary movement could not be inaugurated in Ireland, as they would soon have £100,000 in the Land League funds! Well, I have heard many charges brought against the hon. Member for Cork, but I never heard any man call him a fool, and he would certainly have been worse than a fool or a lunatic outside Bedlam if he had made any such statement. No, I reject that as the invention of a liar; I reject it all the more as Le Caron admitted that he had committed perjury on various occasions. What is the real point of the case? It is that there was boycotting and that there was intimidation. The Judges have found that the hon. Member for Cork and his allies have been guilty of boycotting of a severe and drastic character. I do not question that finding at all. I believe, under the instrumentality of the Land League and the working of the scheme, there has been boycotting. I never heard hon. Members below the Gangway deny that there was boycotting or that there were other crimes besides boycotting. There was agrarian crime. If you go back into the history of Ireland for the last 30 or 40 years, you will find that agrarian crime was prevalent; you will find instances by the hundred. There was agrarian crime during the famine and whenever there were evictions. But the Judges did not touch upon that point. They did not find whether there was any cause for boycotting or agrarian crime. It was very much as if, after a great railway accident, an inspector should be sent down to ascertain whether there was an accident and how many were killed, but he was not to inquire into the cause of the accident, into the working of the line, or the quality of the materials used. It was an essential part of an inquiry into agrarian crime, to inquire also what were the causes; and so it was an essential part of the inquiry into boycotting to inquire into its causes. The Home Secretary told us that the Judges had found that agrarian crime followed boycotting. But anyone who knows Ireland must know that the figures they gave are absolutely worthless. The Judges carried their inquiry down only to 1879. I do not know whether that was by arrangement of counsel on both sides; I understand that it was by arrangement that they terminated their inquiry at 1886. Here is a statement I will give to the House "In 1879, again, there is another famine. In that year the country was paying £1,001,888 in taxes for the support of its poor, against £523,000 20 years before. It was paying £117,275 in outdoor relief alone, against £3,239 in 1859. According to the Local Government Report, the number of poor actually in the Workhouses reached 59,870 in February, 1880 the highest number during the famine of 1846 having been 51,302. In the spring of 1880, there was the enormous number of 117,454 persons receiving relief at the expense of the taxpayers, many of the latter themselves being little removed above the necessities of relief."

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): What is the hon. Member quoting from?

MR. H. H. FOWLER. From Mr J. A. Fox's book. Let us think of the half a million of people who, in two years, perished miserably in the Workhouses or on the wayside—more than have fallen by the sword in any of our wars; let us think of the crop of horrors which is now growing up in Ireland, the disastrous fruit of which may be gathered in years to come! One whose absence we all deplore, the noble Lord the Member for Rosendale, dealing in 1883 with the Conservative attacks upon him for this lawless agitation, which they said the Government ought to put down, said—

"Lawless agitation was brought prominently forward; but had there been nothing in Ireland in the past two or three years but lawless agitation? Were there no grievances, no confiscations of the tenants' improvements, no evictions for impossible rents? Was there no general opinion, not only among the disaffected as well as the most respectable classes in Ireland, that judicial interference in some shape was required to settle the relations between the landlords and the tenants? The evidence of this opinion did not rest only on the Report of Lord Bessborough's Commission, but on the Report of the Agricultural Commission, the Duke of Richmond's Commission, and on the opinion of almost every person entitled to speak with authority on the affairs of Ireland."

Lord Hartington says that in 1883 there were causes for agitation. The Judges say—

"It is not our business to inquire, it is not our duty."

And they are right. Mr. Take, who is an impartial witness, writing in 1880, says

"In South Mayo, from Westport eastward, the chief landlords are nearly all non-residents
Mr. H. H. Fowler

—five or more—whose total rentals taken out of the country cannot be less than £80,000 a year. . . . It is in South Mayo that the great seat of disturbance exists, and where, as I have noticed, the largest body of police is quartered, and where there are many men who dare not stir out of their houses without their escorts."

I will not multiply illustrations. There was a great deal we ought to condemn, regret, and deplore. But behind these acts there was something far worse there was the worst land system of Europe, under which the property of the tenants was confiscated and the tenants evicted. The people were put into a state of constant antagonism to the law; and can you wonder that they refused to become informers to assist the law? The landlords of Ireland neglected the rule that property has its duties as well as its rights. The Home Secretary referred to the observation of my right hon. Friend (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) that great reforming and political movements are accompanied by crime. He said the doctrine was odious, detestable, dangerous, and disastrous. Let us look a little into English History. I should like to ask my right hon. Friend, who I suppose is the only man in this House who remembers, whether there was not crime connected with the agitation for the Reform Bill? Was not Bristol in flames, and Nottingham in flames? Was there not immense destruction of property? Did not the men of Birmingham threaten to march on London? Was there not a correspondence perhaps some day it will come out with Joe Parker, of Birmingham, afterwards rewarded by a post in Chancery, and who in after years wrote on the authorship of the Letters of Junius? Was there not correspondence between the responsible Ministers of the Crown and the organisers of the Birmingham Unions with reference to the carrying of the Reform Bill? We are told that a great many of the tenants will not pay the landlords' rents. I am sure the Home Secretary, with his high Constitutional opinions, will say that the Queen's taxes come before rent. What were the placards in London?—"No taxes paid here until the Bill is passed." I find in Roebuck's History of the Whig Ministry, that when the tax gatherer called, not on Radical agitators in Birmingham, not upon one of the despised Members of the Irish Party, but upon the heir to the great Earldom of Fitzwilliam, Lord Milton "requested the tax gatherer to call again because he was not certain that circumstances might not arise which would oblige him to resist their payment." And the Tory Members came down in those days, as now, and asked the noble Lord if he admitted the truth of the statement. "Certainly," said Lord Milton; and in the presence of the House of Commons he declared that he would not pay the tax. I am not defending any one of these things. I say they are part of the history of the country. It is all nonsense to attempt to separate this political movement from other political movements. It is wrong, I know—I agree with the Home Secretary that it is odious, it is dangerous, and sometimes disastrous—that Governments and Parliaments will not concede to reason what they do concede to revolution. But the men who are responsible for revolutions are not the men who rise; they are the men of the obstinate, stupid, hard-hearted, hard-headed Governments who say non possumus to everything, and resist, resist, resist until resistance is too late. You talk about taxes. I will give you an illustration. During the agitation for the great Reform Bill, the then Lord Chancellor had a young brother, subsequently Lord Brougham, who went to Southwark in London. He said—

"Something has been said about not paying taxes. A resolution to that effect would be highly illegal. People may individually refuse without rendering themselves amenable to the law."

I am afraid the Home Secretary would call that constructive conspiracy. This is a great dignitary speaking. He says—

"If the tax gatherer calls upon me and asks you to settle his little bill for taxes, I may say to him in reply, 'I have got a little bill of my own which I should like to have settled by gentlemen down at Westminster, and who owe it me, and unless that little bill of mine be satisfactorily settled, you must never expect me to settle this.'"

Sir, there were men in those days, like the Home Secretary and the Attorney General, who were very angry with this tampering with the law. And in the last debate which took place in this House on the Reform Bill, one of the most distinguished Members of the Tory Party, Mr. Mackworth Praed, said—

"When the means by which recent events have been accomplished are stated there will be no blacker page than that which records the passing of this Bill in our history."

I commend that language to the Home Secretary. Can there be anything stronger? "No blacker page" even than all these charges about the Clan-na-Gael and the Land League agitation. It was an agitation in which the whole of the leaders of the Whig Party, and nearly half the aristocracy of the country, were involved, and the country was within 24 hours of revolution. Another illustration occurs to me with reference to the Corn Laws. Hon. Members may, perhaps, not be aware that Sir James Graham, then Home Secretary, sent down a Commission to Manchester to see whether he could not prosecute Cobden and Bright. He saw the folly of attempting a prosecution. In the presence of my illustrious Colleague and his true and legitimate heir, I say that the most memorable thing Sir Robert Peel ever did was, not the abolition of the Corn Laws, in reference to which he said—

"Hereafter my name will be associated with the untaxed food of the people," was not the breaking up of a party—for no great movement has ever yet been gained without breaking up a party—but the greatest thing Sir Robert Peel ever did was, after hearing Cobden make his speech, and Sidney Herbert come up and asked him to answer it, to say—"That speech is unanswerable." It convinced his reason and his judgment, and he achieved the highest statesmanship and highest patriotism in carrying out that great measure, which, if it had not been passed, would have caused bloodshed and turmoil in the country. But how have we dealt with Ireland? The Home Secretary speaks of the odious, detestable, dangerous, and disastrous results of my right hon. Friend with reference to the Crimes Act. I was not a Member of the Cabinet of 1881. I do not know what induced them to bring in that measure; but, if my recollection serves me right, the Duke of Argyll left that Cabinet because that Irish Land legislation constituted no part of the programme of that Cabinet when it was formed. But I will take a cautious statesman from either House. I will take, first, the Chairman of Committees in this House. He said—

“Speaking broadly, nothing has been done in justice to Ireland, simply because she demanded it. Successive steps of justice have been taken. Why? Because we could no longer resist.”

Then, what did Lord Derby, not a man likely to give way to what the Home Secretary calls an odious and detestable doctrine, say?—

“Fixity of tenure in Ireland is the direct result of two causes—Irish outrage and Party obstruction.”

Lord Derby is not defending outrage and Party obstruction; he is simply making a philosophic statement of fact. Any man who sat in this House in 1880 knows as well as I know that if it had not been for Irish agitation and Irish outrage, we should never have had the Irish Land Act. I say, in passing judgment upon Irish Members, the Government should bear in mind not only what they have done, but they should also recollect the circumstances in which they are placed. The Judges did not inquire whether the acts were palliated. If anyone will read the history of Ireland, the story of her agrarian life, I think they will find that if anything will palliate even the most serious crime, it is to be found in that history. Condemn the Irish Members if you like for being associated with the National League, condemn them for boycotting, for their foolish speeches, and all the nonsense which they have spoken and written, yet they can point to the Land Act of 1881, to Lord Ashbourne's Act, 1885, to the Arrears Act, 1882, and to your Land Act of 1887 as triumphs they have achieved. You may enter upon the Journals of this House, I have no doubt you will with your majority, the Report which you believe is condemnatory of them, but as long as those Journals retain, as they will retain, the fact of those great measures, Irish Members will have something to point to in those Journals calling for the gratitude of their country, and which will far outweigh any censure by a Party majority of this House.

(6.29.) MR. ELLIOTT LEES (Oldham): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words upon the Report and upon the propositions to which I am asked to give my consent. I find my consent is asked by the leader of this House to the adoption of this Report; and I am asked by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Gladstone) to express my reprobation of these false charges brought against the hon. Member for Cork. By the hon. Baronet I am asked to deplore the guilt which has been brought home to several Members of this House in connection with conspiracy and criminal conspiracy. I should like, if I were able, to adopt every one of these propositions. I should like to adopt the Report, and I should also, by my vote, like to adopt the view of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who expresses satisfaction that the charge against the hon. Member for Cork has been disproved. I should further like to assent to the proposition of the hon. Baronet opposite that we should thank the Commissioners for the zeal with which they have discharged their duty. But I am placed in a difficulty. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian is not merely a constructive Amendment. It is also a destructive Amendment. It asks us to leave out the pith of the Resolution moved by the First Lord of the Treasury, and not to adopt the Report of the Commissioners. I think the right hon. Gentleman must have had some inscrutable reason for taking this particular line. He has told us that he is an old Parliamentary hand. We all know that there is no more expert political tactician than the right hon. Gentleman. Well, for some reason or other, he has, by the terms of his Amendment, rendered it impossible for me, agreeing with him as I do, to express that agreement by my vote. I suppose he also had some reason for devoting the greater part of his speech not to the finding of the Commissioners as to the forged letters, but to the task of discrediting the finding of the Commissioners on the other charges submitted to them. Before I go on to those matters, I should like, most fully and most heartily, to express my satisfaction that the most important charge against the hon. Member for Cork has been conclusively disproved by the authority of these three Judges. The charge, I admit, was calumnious and ought never to have been brought. I admit, as fully as any hon. Member opposite could do, the criminal recklessness with which it was brought; and I say that before such a charge was made, every link in the chain of evidence upon which it was founded, ought to have been submitted to the closest scrutiny and to the most careful test. But that was not done. I rejoice that a Member of the greatest Legislative Assembly in the world—I rejoice that a Member of the British House of Commons—has been proved innocent of the charge of having, by proxy, struck knives into the hearts of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke. Years hence, when we look back to the events of the present day, free from private interests, free from prejudices and partialities, I am sure we shall all rejoice that a Member of our own Body has been acquitted of such a charge. I am able to say this, perhaps with the more justification, because from the very first I dissociated myself from the charges that were brought by the Times newspaper. At that time I declared in this House that we ought to consider hon. Members from Ireland innocent until they had been proved guilty. Two years ago, also, I invited hon. Members to assent to the granting of the Commission on the ground that if they could disprove this charge they would produce a great revulsion of feeling in the country. I think we must admit that they did produce a great revulsion of feeling when the charge was disproved, but how did they fritter it away? It is no part of my duty to advise hon. Members as to their political tactics, but never did an important party on an occasion of the very highest importance throw away such an opportunity. I should have thought that hon. Members above the Gangway would have contrived to prevent the opportunity being thrown away. What occurred? Hon. Members came down here naturally in a spirit of triumph and exultation over the dramatic incident which had taken place in the Commission Court when Pigott was proved to be the forger. They exhibited much triumph and exultation. That was of course all right and proper, although perhaps a little moderation might have been more dignified; but when they went on to take a mean revenge by attacking the personal honour of two Gentlemen—the Attorney General and the First Lord of the Treasury, whose personal honour stands as high or higher than that of any other two men in this House—then I think that even those who had sympathised most deeply with hon. Members opposite felt that, after all, they were not men of such delicacy of feeling as that even such attacks as they had been subjected to would have caused them very poignant anguish. I therefore say that hon. Members opposite threw away their chance upon that occasion. Before I pass on to discuss other points contained in the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, I should like to refer to the Amendment of the hon. Baronet opposite, thanking the Commissioners for the zeal which they have displayed. I think we do owe our sincere thanks to the Commissioners for the manner in which they have conducted the inquiry and written their Report. That they are men of ability and integrity goes without saying, because they are English Judges. The right hon. Gentleman opposite has accused them of unconscious partiality, but I submit he had no right whatever to bring such a charge against them. We owe them thanks for the language in which they have drawn up their Report. The document might have been made a triumph of literary skill, or a model of legal learning; but, instead of that, it is couched in language of almost Biblical simplicity, written so that he who runs may read, and every elector can, if he chooses, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest every word of the Report, and form his conclusion as to the finding of the Commission. I now come to the objections raised by the right hon. Gentleman to our adoption of the Report. He asks whether we shall adopt the Report without having read the evidence. But surely our very contention in granting the Commission was that the House of Commons itself was not a Body fitted to inquire into the value of the evidence in cases of this nature, but that it would be better to submit such evidence to three impartial Judges. Upon the verdict of those Judges we are content to rest. It would be impossible for us, without re-trying the whole case, to consider the evidence, because part of the evidence is the manner in which it is given, and the simple perusal of printed evidence might convey an imperfect and wrong idea as to what had passed in the Court. There was one part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech to which I listened with great astonishment. In dealing with that portion of the Report in which the Judges find that certain Members of the Irish Party were guilty of an attempt to separate Ireland from England, he talked about the evils of the Act of Union, which Act, he said, had been productive of great misery to Ireland.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: No, no.

MR. LEES: I am in the recollection of hon. Members.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: If the hon. Gentleman desires, I will refresh his memory. I spoke of the means by which the Act of Union had been procured, and after detailing those means, I said one could not wonder if Irishmen stated that the Act of Union was devoid of moral authority. On the effects of the Act of Union I did not say a single word.

MR. LEES: I entirely accept and welcome the right hon. Gentleman's statement. It seems to me to strengthen my argument, for we have said on our side that the effect of destroying the Act of Union would be to bring about a complete separation of Ireland from this country. We have before us a finding of the Judges that certain Members have worked to bring about that separation, and the right hon. Gentleman simply meets that charge by pointing to the means by which the Act of Union was brought about. Surely the Report shows there has been something more than a mere attempt to destroy the Act of Union—that there has been treason to the Queen, and treason to the United Kingdom; and when I heard the right hon. Gentleman talk about the Act of Union in connection with the finding of the Judges, winding up as he did with one of the finest perorations, I was reminded of the speech which he delivered last summer in this House, and in which he said he hoped that, after a long career spent in the service of the people, he had not forgotten the duty he owed to the Crown. He illustrated his contention by alluding to the behaviour of the Roman Catholics in the time of Queen Elizabeth, and he reminded us that Roman Catholics then were loyal to the Crown, but did not think it necessary to expose conspiracies entered into by members of their body who were not loyal to the Crown. But is that to justify the conduct of hon. Members opposite in the present day? If so, the Government would be equally justified in dealing with hon. Members in a very curious way, and probably did the methods of the days of Queen Elizabeth still prevail, many of them would make a much closer acquaintance with Tower Green, and even the right hon. Gentleman himself might possibly see something of the small archway which leads from the Thames to the Tower. I refuse altogether to admit that the end can in any way justify the means, although that was really the line of argument which ran through the right hon. Gentleman's speech. According to the right hon. Gentleman, the hon. Member for the City of Cork would have been justified in writing the letter which has been proved to be a forgery; he would have been justified in doing what the right hon. Gentleman has himself described as a vile, cowardly, and hypocritical act—there is no extent of atrocity which you cannot justify by this argument, provided always that you can connect that atrocity with political agitation. The same argument ran through the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton—it was that because a movement was of a political nature, therefore all crime committed by those who professed to follow the leaders of the movement was not to be repudiated or condemned by Members of this House. It is useless to put forward the argument that history has justified such crime and such methods of advancing political opinion. The question is not whether history has justified them; but whether this House is, by refusing to adopt the Report, to signify its approval of such methods? I listened with great interest, and with some emotion, as I suppose other Members did, to the peroration of the right hon. Gentleman last night. He appealed to our consciences; he appealed to us as men to commune with our hearts in the silence of our chambers. He asked us to be guided solely by conscience, and not by political feeling or prejudice. I must admit I have had a great temptation with regard to the vote I shall deliver on this question. I have been tempted to gain a brief notoriety by voting for the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman; and I could have so voted with less inconsistency than many hon. Members on this side, because of the stress which, at the time the Commission was proposed, I laid on the immensity and gravity of that charge against the hon. Member for Cork which has been disproved. Had I yielded to the temptation, I should have been lauded by the ubiquitous Press of hon. Gentlemen opposite. I should have been treated as the one honest hero on the Conservative side of the House; but when I communed with my heart in my chamber, when I appealed to my conscience, I felt that in spite of the gravity of the charge against the hon. Member for Cork, which has been disproved, the crimes of which hon. Members opposite have been found guilty are not crimes which we, as the upright rulers of an honest country, ought to consider trivial or unfit to be condemned.

*(6.55.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): The hon. Member for Oldham seems to be in an uncertain state of mind; and although he has alluded to his conscience, I venture to suggest, with all respect, that he appears to have been striving against the dictates of that conscience. Undoubtedly he was, like the rest of us, much moved by the magnificent speech we heard last night; and what the hon. Member has just said reminds me of the experience of a certain character in Scripture, who trembled when he heard the Apostle speak on righteousness and the judgment to come, but who afterwards, when he communed with his own heart, thought better of it and refused to yield. I am afraid that that has been the experience of the hon. Member. His hesitating speech also reminded me of the saying of another listener to the words of righteousness, "almost thou persuadest me to be a Christian." The hon. Member was almost persuaded to go into the Lobby with us. I wish he had been quite persuaded, for he would thereby have gained not a little brief notoriety, but a just fame for having followed the dictates of conscience in a political controversy. I am afraid that hon. Members have not realised the solemnity of the appeal made to their consciences. But perhaps before this Debate is concluded hon. Members opposite will listen to the voice within, and vote, not as mere politicians, but as gentlemen and as men. The speeches we have heard from those Benches seem to have been intended to work up a feeling of moral indignation for which there are no materials, while the speakers have carefully shirked the elements that exist for explosive indignation against the real crime which has been perpetrated, and of which they dread to speak. What do the charges on which the Irish Members have not been pronounced absolutely innocent amount to? They amount to political indiscretion; to a want of a proper sense of proportion between means and end; to an insufficient apprehension of their responsibility for results which might accrue from the desperation of the Irish people after sufferings for which the National Members had no responsibility whatever, but which have come upon them through the indiscretion of their rulers. Speakers opposite have been challenged to express their indignation by passing some sort of censure or sentence upon the National Members. Through the lips of the leader of the House they make their excuse: he talks of certificates of indemnity which the Royal Commission were authorised to grant, and on this ground he says it would be highly improper for them to pass any sentence upon any Member of the House. But who has asked for a certificate of indemnity? I believe the informers of the Times newspaper have; but I am not aware that any Nationalist Member has. There is no reason given which justifies the inaction of the Government. Then, the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House in the course of his speech referred in feeling terms to one gentleman, not a Member of this House, whose history is in some respects a most tragic one—I allude to Mr. Davitt. The right hon. Gentleman distinguished him—as the Commissioners do—on account of the earnestness with which he personally had endeavoured to "discourage crime." "He is the one man," said the right hon. Gentleman, "who discouraged crime." Yes, Sir; and he is the one man amongst those accused who has suffered most from the savagery and cruelty of our unreasonable laws. This is the man who was condemned to a long period of penal servitude, as if he had committed some atrocious crime. This is the man who, if I remember rightly, was harnessed like a beast to a cart and used as a mere slave. This is the man who is now distinguished even from Members of Parliament as being superior to them on the ground that he discouraged crime; and yet for this man—I know that both parties are to blame—the law could find nothing better years ago than to send him to a felon's prison. What statesmanship is this, I should like to know? Surely this terrible history ought to be a lesson to us. In future, we ought to know better how to deal with the heroes of Irish emancipation. We are told that if Mr. Davitt's advice had been taken much suffering and misery would have been saved to Ireland. With those words I agree; but I make a very different application of them than seems to have been in the mind of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. Mr. Davitt's advice was not given to the tenants only, but to landlords and rulers; and if that advice had been taken by the Government undoubtedly very much suffering and misery would have been saved. But, Sir, there is another branch of the subject in regard to which it seems to me the judgment of the Government is altogether at fault. They do not seem to have observed the testimony contained in the judgment of the Commissioners themselves—undesignedly, I think—to the influence exerted for years past by the hon. Member for Cork and the Land League in favour of constitutional as distinguished from unconstitutional action. The Commissioners insist on beginning the history of the affairs of Ireland from the year 1879, and what was the state of things then? Every one knows that the records of that unfortunate country for many years previous to that time were full of bloodshed, crime, and disorder; there was little, if any, constitutional movement. We have had references to the inseparability of violence from revolutionary movements; but there is one special kind of revolutionary movement which more than any other seems most difficult to keep from connection with crime and disorder, and that is a revolution which affects the land. A very few years ago—in 1886—there appeared a very interesting article in the Contemporary Review, by Mr. R. E. Prothero, on Tenant Right and Agrarian Outrage in France. I have often thought that this article did not obtain sufficient notice, nor has it been allowed to convey sufficient instruction to those who have dealt with agrarian outrages in Ireland. The writer pointed out that in a certain portion of France—in Picardy—there was precisely the same idea of tenant right that had existed in Ireland—there was precisely the same opposition between the law of the land and the notions entertained by tenants and farmers and tenant right, and there was the inevitable conflict between the tenant right on the one hand and the laws of the land on the other—just what we have lamented to see in Ireland, though I, for one, should distribute the blame very differently from Members on the other side of the House. I will quote a passage to illustrate what I mean. Mr. Prothero says—

“No greater insult can be offered to a native of Santerre than to call him by a name which implies that he is a false brother, a traitor to his class. From this moment war is declared. If threats fail, men in masks or with blackened faces sow tares by night with the seeds of the dépointeur, break his implements, destroy his growing crops, mutilate his horses and cattle, burn his ricks, set fire to his buildings, fire shots into his house. Finally, if these hints are disregarded, the dépointeur is found ‘Gis-ant au evin d'un bois, frappé d'une balle dis-crète.’”

A number of instances are given of crimes committed of which the perpetrator could never be discovered. People have been shot in Church without the discovery of the assassin. Why do I allude to these things? Is it from the slightest sympathy with such abominable outrages and crimes? Very far from it. I merely mention these things to show that, human nature being what it is, wherever there is the choice between starvation and crime one can hardly expect that the people will accept starvation. But in Ireland now there is a new spirit. Until comparatively late in this century such disorderly agitation was too much the weapon of conflict in Ireland, and the crude and cruel method of boycotting and other forms of offences against the law have been almost the only method employed. But now how different it is! There are very few signs of such crime. To whom is the credit due? I know that we shall be told that it is due to the action of the Government and the Chief Secretary and to coercion. But does coercion generally ameliorate people's tempers, and conciliate them and persuade them to adopt Constitutional instead of un-Constitutional modes of action? I do not think experience shows that in the past, and I am sure the Report itself shows that a different influence has been at work. Down to 1879 the people of Ireland had very little confidence in political agitation or operation through Parliament. For instance, in the Report I find mentioned speeches of John Devoy and Davitt—for which, in the circumstances, I do not blame them—which show an utter despair of ever emancipating their country as long as it was bound by any link to England. I am not in the least surprised that these gentlemen should have entertained that conviction, looking at what the past history of Ireland has been. Mr. Davitt in one of his speeches in New York, in October, 1878, said—

“Heretofore the National Party has held aloof from the Parliamentary Question, because of the treachery of the men who misrepresented Ireland. Those men have given a wrong impression of the Irish Question to the world. They have given the impression abroad that all that Ireland wanted was a fair Federal Union with the British Empire, a thing that the Irish people will never willingly consent to.”

[“Hear, hear!”] An hon. Gentleman opposite says “hear, hear!” I am trying to show that at that period there was no notion whatever of the possibility of the conciliation of this country. Again, John Devoy said, about the same time—

“This kind of thing has been said to us before, and it will continue to be said so long as we send only two sets of men to Parliament—one to support the present state of things, and the other to proclaim to the world that Ireland would be satisfied with the bastard Federal connection proposed by Isaac Butt.”

We find the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) coming more and more to the front as the leader of his fellow-countrymen, and the Report contains many evidences of the gradual steps by which he at length succeeded in convincing them they had much to hope for from a constitutional agitation. In one of his speeches in America—in 1879—the hon. Member says—

“I am convinced that nothing would more effectually promote the cause of self-government for Ireland than the breaking down of those barriers between different classes. Nothing would be more effectual for that than the obtaining of a good Land Bill—the planting of the people in the soil. If we had the farmers of Ireland the owners of the soil to-morrow we would not be long without getting an Irish Parliament.”

These words indicate the methods by which he desired his fellow-countrymen to proceed. The Land League was formed in October, 1879, and again the hon. Gentleman went to America and delivered speeches. Of course, very much fault may be found with what he said if you do not look forward to the ultimate fruit of the hon. Gentleman's work; but I say that already the germ of a constitutional agitation was suggested in his remarks. He declared that he did not counsel the Americans to send armed expeditions to Ireland; but to prevent the people in Ireland, who were exhibiting an attitude of devotion which had never been surpassed, from being starved to death. In affording help, he said, they would not only engage in an ordinary work of charity, but would assist in breaking down the system which had proved the ruin of Ireland. He added that in one way or another the Irish people would insist on having the land of Ireland for themselves. On the 21st of March, 1880, the hon. Member was presented with an address by the Nationalists of Cork, of Fenian proclivities and opinions. In the course of that address it was stated that the Nationalists of the country had determined that, as a political party, they would take no part in the coming elections, and consequently no part in the adoption, rejection, or support of the Parliamentary candidates. That is to say, they would have nothing to do with Constitutional agitation. Well, where are the people in Ireland who say that now? And what has caused their disappearance? Is it coercion? I do not think it is. I think it is the action of the hon. Member for Cork and his colleagues of the Land League and of the National League. I read in the Report that Mr. Parnell says he always objected to the resolution restraining the employment of Land League funds for Parliamentary purposes, and that it was afterwards rescinded. It was not very long before fruits began to result from the seed the hon. Member for Cork was sowing. We are told, for instance, in the Report that there was a great disturbance at a National League meeting in Dublin; the Physical Force Party drove the speakers from the platform and created a riot. After that, however, the Report says Mr. Parnell was no more opposed by the Physical Force Party. The truth is that he had disposed of that Party altogether by moral influence, and had persuaded his friends to restrict themselves entirely to Constitutional means. The Report says the majority had become convinced by this time that the new movement, so far from being an obstacle to the realisation of their aims, was really a stepping-stone to their fulfilment. The Commissioners, of course, mean that the Physical Force Party expected by means of the agitation to bring about entire separation from England. I daresay they did; but they have learnt better by this time, and purely through the Constitutional action of the hon. Member for Cork. In August of that year a resolution was passed by the Cork branch of the League in reference to a raid for arms. I know that that resolution was afterwards rescinded, and that there was much difference of opinion amongst the members of the Land League as to the propriety of passing a resolution; but, at all events, the incident shows that the tendency in the direction of peaceful agitation was gradually growing up and ripening. The resolution expressed regret at a robbery of useless old firearms, and condemned lawlessness in any shape. It was rescinded not out of any sympathy with robbery, but because it was thought it was no part of the province of the League to condemn a thing which some members of the League reprobated, but which might appear right in the eyes of others. I note that it is stated in the Report that certain extracts called "Incidents of the Campaign," that appeared in one of the more notorious newspapers, were brought to an end expressly on the ground that they were not pleasing to Mr. Parnell, who did not like paragraphs that seemed to incite men to violence. After the year 1883 all forms of violence gradually disappeared, and little by little the movement was changed into the constitutional agitation we now see, and which is very rarely indeed polluted by any form of disorder. I think, Sir, we ought all to rejoice at this, and ought to do all we can to convince our Irish fellow-countrymen that membership of this United Kingdom is for their good, and that they are likely to get far more by going on with us than by separating from us. Is everything to be looked at from the landlord's point of view? Are we to go on insisting that, while public opinion rules in England and Scotland, Irish public opinion is not to be allowed to rule in Ireland; and are we to go on insisting that while in England the opinion of the Democracy is to be taken, in Ireland it is only the opinion of a privileged class which is to be considered worthy of consideration? I think that no worse contempt could be shown for the Irish people than to enter upon the Journals of the House a Report of this kind; for the Commissioners expressly disavow entering into any political considerations whatever, and refrain from saying any word of reprobation or condemnation of that most foul crime which was the beginning of the action of the House in regard to the Royal Commission. Not enough has been said, not enough can be said, of the iniquity of the libels and the slanders that were supported by forgery. I declare that, after looking at all the records of the history of this country, I do not know anything fouler than the criminal carelessness with which those wicked forgeries were accepted—accepted, as we find, without any kind of reasonable inquiry into their origin, and without any real endeavour to verify them at all. It was thought that even poisoned weapons were good enough against the champions of the Irish people; and, therefore, the forged letters were hastily accepted. I do hope that hon. Gentlemen opposite will still bethink themselves that the individual need not be wholly merged in Party; that the individual has a conscience of his own, to which he must answer sooner or later. It may be all very well now to save their Party from defeat; but when a few years have passed these things will have become matters of history, and hon. Gentlemen opposite will not look back with pleasure to having taken part in a vote to support this exceedingly lame and impotent conclusion to a most interesting inquiry; whereas if there are anyone on that side who prefers the voice of conscience to that of Party, in years to come he will look back with pride and exultation upon his vote, and to handing down to his children a name all the more honourable as being that of a politician who dared on one occasion, at least, to sacrifice the superficial claims of Party to the profounder claims of conscience and justice.

*(7.35.) COLONEL HILL (Bristol): If I rise, perhaps, at an unfortunate moment, as regards the number of my audience, to say a few words in this debate, I do not do so in the hope of eliciting any fresh facts from the Report for the consideration of the House, nor of adding anything to the powerful criticisms of the Amendment which have been made by my right hon. and hon. Friends, nor yet of making more complete their perfect demolition of the pretensions of the Party below or of their supporters above the Gangway. It is because I think it is not altogether undesirable that private Members, representing, as I have the honour to do, large commercial centres, should briefly, plainly, and clearly state their views upon this much vexed matter. I cannot offer to the House the fervid eloquence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, nor would I, if I could, support the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the leader of the House, by what, in my humble judgment, seems such an unfortunate style of reasoning. But I could not help thinking whilst listening to that marvellous effort of oratory that, great as are the known powers of the hon. Member for Hackney, the respondents had found a still more powerful advocate and apologist in the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian; nor can I offer to the House those special pleadings which are the results of the trained intellects of the hon. and learned Members who have addressed the House, or will do so in the course of the debate. I can only offer such views as an ordinary intellect and an ordinary business mind can arrive at, and the views which guide me in my resolve to support the Motion and oppose the Amendment. We have heard a great deal about two conspiracies. One is the conspiracy alleged by the Times, against the integrity of the Empire and law and order, and asserted to be closely connected with crime; and the other, retorted by the Separatists (if I may for convenience use the term), a conspiracy between the Government and the Times against the political honour and the morality of the hon. Member for Cork and his Party. As to the latter, three points were relied upon for justification. These were that the Government was supported by the Times; that the Attorney General was counsel for the Times; and it was asserted that sundry special advantages were granted to the agents of the Times. The third assertion has been completely disproved, and I need not trouble the House with any remarks upon it. As to the second, I do not know what are the powers of Her Majesty's Government over the Law Officers of the Crown; but if they have a power of control, surely they must be very poor conspirators, for it is self-evident that the purposes of conspiracy would have been better advanced by the selection of a stranger as counsel. I am under the impression that the humblest member of the community has a right to demand and obtain the services of Her Majesty's Attorney General or Solicitor General, providing he has the money in his pocket to pay their fees; and I do not know why, if that be so, Mr. Walter should be made an exception. But does not the selection by the Times as its counsel of one than whom no one's honour is more unimpeachable, against whom the tongue of slander has never been heard, whose very official position is a guarantee for the exercise of that fairness for which he is distinguished—show a desire for fair and impartial investigation which can hardly be attributed to conspirators? I think, too, it will be admitted on all sides that the Times acted with great fairness in giving minute verbatim reports of the inquiry. We hear much about forged letters and foul conspiracy. It has been insinuated that the Government and the Times knew that these letters were forgeries. Hon. Members opposite are always ready, both in season and out of season, to shout "Pigott" and "forgeries." [IRISH MEMBERS: Hear, hear!] Yes; but they do not seem always to recollect that the wretched man who forged these letters was for years one of themselves. ["No, never."] Well, if not one of themselves—he was not a Member of this House it is true—I believe I am correct in stating that for many years he was connected with the Nationalist Press. [Colonel NOLAN: Not with the Home Rule movement.] No doubt the publication and subsequent withdrawal of the letters, together with the finding of the Judges, is a point in favour of the respondents, and it is a point on which I certainly congratulate them; but I cannot help thinking that under all the circumstances, perhaps the result had better have been received with more of calmness. To suppose that the Government had anything to do with the letters, or that the Times published them otherwise than in perfect good faith, is against the presumption of common-sense. Carelessness on the part of the Times there undoubtedly was—a carelessness which we all deplore, while at the same time we all regret the pain caused to the hon. Member for Cork by that carelessness. But the attributes of a foul conspiracy are certainly absent. I never heard of a conspiracy for which there was not some motive. What could have been the motive of the Times in publishing the articles other than the patriotic one of laying bare certain sayings and doings, which, in their opinion, seemed to be detrimental to the interests of the State? As to the Government receiving the support of the Times, that is a point too puerile for serious argument. An unprejudiced mind can come to but one conclusion—that no such conspiracy, with or without Her Majesty's Government, ever existed. But what about the other conspiracy? Three of Her Majesty's most able Judges have, upon sworn evidence, declared that while on some points the respondents have been acquitted a conspiracy did exist, and that eight of the respondents, including seven who are Members of the House of Commons, were guilty of taking part in that conspiracy; that the whole 65 respondents were guilty of conspiracy to expel the landlords from Ireland, significantly styled the English garrison; guilty of inciting to intimidation, which led to crime; guilty of continuing that course after they knew that it led to crime; guilty of defending prisoners charged with crime, and of supporting the families of criminals; guilty of disseminating the abominable Irish World and other papers inciting to sedition and other crimes; guilty of receiving money from dynamitards and advocates of crime; guilty of inviting and obtaining the assistance and co-operation of the Physical Force Party, including the infamous—I do not think the adjective was too strong—Clan-na-Gael; guilty of abstaining from repudiating and condemning the action of that Party in order to obtain their assistance. But, Sir, there is something more. We have the admission of the hon. Member for Cork that upon one occasion he stated to the House that which was inaccurate for the purpose of misleading it. I do not think it is right for a Member to make such a statement without giving the grounds on which he makes it; and therefore I must read one or two extracts from the Report, and from the evidence given before the Commission. In page 87 of their Report the Commissioners said—

“Mr. Parnell, in the House of Commons, on January 7, 1881, stated that secret societies had then ceased to exist in Ireland. Mr. Parnell was then alluding to secret societies other than that of the Fenian conspiracy, and in our judgment Mr. Parnell was accurate when he made that statement. It appears to us that this suggestion was first made during this inquiry.”

Now, it will be recollected that the late Mr. Forster and the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) were at that time supporting their Bill by asserting the existence of secret societies. The hon. Member for Cork was opposing the Bill and denied the allegation. But when the catalogue of crimes was brought forward before the Royal Commission the hon. Member's policy became reversed, and it became expedient to relieve the Land League by throwing the responsibility upon secret societies. A quotation was read from Hansard, ending with—and the hon. Member was asked—

“Do you remember using these words?”—
“Yes; I recollect it personally.”

I suppose it is meant for “perfectly.” The examination continued—

“Did you believe them to be true when you used them?—I cannot exactly say, without reading the context of the speech, what my view was in urging the argument, but it was possible I was endeavouring to mislead the House on the occasion.

Do you mean, Sir, it is possible you were endeavouring to mislead the House on that occasion?—In order to cut the ground from under the Government in support of the Bill.

Do you mean, Sir, by a statement false, in fact, and contrary to your own opinion which you have sworn to-day?—I mean that it was a boastful and an exaggerated statement, and probably designed to mislead the House upon the question of the greater or less existence of secret societies in Ireland.

Did you or did you not intend to mis-state the fact when you made that statement to the House?—It is very possible that I did.

Deliberately?—Deliberately; quite possible.”

How it can be “very possible” and “quite possible” for a man of honour to say that which he believes to be inaccurate for the purpose of deliberately endeavouring to mislead the House is a question which I leave to the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian to explain. It is a task far beyond my powers, and one which I think will overtax even the great intellect of the right hon. Gentleman. This is a matter which should not be passed over in silence, for it goes to the root of all public life. Now, what were the charges made by the Times as stated by the Commissioners in the first page of their Report? They say:—

“In times not yet remote they would assuredly have been impeached for one tithe of their avowed defiance of the law, and in ages yet more robustly conscious of the difference between evil and good their heads would have decorated the city gates.

“In particular, Mr. Parnell and his associates were accused of having established an organisation ‘depending upon a system of intimidation carried out by the most brutal means and resting ultimately on the sanction of murder.’”

The more I study the lucid Report of the Commissioners the more am I confirmed in my view that the main charges brought by the Times, as distinguished from the personal, have been proved up to the hilt. There can be no doubt that a most serious verdict has been returned—a verdict which is as damaging as the worst enemies of the respondents could possibly have desired. The country is but little concerned with the mere question of the forged letters; what it wants to know is this: was Parnellism connected with crime or was it not? Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen now on the opposite side of the House, many of whom formerly held high office, and, therefore, had special sources of knowledge at their command, have assured the public in language which for strength and earnestness has never been exceeded or equalled on my own side of the House, that it was so connected, and now we have the official corroboration of the Judges. I shall, indeed, be more than surprised if my countrymen do not justly appreciate the verdict contained in the Report, and are not more than ever determined to set their faces against what is called Home Rule as the greatest disaster that could befall Ireland. I earnestly hope that Irishmen, whether in this House or out of it, who really love their country, will take to heart the Report of the Commission; that they will abandon the idea of separation in any form as a wild theory, the realisation of which will be as injurious to Ireland’s best interests as it will be impossible for this country to permit it. I trust that, having learnt that lesson, they will endeavour to teach it to some of their less instructed brethren, and endeavour to convince them that the happiness and prosperity of their country can only be obtained by the progress of civilisation, the first condition of which is due regard for law and order; that happiness and prosperity for their country could only be obtained by its remaining a faithful and honoured portion of this Empire, the most magnificent the world has ever seen, and which so many eminent sons of Ireland have done so much to build up and to consolidate.

(8.32.) COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I have not very great hopes that the few remarks I am about to address to the House will induce any large number of the Conservatives who at present occupy the Benches opposite (the Conservative Benches were absolutely empty) to do an act of justice to the Irish people. But I must not complain of the absence of hon. Members, for I noticed when a Conservative Member was addressing the House just now there were, beyond two or three Members of the Party who by reason of their official position are bound to be present, only two Conservatives seated on those Benches, and although when the Division comes we shall get about 320 Conservatives and Unionists voting against us, of those only two will have heard the excellent speech of the hon. and gallant Member for Bristol. The hon. Gentleman made a most effective Party speech, although he somewhat spoilt it by one of those appeals which have been too frequently made in this debate—an appeal to hon. Members to vote for principle and not for Party. I remember that Disraeli, when a Member of the Party opposed to him made a similar appeal, and declared the subject under discussion not to be a Party question, replied that he—

“Was too old a Parliamentary bird to be caught by the chaff; it was very much a Party question, and the Government were very much affected by it; and, therefore, it was necessary for the Conservatives to vote straight.”

This, too, I believe to be a Party question, and I am rather curious as to the votes which will be given by two Conservative Members, who did me the honour of congratulating me when the Report of the Parnell Commission first appeared. I am glad to see the Attorney General is now in his place, for I wish to say something as to his taking a brief and leading the prosecution against a large body of Irish Members. I know it is in accordance with professional usage that the Attorney General should take briefs in private cases, and that much is to be said in favour of it, seeing that it keeps him in touch with the general work of the Bar. But I viewed his action in taking a brief in this case with very great regret, for it reminded me of a story of William I., the Duke of Normandy, who, when he was summoned to appear before the King of France (of whom he was a vassal) for some misconduct on the part of his subjects, replied that, unfortunately, the Duke of Normandy could not go to Paris unless the King of England went too, and the King of England would be obliged to bring so many retainers that it might prove unpleasant for the people of France. The misfortune of the action of the hon. and learned Member for the Isle of Wight was that he could not take part in the case for the Times without introducing the Attorney General as well. In fact, as the legal heads of the Conservative and Unionist Party have taken part in the case, they have implicated the whole Party in a manner which must induce a lot of ill-feeling between men of Irish blood and the Conservative majority in this House. I do not think the people of England approve the action of the Government; indeed, recent election returns show that they are opposed to the Government policy. The Conservative Members, I am afraid, will vote on this matter in accordance with the instructions of their Whips. Before the First Lord of the Treasury put his notice of Motion on the Paper I found Conservative Members were in a reasonable state of mind. On the night the Report was issued one hon. Member told me it amounted to a virtual acquittal, while another—and he was a learned man—said—“What the Judges have done has been to find that the Irish Members did what every single soul in the United Kingdom knew they had done; they have found out nothing fresh.” I was always against the appointment of the Commission. I held that the only result would be the keeping up of bad blood between the two countries. When it was started I thought a certain amount of mud would be thrown, that it would be shown that certain speeches had been delivered, and a certain amount of crime committed; as to the letters, I was quite convinced that they were absolute forgeries, but I never hoped we should be able to prove it so clearly as we have done; I never expected we should have laid our hands on the forger, although, if I had known Pigott was associated with the matter, I should have expected something of the sort. But I did expect the Commission would have had to fall back on a general indictment that there was some connection between the speeches delivered and the crimes committed. The Judges have not gone into the question in a very statistical form. Let us take the crime of murder, for instance. In England there are fewer murders committed than in most countries in Europe; but in Ireland there are still fewer, in comparison with the population, and there have been a lesser number during the past 10 years than there were in the preceding decade. Unfortunately, murders are committed, and they group themselves about popular movements, and if the Attorney General went to the North of Ireland to get up an agitation in favour of the imprisonment of the Nationalist Members, and riots followed in which fatalities occurred, we should at once attribute the deaths to his action, although his speech might have been a perfectly constitutional one. In that sense, no doubt, there was some connection between our speeches and Irish crime. Now we have to deal with two important propositions. The First Lord of the Treasury asks the House to adopt the Report. But has this House a right to adopt the Report? The Irish Members charged before the Commission practically represent in this House the whole of the Irish people, and the indictment which was preferred against them, was against not merely Irishmen in Ireland, but against Irishmen throughout the world. The Irish people constitute an important element in Australia and Canada, and in the Republic of the United States, and they will ask why should this Report be entered on the Journals of the House? There are several reasons against the adoption of this course. The first is that the House of Commons was not elected for the purpose. Of course if Lord Salisbury went to the country and returned with a majority at his back, then the adoption of the Report would be the act of the English nation; but the Government have now only an accidental majority, the bye elections go against them and prove that their majority is only a fictitious one. If, then, you have this Report entered on the Journals of the House, the next Parliament may feel it its duty to order the entry to be expunged, and that, I think, would be neither a pleasant nor a dignified course for the House to have to adopt. We have also before us the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, which, unlike the Resolution of the Government, has in it a sense of proportion and looks at the real points of the case. Remember it was the forged letter question which procured the appointment of the Commission. The Irish Members would never have consented to the appointment of the Commission but for the appearance of the forged letters in the Times, which was a great power in the land, and had, for the preceding half century, had almost as much power as the House of Commons itself. Its power has now been considerably shaken. It pledged its reputation and everything it had to the authenticity of the letters, and that was the main point referred to the Commissioners. Englishmen and Irishmen differ considerably in their feeling on national matters. Englishmen are of course imbued with a strong national feeling; they are a somewhat proud race, and they are to an extent intolerant of outside interference of any kind whatsoever. But the case is different in Ireland. We consider the Irish-Americans as part of ourselves. The great majority of Irishmen are anxious for peaceful and Constitutional methods to be adopted. We knew, when the Commission was appointed, that our opponents would make the most of the American connection. I am not one of those who repudiate that connection; I am proud of the success of our fellow countrymen in America. We knew that in the minds of Englishmen there would be great impatience at the idea of Americans interfering with Irish politics, but it is impossible to keep them out of it, and the Irish Americans cannot help feeling deep interest in the fortunes of their country. The hon. Member for Oldham says he is much concerned for the honour and probity of this House, and yet I am afraid he will cast his vote against us. He admitted we had cleared ourselves from the charge of complicity with murder, but he complained that we had shown a certain want of delicacy of feeling in attacking the public acts of the Attorney General and the First Lord of the Treasury, and he said that he must consequently vote against us. Yet those attacks were only made in self defence. My main objection to the Motion of the First Lord is that it gives no prominence to the question of the forged letters. Because we have completely disproved that charge we are now to be attacked on general grounds. The leader of the Opposition has, in his Amendment, supplied the omission of which I complain, and those who listened to his speech last night must have felt that he thoroughly justified his proposal. May I make a suggestion to the First Lord of the Treasury? Will he not, of his own accord, if the Amendment of the leader of the Opposition is defeated, introduce into his Resolution a reference to the forged letters, because the simple adoption of the Report would be most unfair without such a reference. Hon. Members desire further that the Judges should be thanked for their services. Of course we know that they took a good deal of trouble, but the way to reward them is not by drawing up an indictment against the Irish nation in the Resolution; it would be far better to make them baronets, or peers, or to promote them in their profession. But, certainly, the entering of the reference to the Report in an extremely unfair form in the Order Book of the House is not the proper way of producing good feeling in the matter between the Conservative section of the English race and the Irish people who are now distributed over the four quarters of the globe.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, N.W.): I am anxious to say a few words on what I consider to be one of the most important questions that has been brought before this House and the country during the present century. No one will deny the gravity of the question we are now considering. The Report of the Commission brings charges against hon. Members below the Gangway opposite, and I venture to say that every fair minded man will seriously consider whether these charges have been proved, and if so, I do not think that even Members opposite will say the Report of the Judges ought not to be entered in the Journals of the House. I, for one, have condemned as strongly as any man, the letters which have been referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and I took the earliest opportunity of showing what was my feeling in regard to them. I care not who may have been the author of those letters, but it has been clearly proved that they were forgeries, and therefore, I would join with anyone in stating my gratification that the hon. Member who was charged with having written them has been fully exonerated from that accusation. I have never altered my opinion with regard to Ireland and the action of hon. Members below the Gangway. I have stated them fairly and freely, and when I have thought that my hon. Friends on the Front Bench have been doing what they ought not to do, I have never failed to declare my opinion both in this House and outside the House. The question before us is a very grave one. It implies that although the hon. Gentlemen have not been convicted of complicity with the more serious crimes of murder and outrage, yet it is to be inferred from this Report that they have been guilty of things which have led to the commission of crime. I was never more astounded than upon hearing the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian and also the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) contend that hon. Members were right in urging the Irish people to do certain things if they were in the interests of their country. This, as far as I know, is the first time in our history that we have heard right hon. Gentlemen in the exalted position of the Members for Mid Lothian and Wolverhampton saying they were prepared to regard crime as justifiable when it accomplishes the object for which it is committed. [Cries of "No!"] Hon. Gentlemen say no! I listened most attentively to the magnificent speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and eloquent as it was, especially in the peroration, I must say that I never heard a speech which more completely covered what I may term veiled treason than the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. No one can better judge of those things than the hon. Members below the Gangway. They knew exactly what was their position a short time ago. Let me look for a moment at the position occupied by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell). As I have said, I am delighted to recognise his innocence in regard to the letters, but can it be said he was innocent in regard to other matters? Before, however, I would go to that I would ask any man in this House if he had such charges made against him as were made against the hon. Member he would not spend his very last shilling in proving his innocence before a competent tribunal.

*MR. T. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): Not the tribunals of this country.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: It is all very well for the hon. Gentleman to say "not the tribunals of this country." Is there one of them in which justice would not be done? See what the three Judges have done in this particular case. Have they not found out and exposed the fraud that was practised with regard to these particular letters?

*MR. T. HARRINGTON: No; we did it ourselves.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: I say that the Judges discovered that forgery, and with the greatest care and calm consideration went into every case that was put before them, so that there is no one who can now get up and say he was not treated with perfect fairness and impartiality by those learned gentlemen. Why was it that the hon. Member for Cork did not accept the offer made him by the Government, when they were willing that all his expenses should be paid, and that he should have the best Law Officers that could be found to conduct his case. I would ask my hon. Friend opposite whether, had he been placed in the same position, he would not have gone before a Court and endeavoured to clear himself? Why did not the hon. Member for Cork take that course? Was it because there was a feeling that something more might come out than he desired to make public in regard to his connection with certain proceedings in Ireland which would not be to the advantage of the Nationalist cause? Hon. Members asked for a Committee of this House. If there was a man in this House who could have got up and suggested that that would be an unfair and partial tribunal, it would have been the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, who must recollect the debate which took place in which the question was raised in this House as to the trial of election petitions, which used to be decided by Committees of the House. The right hon. Gentleman, in a speech he then made, pointed out that such Committees did not constitute a fair tribunal, because of the Party feeling which was brought into play. I ask would not Party feeling have been brought into play in this question 10 times more than in the case of an election petition? Such being the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman, he was the very first man who ought to have said that a Committee of this House would have been a most unwise and improper tribunal for dealing with this question. I may here say, as I do honestly and openly, that I did not like the Commission which was appointed. I think the Government stood in a sufficiently firm position as they were before. However, the Commission was appointed, and hon. Members opposite did not oppose the Second Reading of the Bill, thereby showing they were perfectly satisfied with the impartiality of the tribunal before whom they were to be arraigned. And if we look at the matter fairly and impartially, I say that there are no three men who, whatever their political opinions may be—and in this country we do not allow politics to interfere with the administration of law and justice—who are more absolutely prepared to do their duty, however difficult that duty may be. Can any one below the Gangway get up and say hon. Members opposite have not been fairly and honestly treated by those three Judges? Never before have men been called upon to judge under such circumstances, and I fully believe that they have done justice to all. They have fairly stated the charges that have not been proved, but they have also recorded those cases in which they think the charges have been substantiated. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) has said everything was legitimate so long as the ends were good. I do not quote his exact words, but that was their purport. I must repeat my regret that two men occupying the position of the right hon. Gentlemen the Members for Mid Lothian and Wolverhampton could have made such a statement as they have put forward in justification of crime where it accomplishes its intended object. I am not going into the history of the whole of this case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian astonished me by his statement with reference to the Act of Union. He designated it by every epithet he could possibly think of. He went on to say that since the year 1882 he had never had occasion to say a single word against those Gentlemen below the Gangway. But in the year 1879, the right hon. Gentleman made a memorable speech in Mid Lothian, in which he called attention to the blowing up of Clerkenwell Prison and the murder of the policeman at Manchester, and held that the Disestablishment and Disendowment of the Church would never have been carried unless attention had been brought to it by means of that kind. The right hon. Gentleman came into power in 1880. He allowed the Peace Preservation Act to lapse. Were you thankful for it? Did you take it, as it was intended, in good faith? You immediately imported arms into Ireland, and as soon as the Act was taken off your heads, you were determined to do something which you knew was against the opinion and wishes of a large majority of your fellow countrymen in England and Scotland, as well as in Ireland, and to such an extent did you carry it out that in 1881-2 the right hon. Gentleman had to bring in the two strongest Coercion Acts that ever were inflicted.

"You have had an opportunity," said Mr. Parnell, at Wexford, in 1881, "many of you, no doubt, of studying the utterances of a very great man, a very great orator—the person who recently desired to impress the world with a great opinion of his philanthropy and hatred of oppression, but who stands to-day the greatest Coercionist, the greatest and most unrivalled slanderer of the Irish nation that ever undertook the task. I refer to William Ewart Gladstone."

I mention these things because these are the people with whom you are now hand and glove. What happened after that? I find that up to the year 1885 the Protection of Life and Property Act existed. Do you recollect the Division which took place in this House upon a trifling Motion with regard to the Budget, and upon which the Government went out? I believe I am correct in stating that the Government went out because there were dissensions and differences of opinion amongst them as to the maintenance of the Protection of Life and Property Act. A Conservative Government was returned in a minority, and I think it was a grave mistake that they did not endeavour to carry out that Act, even if they had been beaten, as they would have been beaten, for it would be shown that they thought it necessary that an Act of that kind should be still maintained in Ireland. What happened after that? Why, we had an election in the autumn. And what was the prayer of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone)? That he would be saved from temptation by having granted to him a majority without having to deal with the Irish Representatives. He did not get that majority, and then came the proposal of Home Rule, which the right hon. Gentleman had never considered before, so far as I am aware. And, mark you, if he had obtained a majority which would have enabled him to do without the Irish Representatives he would never have offered you Home Rule. It was a miraculous alteration. I would like to know what your opinion is with regard to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby. You know what he said about you.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! It would be better if the hon. Baronet would address the Chair, and not so pointedly address any section of the House.

*(9.24.) SIR W. BARTTELOT: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker; one gets perhaps a little excited. I am very sorry if I have transgressed the least in the world. I will just read you one or two passages which show that the conversion is something more than miraculous.

"To-morrow," said Sir William Harcourt, on March 3rd, 1881, "every subject of the Queen will know that the doctrine of the Land League is the doctrine of treason and assassination. Sir, I think it is my duty, and I think the House will think it is my duty to tell them what I know, that the Land League is an organisation which depends upon the support of the Fenian Conspiracy."

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby was in office; he was then Home Secretary, and he states that the doctrine of hon. Gentlemen who were members of the Land League was the doctrine of treason and assassination. He afterwards became Chancellor of the Exchequer, and you will all recollect what he did on the 16th December, 1885, after the election had taken place. He was at a meeting at Lowestoft, and he then said what was going to happen:—

"The Party of 250 Tories in the House of Commons would claim to govern the country and the House of 670 members. That would be a new proceeding in the political history of the country. They proposed to do it by an intimate alliance with men who openly avowed their object was the dismemberment of Ireland from England. Was it possible that this country was going to tolerate such a transaction? Liberals must not be in a hurry to turn the Tories out—he would not say before they were paid out. He would let them have a few months to stew in their own Parnellite juice."

Not a very elegant expression; at the same time that was the statement. I want you to mark it, because if I recollect aright a Division was taken in this House on the 26th January, in the year 1886, and the Conservative Government were turned out upon the question of the hon. Member for Birmingham, namely, "three acres and a cow," or the question of Allotments, which measure was never attempted to be granted by the Liberal Party. Home Rule was brought in, and you know what happened to Home Rule. My particular point is that the right

hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby, having denounced the Conservative Party, and having denounced the Irish Party, in December, 1885, took office as Chancellor of the Exchequer under the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian in February 1886, that all I can say is that looking to his strong opinions and feelings, one would have supposed that he would not have been subservient to Party considerations. I would have said: "I cannot change my opinion, and I cannot take office in a Government which proposes Home Rule." Such was unfortunately not the case. ["Fortunately."] That depends upon what you think of the versatility of a Member. For my part, I stand by the man who adheres to what he believes is right. As hon. Gentlemen know, I had a good deal of experience in older days of these matters. It was my good fortune, or anything else you may be pleased to call it, to be in Limerick at the time when the Old Ireland Party—the O'Connell Party—attacked the Young Ireland Party. There was a great disturbance, and I was ordered to turn out with a squadron of dragoons. I was sharp, and I happened to get down quicker than some others, and I was just in time to save three men, Mitchell, Martin, and Meagher. After that what is called the "Cabbage Garden Disturbance" occurred, and these three men, one of whom afterwards came into this House as a respected Member, were arrested and transported for 15 years. I declare boldly that there was nothing in the journal of which Mitchell was then editor, to compare in scurrility with what now appears in United Ireland, although Mitchell was transported for 15 years for what he wrote, and other things. When you talk of toleration I venture to say that no Press in the world has been more tolerated than the Irish Press has been. If the English papers wrote about you [pointing to the Home Rule Members] as these papers write about Englishmen and the Government of England you would come down at once with a strong, earnest, and just complaint. You know——

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. and gallant Member has misapprehended my meaning. What I suggested was that instead of addressing hon. Members directly he should do so generally as hon. Members in this or that part of the House. In this way he would avoid irritation.

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: I hope I have not said anything to irritate, and I shall endeavour not to do so. I was saying that when you came to write articles in United Ireland, the Government have not been one bit too firm in their action, for you have gone beyond all ordinary forbearance, and have done things which would not have been tolerated in any civilised country in the world. I should like to see such things done in America, Germany, or Italy. You know you have as much license as you could have, and the question before us—and it is a very serious question—is whether you have done——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*SIR W. BARTTELOT: I beg pardon; the question is whether hon Members have acted in the interest of our great Empire? Has everything been done to maintain the integrity of the Empire? Take the condition of the West of Ireland. Is it any better than it was in 1843, when I first went there? Certainly not. The population cannot be properly maintained on the soil, yet hon. Gentlemen opposite have done nothing to remove the population. The hon. Member for Cork talks about migration, but he proposes to migrate a pauper population to the best parts of Ireland; to the County of Meath, for instance, where he would turn the grazing farms into small holdings. I maintain that so far as the condition of the West of Ireland is concerned, nothing has been done for it; and yet it is only wonderful without agitation it remains contented. A relative of mine, who has an estate in the county of Mayo, says that this year he has received his rent, nothing having been forthcoming during the previous four years. He has had not only to lose his rent, but to pay the rates and taxes on all holdings below £4 a year, and on the estate of 264 holdings four only are over £4 a year. Things are better now; but on those estates where the Plan of Campaign is in operation, boycotting and the greatest cruelties have been practised on the people taking farms and on the people paying their rent. Such persecution every honourable man must condemn as against national civilisation and national humanity. And yet the persecution, it is said, has been practised by hon. Members opposite. They are solemnly accused of making speeches, knowing that the consequences of those speeches would be injury to persons and property. Well, I believe that history will show that the Chief Secretary has done his duty honestly, humanely, and well. Up to the time when the right hon. Member for Mid Lothian proposed his scheme for Home Rule, law and order had always been maintained by both sides of the House. But now every difficulty is placed in the way, and the speeches of many hon. Gentlemen on the Opposition Benches have tended more to create the existing state of things in Ireland than anything else. A great deal of responsibility lies at the door of those right hon. and hon. Gentlemen. The Government have now to govern Ireland in the best way they can. Law and order, however, must be upheld, because they are the indispensable factors in the civilisation, progress, and prosperity of every country; and if law and order are firmly, fairly, and honestly maintained, as the Chief Secretary is now upholding them, a lasting beneficial effect would in the end be produced. I heartily support the Motion.

*MR. T. HARRINGTON: Mr. Speaker, while I admit that the hon. Baronet is an exception to hon. Members near him in the spirit of fair play which he exhibits toward the Irish Members, yet I must remind him that the occasions on which he displays that spirit are very rare. The hon. Baronet has said that in no other civilised country in the world would the same toleration have been extended, as has been extended by this country, to the Irish Press. Aye, but has the Irish Press been tolerated? What is the history of the Irish Press? Is there a man in this House who ever conducted an Irish newspaper who has not been once, and sometimes oftener, within the walls of a gaol? The hon. Baronet speaks of Mitchel, Martin, and Meagher. The three were Press men, and the three were imprisoned, and if the Governments of this country have been unable to suppress National opinion in Ireland, it is not because they have tolerated it, but because they have failed to put it down. Every Ministry and Party in this country has endeavoured to stifle the voice of the National Press of Ireland, and if that Press speaks out boldly to-day the national sentiments, we have not to thank this House, but the sturdy independence and the fearlessness and firmness of the men whose speeches and writings are bringing to speedy fruition the cause for which they have laboured. The hon. Baronet tells the House that upon the Report being issued he was among the first to come down to congratulate the hon. Member for Cork upon his acquittal. But the argument of the hon. Baronet this evening is strangely inconsistent with the sincerity of a man who comes to congratulate the hon. Member for Cork on his acquittal, for he asks—"Why did not the hon. Member for Cork appeal to the tribunals of the country? Was it because he feared that something worse would come out?" And yet the hon. Baronet is forced to acknowledge that the Commission has acquitted the Irish Members of those graver charges which his Friends circulated by their speeches and supported by their money—calumnies on which many Members of their Party have lived, and been able to take a part in the government of Ireland for the past two or three years. These expressions of regret of the hon. Baronet came from him just as the verdict of acquittal has come from the Judges—the expressions were forced from him. We owe him nothing for his sense of fair play in this matter; we owe no one anything on that score. If the Party opposite are not able to asperse our characters it is because their malignity has failed in its worst efforts. Before I sit down I think I shall be able to show to the House that Members, at least of the Party to which the hon. Baronet belongs, have not been so clear and innocent of questionable transactions in connection with this Commission as some of their friends claim credit for. I shall be able to show the House that there was a conspiracy, apart from the conspiracy which the Judges had to consider, that that conspiracy progressed as the inquiry progressed, and that Members of the Government especially were involved in it for the purpose of bribing perjured witnesses—not so much to injure the Irish Members or to damage our characters as individuals, for that they did not care about, but to assail and damage our country and ruin its future. Upon every charge which this House regarded as a grave charge in the beginning the result of the Commission has been an acquittal. Looking back to the debate on which the Act was founded, and the arguments by which it was forced on by hon. Gentlemen opposite, and by those more active supporters of the Government on this side of the House, I find that of every charge they made we have been acquitted. With regard to the charge of conspiracy and the charge conveyed in vague and general terms of not being sufficiently active in denouncing and suppressing crime, nobody meant to constitute a tribunal of three Judges to try such a charge or to have the public time wasted in such an inquiry. The letters were the grave portion of the accusation against us, and also the charge of complicity with murder. Day after day and week after week were allowed to elapse, witness after witness was placed in the witness-stand, but the Attorney General, who conducted the case, kept carefully away from any of these graver charges. Time after time he was pressed to come to an issue. The Judges frequently expressed impatience at the way in which the inquiry was being conducted. The Attorney General smiles; but I attended the inquiry as regularly as the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, and I maintain that I am not speaking without authority. The President said, after the Commission had sat two or three months—

“If this inquiry proceeds in this manner, I cannot see that it will be ended in our lifetime.”

Upon that the hon. and learned Gentleman apologised, and stated that the evidence he was giving had been very carefully considered. The President said he had heard that statement before, and he wanted to know whether the inquiry was to be brought to an end within a lifetime. If the Attorney General was satisfied that he was speaking upon bond fide instructions and upon proofs of the truth of which he had satisfied himself, as he was bound to do, why was he hunting up America for evidence during the Commission to back up the letters, and why was his solicitor offering enormous bribes to Sheridan to come over—Sheridan, for alliance with whom the Irish Members had been denounced, but upon whom the Attorney General seems to have leant to save his reputation and his honour. We went into the Commission Court to meet the graver charges alleged against us, and we offered evidence to meet those graver charges wherever an attempt was made to establish them. But with regard to the charges of boycotting and intimidation we offered no evidence, as we wished to waste no time on the inquiry. I challenge the Attorney General to deny it, or deny that we put forward the respondents as witnesses for cross-examination, but who were never asked a question, upon those very charges of which, forsooth, we are now found guilty. Why did not the Government specifically state to this House, as they were asked to do, the charges upon which they wished to proceed before the Commission? If they did not want to obscure the issue, or to fall back on the expedient of throwing mud all round, why did they not set the charges forth in the Bill? Why did they except from the purview of the Commission the Plan of Campaign, if it was their intention to have an inquiry into a political conspiracy and agrarian crime? The Attorney General himself, with the consent of his Party, refused to go into the Plan of Campaign. I believe the hon. and learned Gentleman would readily have entered into that inquiry before the Commission; but he was precluded by the express pledge of his Party in this House. We have heard a great deal from the hon. Baronet (Sir W. Barttelot) as to the strict impartiality of the Judges. He thinks we ought to be extremely grateful to the three Judges for having vindicated our characters. I tell the hon. Baronet we are grateful only to ourselves. Does he mean to tell us that a great deal of credit attaches to three men in the position of these Judges, because they have not gone in the teeth of the evidence brought before them by holding us guilty of the charges made against us? The hon. Baronet must have formed a much lower opinion of the English Judiciary than we have, if he conceives it possible that three Judges could, without a shadow of evidence to support their findings hold us guilty of complicity with murder, especially after Pigott had made his confession, and sealed that confession with suicide. We do not wish to be understood as being extremely grateful to the Judges, or as carrying away with us from the Commission any very high sense of the great impartiality and fair play with which they conducted the inquiry. For my part, as one who attended the Commission professionally, I wish to state in the most positive and distinct terms that I have brought away no such feeling, and I do not know that any of those I represent have any different opinion in the matter. I would ask the House to take a sensible view of this matter. Take the general charge of criminal conspiracy. There is one single instance in the whole record of the evidence where a payment seems to have been made by the Land League for medical assistance for a person who had been injured in the commission of crime. We do not know what the crime was; but it was quite evident that there had been some disobedience of the law. Not one of the 65 respondents in the case was brought into privy with that incident. I was in gaol at the time it occurred; and my hon. Friend the Member for Cork (Mr. Parnell) was in gaol, my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) was ill at home; my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) was in gaol; and my hon. Friend the Member for Donegal (Mr. A. O'Connor) was in this country. And yet these three English Judges, of whose impartiality you want us to carry away so lively a recollection, gravely found our whole party guilty of the offence, and upon that incident constructed a general indictment. I refuse to believe that we were treated in that matter as Englishmen or Scotchmen would have been treated. It is only in dealing with Irishmen that the Commissioners would have dared to commit the enormity of which they were guilty. Another matter on which the Judges have found hostilely to us, is for the want of that vigorous denunciation of crime which we should have exercised during the agitation. It is a singular fact that while they have carefully selected the passages which support the contention that some of the language used led to intimidation which might eventually result in crime, they have only made a casual and general reference to those speeches in denunciation of crime which were proved daily even by the witnesses who were called by the Times. That is not our idea of fair-play. We may, some of us

perhaps, have been remiss in denouncing crime when it would have been wise to denounce it. For my part, I can accuse myself of nothing of the kind. I stated on oath before the Commission that I never spoke in a district where crime was in existence without denouncing it. I challenge the Attorney General to say whether one letter or speech of mine was produced which was not a denunciation, not only of crime, but of boycotting. I do not want to separate myself from my colleagues. If I had been in the habit, like them, of speaking in the country, and the same instances of oppression had come under my eyes as came under theirs, I might have spoken as they did; but being in charge of the National League Organisation, it was my duty to be as conservative as possible in the administration of that Organisation. As one instance of the fair-play with which we have been treated, I may say that while the Land League existed for two years, and the National League for eight years, the Commissioners have dwelt entirely on the two years of the Land League, and have slurred over the much longer period of the existence of the National League. But do we stand alone in apathy in denouncing crime? How many of the hon. Members opposite have denounced the crime of forgery committed by the Times? You cannot set up one code of morals for yourselves and another for us. And when we are lectured by the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) about blood-curdling paragraphs in Irish newspapers, we cannot but recollect the time when the right hon. Gentleman as a politician was run by Richard Pigott, when the Fenians of the South of Ireland were his constant companions, and when Patrick Ford was his energetic supporter. As to the dissemination of the Irishman and the Irish World, some of us can say we had nothing to do with it; and during the eight years I had charge of the office of the National League not a single number of the Irish World entered or left that office. But was the Irishman a more amiable organ in the hands of Richard Pigott than it has since become? When the Attorney General was exercising his ingenuity to find out what sort of a character Richard Pigott was, where was the Home Secretary? Our people are the judges of our characters, and they have confidence in us.

Those who have confidence in you are those who do not know all your acts. The Attorney General month after month fought shy of the question of the forged letters before the Commission, and then tried to put in the expert evidence first, in order to blacken the character of the hon. Member for Cork. If the Attorney General's recent congratulation offered to my hon. Friend the Member for Cork was honest and sincere, we ought to suppose he was sincere when acting as counsel in the case, and that he would not wish to do a wicked or a dishonest thing. But if he wished to act honestly between man and man, why did he endeavour to evade the issue of the letters? When he knew what Pigott's character was, why did he try to put the letters in by a side issue, so as to blacken the character of my hon. Friend the Member for Cork? There is something more. During the whole course of this inquiry agents of the Times had been in America, and had been in communication with the solicitor of the Times, who had been advised by an eminent counsel, who was also the adviser of Her Majesty's Government. I propose to read to the House some statements which, I think, will startle hon. Members, and which, I think, will tell against the Government in the constituencies, and which will convince the people of England that if there was a foul conspiracy on foot it was against, and not among, the Irish Members. They will show that while we were accused of associating with dynamitards and murderers, our accusers were in constant association with dynamitards, and were trying to obtain the testimony, true or false, of alleged murderers and assassins. Some time ago there appeared in an American paper an affidavit sworn before an American solicitor by P. J. Sheridan. I am not going to rely, however, upon any statement made by Sheridan. I intend to call as a witness the confidential solicitor of the Times. On February 14, 1889, Mr. Soames, in his examination before the Commission, was asked a question as to the time when he learnt that Pigott was the person from whom the letters came. The reply was that he knew subsequently to the trial of "O'Donnell v. Walter" that the letters came from Pigott. The witness added that little things came to his ears from time to time, and although nobody told him, he practically knew in the Summer of 1888, that the letters came from Pigott. Surely there was sufficient warning to a Government which had the advantage of having within its ranks an old associate of Pigott's. Whether there were monetary relations between the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary (Mr. Matthews) and Pigott it will be for the right hon. Gentleman to state, but Pigott was not the man to do anything for nothing. During his examination Mr. Soames was asked as to certain agents whom he had employed. Mr. Kirby was an agent employed by him in America, and Mr. Soames described him as being a man of independence. The witness stated that Kirby was paid by him to take journeys and to have interviews for the purpose of taking evidence. He added that he did not mean evidence relating to the letters, but general evidence relating to the inquiry. Now, I will demonstrate by Mr. Soames's own hand and the telegrams in cypher between him and Kirby that that statement was absolutely false. Later on in the examination a very extraordinary fact was elicited as to Pigott. Not only did Mr. Soames know—and, of course, the Attorney General knew—that Pigott was the person out of whose possession the letters had come, but he stated that as early as October, before the inquiry commenced, he had seen a letter written by Mr. George Lewis to Pigott, accusing him of having confessed that he forged the letters. That was the time for inquiry. That was the time to hunt up the Home Secretary and ask him about his knowledge of Pigott. What was done? Can the Attorney General plead that he had not an opportunity of meeting the Home Secretary; or does he allege that he did not know that the right hon. Gentleman was pretty well acquainted with Mr. Richard Pigott? Now, I will read another remarkable portion of this evidence.

"Q. I am asking you did it occur to you to press Mr. Pigott as to where he got these letters?—A. No, it did not.

Q. And you never have?—A. I never have.

Q. Has any one, to your knowledge, interested in the Times?—A. No one.

Q. And so far as you know no one has pressed him on that point?—A. He showed me a letter from Mr. Lewis accusing him of having admitted he forged them, and he also showed me his rep'y.

It was not only a letter from Mr. Lewis that was shown to him, but it was a letter charging Pigott with having confessed to Mr. Lewis that he had forged the letters, and yet there was no inquiry, but telegrams were going out to America to see if even a worse character than Pigott could be got who would perjure himself. Now, I will read a few telegrams. They are telegrams which were couched in the most intricate cipher. Sometimes there were obscurities, which I have no doubt the Attorney General will assist us in deciphering. I tell the hon. and learned Gentleman that I regard this as a grave matter, and I will speak plainly. I do not mind what is the etiquette of those who are associated with him in his profession in this country, but I know that the hon. and learned Gentleman made the best use of his position to blacken and assail the characters of the Irish Members, and we owe him nothing. On one occasion the hon. and learned Gentleman accused me by insinuation with having, during an adjournment of the Court, approached a witness with a view to get him to alter his evidence. That was as false and as calumnious an accusation as ever was made. The hon. and learned Gentleman had never had the courage to offer an apology, or the manliness to endeavour to sustain the charge. Up to this day not one word of regret has come from him for having brought such a charge against a professional colleague engaged with him in the conduct of the case. I suppose that in his own estimation he is a gentleman above reproach, but I am only an Irishman, and any material which came to the hon. and learned Gentleman's hand was always a good enough instrument to hit his opponents with if they were Irishmen. I think we shall be able to turn the tables on the hon. and learned Gentleman to some extent, and I invite him, for the honour of his profession, to separate himself, if he can, from the transactions which I am about to bring under the notice of the House. On December 13, 1888, while the Commission was sitting, an agent of the Times, named Thompson, thus telegraphed to Mr. Soames, addressed "Assert, London," which Mr. Soames swore was his telegraphic address—

Mr. T. Harrington

"The final decision of F.M. is that he is now ready to come over and give evidence on three days' notice, upon payment of £5,000 down and the remaining £5,000 to be paid to him after his evidence and cross-examination, and he is no longer required. I think him of the utmost importance. Cable reply in full."

But when the House is informed who "F. M." was, I think they will be still more surprised. We have been accustomed in this House to violent denunciations of the Irish Americans, and during the course of these discussions one name has been prominently associated with the dynamite plots carried out in this country, and especially with the dynamite plot to blow up this House. That name was the name of General Millen, and that was the gentleman whose assistance the Attorney General was trying to obtain, in order to prove the charge against us. Who are the associates of the dynamitards? Who are the men to lean upon them for assistance in political emergencies, for this was a political trial? This was a political emergency, and the Government were on their trial as well as the Times and the Irish Members. No reply seems to have gone immediately to that telegram, and the gentleman in America was a little urgent. On the 17th of December the same correspondent wired, again in cipher:

"Reply cable twelfth urgently needed."

Hon. Members will observe that the twelfth is given for the thirteenth. Whether the discrepancy is made up by the difference in time between the two countries or not, it is clear that the telegrams relate to one another—

"Reply cable twelfth urgently needed. Brown Bros have no advice yet of remittance—five hundred."

That was for Mr. Thompson, who was described later on by Mr. Soames as an independent gentleman too. They were all independent gentlemen. This is a rather curious occupation for independent gentlemen. Well, Sir, did that telegram or that cipher come under the notice of the Attorney General?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): Not one of them.

*MR. T. HARRINGTON: We will see. If that is so, the hon. and learned Gentleman has indeed been sadly betrayed by his Colleagues. They have broken faith with him, and if I were in his position I would, before this debate is closed, take care to set myself right with the country and denounce those who played me so false. On the 20th of December, 1888, Mr. Soames telegraphed in cipher to "Thompson, New York"—

"Am waiting final instructions of counsel. Will wire the moment I get them.—Assert."

Who was the counsel? The public records of the day show that the Attorney General was then the counsel for the Times. He was the leading counsel in the case. He was appearing every day in Court, and is he going to say that Mr. Soames falsely brought his name and his high position into this telegram, or that other counsel engaged in the case dared to advise in this matter without consulting him?

"Am waiting final instructions from counsel. Will wire the moment I get them.—Assert."

That is Mr. Soames. Then, on the 24th of December, 1888, came another telegram from New York in an altered cipher, which, however, we are able to translate—

"To Assert, London," saying, "With General daily, and thus learn that."

Millen, the chief of the dynamitards, the man who is said to have been in charge of the party with design to blow up this House, was that General referred to, and he was advising the case of the Times in New York while the Attorney General was advising it in London. If, therefore, we had assistance in America advising us in the Irish movement, so had the Times assistance there. It is known, say the Judges, that dynamitards contributed to our movement, and so also the prime dynamiter was giving the Attorney General a helping hand. The telegram continued—

"Henry can prove 6th May case."

This was the shadow you were pursuing, this was the shadow that landed you in this disgraceful position for a Government to occupy! Then come the concluding words of the telegram—

"Says he can prove more both before and after if you close with him at once. Will come over with me in Servia on Saturday. Reply immediately."

Then comes in the word "refuse" and three or four words in cipher I have not been able to make out, but which, with the assistance of Mr. Soames and the Attorney General, perhaps the House may eventually have translated. Then comes the concluding part of the message—

"Or you risk losing your best witness."

Evidently the sense of the message is—"If you refuse his terms you risk losing your best witness." Now, as to the gentleman here referred to, let me turn to the evidence of Mr. Soames before the Commission. Before the Commission Mr. Soames was asked whether the name of Henry had been mentioned to him as an intending witness from America, and he replied in the affirmative, saying that Henry was P. J. Sheridan. I will for a moment break the continuity of the telegrams from New York and go back to the agent who was in direct communication at this time with P. J. Sheridan, and I will read to the House the terms that the New York agent advised Mr. Soames to close with Sheridan for. The telegram I have just read is dated 24th December. On November 19th a telegram was sent from the "independent gentleman," Kirby, as follows—

"19th November, '88.—Pueblo, Colo., to Assert, London. —Message yesterday intended to mislead operator and others."

Fortunately we were not among the others—

"Have been with Sheridan three days. He will give whole history of Land League that will convict if I buy his two ranches and 3,000 sheep, price £25,000. Will then give evidence here if you force P. to call him for a like amount. Reply Chicago, Monday.—MOHAWK."

This is the telegram which the agent in New York was referring to when he spoke of General Millen, reviser of the proofs of the Times in New York and the collaborator of the Attorney General. This is the sum he advised should be given for Sheridan's evidence. There is no statement as to what that evidence is, and there is no means of ascertaining the worth of it, but of course the presumption must be strong that a man with a character such as Sheridan's has been described to be by the Attorney General would for £50,000 give the evidence that was required of him, whether it was true or false, right or wrong. When hon. Gentlemen on the other side get up and charge us with conspiracy, I say there is evidence here of a conspiracy more deep, more foul, more degrading than any we are accused of being engaged in. Now I go back again to the New York cipher telegrams, and the advice of counsel Mr. Soames was waiting for. I hope a grave injustice has not been done the right hon. Gentleman, and that he is not the counsel in question referred to in these transactions, while he stood before the world as the chief advising counsel for the Times before the Commission. On the 28th of December, 1888, Mr. Soames, who was taking a holiday at Eastbourne, telegraphed to Thompson at New York giving advice of counsel. Who was that counsel? The telegram said—

“Counsel thinks Henry the most important witness. He says we must know what he can prove.”

That was an astute counsel who first of all thought Henry a most important witness and then wished to know what he could prove. The telegram continued—

“And if he has papers, will he give you a written statement, not to be used unless we agree.—ASSERT.”

The value of those papers was therefore to be tested, not by their genuineness, but solely by the fact as to whether they could or not establish even a fairly plausible case against us before the Commissioners. Here there is a lapse of some time, during which no messages were sent; or, at all events, we have not been fortunate enough to get hold of them. We have been sufficiently regardful of truth, however, not to forget telegrams when they were not forthcoming. If anybody challenges our authority for these things, then I advise him to ask for a Committee of the House of Commons, when we can prove them, as military Gentlemen opposite say, “up to the hilt.” On the 7th January, 1889, the following telegram was despatched from London:—

“To Thompson, New York.

“Been absent from England. Cable only just received. Clients away for Christmas. Get him to extend time—fourteen days.”

There appears to have been considerable reluctance about giving the money. On the same date, January 7, another telegram was sent—

“To Thompson, New York.

“Kerby left Saturday. M. Thompson, of 24, University Place, New York, who wrote on
Mr. T. Harrington

23rd December, has something to sell. See him. Find out all particulars, and price.—ASSERT.”

Again going into the market months after Pigott had shown the prosecution the letter in which he confessed the forgeries, and months after knowledge of this had been brought home to the Attorney General. Is it not a strange thing that the Times was unable to get one unpurchased supporter of their policy in New York? Is it not a strange thing that the most tempting bribes could procure them no better testimony? On the 12th of March the following telegram was sent from New York:—

“To Ascert, London.

“Delaney not known at address sent, nor in directory. Expected cable to-day; reply to mine. Cannot see General again until hear from you.”

This seems to indicate that the gentlemen concerned was reluctant to give further information if more money was not sent, and we shall see that it was sent. On the 1st of April—a very appropriate day—the following message was sent to New York, this time to Johnstone. Whether Johnstone is the same as Thompson I do not know; but it would appear from those telegrams that they are one and the same person, or, at any rate, that the one acted for the other. This is a message to which I invite the serious attention of the House, because here is clear and conclusive evidence that the Government have been engaged in these transactions. The telegram is as follows:—

“1st April, '89, London—To Johnstone, Gilsey House, New York.—Hoare, British Consul, has authority to give you names of some informants like Major Le Caron. See him; get all particulars, and induce one or two men to come over. Assistance will be sent you for Millen.”

This is the first instance in which the name of Millen is shown to be the “F. M.”—Frank Millen—mentioned in the earlier telegram. Here we have a promise to send assistance to the dynamitard who had been advising proofs for the Times in America. I hope that before we pass away from this debate some right hon. Gentleman will stand up and explain what Member of the Government is responsible for giving authority to the British Consul to send over informers for the Times. Mr. Hoare was a little doubtful as to the genuineness of the authority he had received, and accordingly the answer came back—

"Hoare very civil. Cannot assist us in any way."

The right hon. Gentleman opposite is amused; but remember the adage, "He laughs best who laughs last." Here is the message which went out in reply on April 2—

"All informers' reports, including those from Philadelphia, passed through his hands up to 1884, and were sent by me here. If he does not know names himself he can refer you to those who do."

I want to know what colleague of the Attorney General was able to give Mr. Soames this information? I now pass to another chapter of this story, to the messages going on at the same time between Mr. Soames and the gentlemen at Sheridan's headquarters in Colorado. On November 16, 1888, came a message, not in cipher—

"Can purchase ranches and sheep. Particulars from Pueblo to-morrow."

And then on the morrow came the telegram I have already read—

"Message yesterday intended to mislead operators and others. Have been with Sheridan three days. He will give whole history of Land League that will convict if I buy his two ranches and 3,000 sheep. Price £25,000. Will then give evidence here if you force P. to call him for a like amount."

Then comes a short message from Chicago, November 21—

"Reply Saturday. Cable from Pueblo, Col."

Then a break comes in during which, I presume, some messages did pass, but we have not been so fortunate as to get them; and on December 11, 1888, there was the following message sent from Chicago to "Assert," London:—

"Cable £200. Must return."

That is a pretty fair amount for a voyage from Chicago to London. Now I turn to Mr. Soames's evidence before the Commission on March 13, when he was examined a second time. Mr. Soames was asked by my late lamented friend, Mr. Biggar, with reference to his sending Kirby to interview Sheridan. The witness was asked—"What did Kirby telegraph?"

And he said—

"That Sheridan asked £20,000 to come over, and I immediately telegraphed to Kirby to come back."

I will test the truth of that statement. Mr. Soames would have it appear that he was virtuously indignant at this demand of Sheridan's; but what are the facts? The telegram recalling him was never sent till December 12, 1888, and it was not a telegram of disapproval—

"To Kirby, Mohawk, Chicago—Court adjourns for five weeks. Come home at once. I must discuss matters personally with you. Money sent to Brown Brothers, New York. Reply when sail. Assert."

A few days later Kirby appears to have been on one of his numerous sprees—for this "independent character" has been described as one of the lowest vagabonds that the American Republic ever turned out—a fit gentleman to sustain the calumnious accusations of the Times, and accordingly on December 24 the following telegram was sent to him:—

"To Kirby, Chicago. Never allow drafts to be drawn on me. Cannot accept yours. Have cabled 250 Bank of Montreal. When will you sail?—Assert."

In the course of about 10 days two sums of £250 were sent to Kirby; but what became of Kirby's recall? Was Kirby detained at home by Mr. Soames? No; he was sent out again on his nefarious expedition, and on April 3, long after the Times' case about the forged letters had been blown to atoms, long after Pigott had blown himself out of this world, long after the Attorney General's so-called expression of regret, there came the following telegram from him to "Assert," London:—

"Sheridan has wired to meet him, Montevista, Tuesday morning. Leave to-night. Cable to-morrow night.—Tax."

On April 4, came another message, not in cipher, to "Assert"—

"Veni, vidi, vici. Will cable early to-morrow. Pueblo. Returning there."

Then came a remarkable telegram in cipher so difficult that it was with considerable labour I made it out, and even Mr. Soames who had the key had to wire to have it repeated—

"To Assert, London.—Sheridan met me yesterday; train Montevista; drove to rancho; explained altered conditions mentioned in letter left your possession, that your evidence saying he offered to go to London and give evidence for £20,000 caused Clan-na-Gael to sentence him to death. Two parties of the Clan were ordered to carry out sentence of the executive. A member warned him, also two others. His life is sought; hence he threatens that he will now go to London and prove the Times justification. His life is in hourly jeopardy here; two men have been on his track, and he has become desperate and determined to be revenged. He sticks to his terms and price, but demands immediate action, as his death has been ordered. He will go with me after 12th if he is not killed, and justify the Times, but demands proof of amount being at my command."

I am not surprised that the House is amused at this sort of silly play going on. But the character of Members of the House is at stake. This is the fit instrument with which it was determined to assail the Irish Members; and it was because the man was determined to be revenged that the Times were ready to avail themselves of his services, and to ruin Ireland and her cause. A transaction more foul has surely never been brought to public knowledge.

"Agrees upon £10,000, which is to go to his family if he is killed before his evidence is given. Papers for ranches and stock to be completed, the balance to be paid to order after Commission justifies the Times."

You see he is willing to trust the Attorney General and Mr. Soames for the little balance of £40,000 until his evidence is completed. Then the telegram goes on—

"Beyond all which his evidence accomplishes he has all documents to implicate Parnell, Dillon, and others. He is desperate and determined, and I believe he will do as he says. He showed me documents connecting Parnell, Dillon, with himself as of the executive existing at the time of Parnell's arrest, 1881."

What a monstrous find! What a terrible thing that Sheridan should be able to produce documents addressed to himself as a member of the Land League! Then the message continues—

"If you want me to take him over you must amend your evidence in Court after reading my report as to his refusing to accept any sum to go over to make his life more safe here. If I am to carry it through, place the net amount named to my credit, Montreal Bank, Chicago, and £500 more for contingencies, and I will have it transferred on notice. He is to meet me Colorado Springs. Saturday. If you do not accept he will leave at once, foreign clime, to save his life if he can. He will on the stand and otherwise prove the Parnell letter and his and other complicity."

I invite the attention of the House to the date of this telegram. This was on April 5, and Pigott's flight and death had taken place in February. The whole month of March had elapsed

after the withdrawal of the letters by the Attorney General, and after he had stated in spare and ungenerous terms that he was unable to sustain the letters. Here was an attempt to bribe this unfortunate man Sheridan to back up the case of the forged letters. Was the Attorney General's withdrawal of the Parnell letters sincere, or did he withdraw them at the instance of his client, and, if so, was he a party to this wicked endeavour still to back up the false accusation? I think that the result of the election which took place to-day shows what opinion the English people have formed on this subject. I have read a long cable message. The next one received the same day was a reply in cipher—

"5th April, 1889. London to Tax, Pueblo. Can't make out part of cable as to terms he wants. Repeat."

Another letter was sent on April 23, not in cipher—

"Immediate reply most important."

On the 27th this message was sent, not in cipher—

"Am sending to you."

On May 2 another cablegram was sent to this effect—

"Am sending to you by Saturday's mail. Cable name you use and address."

That has reference to the sending out of a third agent, Mr. Birch. I do not know who Mr. Birch is, as I have not had the advantage of having his biography from Mr. Soames in the same way as we got the biography of Kirby and Thompson. But a Mr. Birch is mentioned as an expert belonging to the British Museum who has been employed by Mr. Soames in testing the Pigott letters, and probably he was sent out by Mr. Soames to test the genuineness of the Sheridan letters. The next telegram was addressed to him in that country. It is dated June 19, and is in these terms—

"Has he satisfied you as to the value of his evidence and existence of confirmatory documents? Reply, and I will then cable definitely. Are you satisfied he is acting straight and will go on board with you? Cable fully."

The reply was as follows:—

"June 20, 1889. Colo. Springs. To Assert, London.--Satisfied he will go, as determined to revenge those who ordered his death. Believe he possesses full testimony and has documents here, but won't divulge same till on ship. Insists on payment for ranch, which is for the money to secure wife in case of his death; balance as cabled, after evidence, justifies Times. Must secure him now or leave country. Should advise take ranch; no other chance."

Rumour has it that Mr. Kirby, who had spent the greater part of his life in America, and was certainly not known as a man of independent means, was acting in collusion with Sheridan, and that they were agreed that if they could induce the Times to buy Sheridan's ranch they could not do better than put Kirby in as caretaker for the Times. Probably Kirby would then have started a No Rent Manifesto on his own account. On June 22 the following telegram was sent by Mr. Soames to Birch:—

"June 21, 1889, London. To Birch, Colo. Springs.—Do not believe in his threat to bolt; nor can we place ourselves entirely in his hands. If risk so great between leaving and ship it is all the more necessary he should not have documents on him. If he will show you documents, you are satisfied of their value, as evidence, and he will hand them over; when transfer made and money paid you may dispense with written statement till he is on ship. If he will not agree to this, it means he intends to sell us. Too late to cable money to-day. He gives no reason why he cannot do as asked."

This was the reply—

"June 25, 1889. Colo. Springs, to Assent, London.—Foresaw as to documents. Daughter here; travels with them; nothing on him to identify; will give all on ship. Says if anything came out meantime he had disclosed, family would be sacrificed, as wife aware P. and others met at his house. Says ranch covers money and forfeits balance unless evidence satisfies. This final—he will go."

But he did not go, and the Times has been without his valuable assistance. On July 5 the following message was sent by Mr. Soames to Birch:—

"July 5, 1889, London. To Birch, Cdo. Springs. He must satisfy you that he has a number of documents genuine and of value. For all we know those shown in bulk may be of no importance whatever. His danger is all the more reason why he should satisfy us if he means to go straight. Money deposited and ready to be cabled at moment's notice"

If Sheridan did not go, and if he were the character such as he has been frequently described by right hon. Gentlemen opposite, it was not because the Times did not make every endeavour to buy his evidence. It was not because adequate offers were not made; and if the example of Pigott had not been before him, if exposure had not been before him, we do not know what he would have done. I do not say he would have been wicked enough to perjure himself. I know nothing of the man, whose character you have yourselves repeatedly blown upon; I never have had any communication with him; but after the description which has been given of him by the Government—for you have accused him of planning murder and plotting outrages in Ireland, and of being the director of the Phoenix Park murders—I say there could be no criminality higher than that involved in these efforts to obtain his evidence. On July 10 the following was cabled:—

"July 10, 1889. Colo. Springs. To Assent, London. Did not see letter. Was shown K. He saw it again last night. Finds he made mistake in Castlereagh. It dates Feb. 89. One with check to pay in Ulster for outrage eviction, and urge Leitrim tenants agitate; another more money to hurry crisis. Both on League paper, signed Dillon. Says genuine, and affirms me to-day has 'D' letter as to Castlereagh and others showing large payments. Have only his word that documents in bundle are from members and leaders implicating all with League and outrage. Won't show me documents till on ship as his name got in Press before. Think go straight to secure family, as home broken up; life in danger; and wants revenge leaders who he made and condemn him. But for that would not split."

Evidently the £50,000 offered was not sufficient; it was also necessary as an additional inducement that the man should realise he was in danger. The next telegram was—

"July 12, 1889, London. To Birch, Cdo. Springs. Yes; leave K. and return."

Towards the close of the proceedings before the Commission the country and the Press remarked how very flat the right hon. and learned Member for Bury was in the conclusion of his speech. It was not like the right hon. Gentleman at all. I do not wish to cast any aspersions on him. I recognised, and those whom I represented recognised, that in him we had to deal with a gentleman. However he might differ from us politically, he did not exhibit towards us malignity and bitterness; his language was courteous, and his tone conciliatory. He did his duty as counsel for the Times, and his clients had no reason to complain on that score. On October 29, while the right hon. and learned Gentleman was still addressing the Commission, a message was sent by Kirby to Mr. Soames. The telegram was as follows:—

" Montevista, Col.

" To Assent, London.

" Long interview to-day with wife, to-day privately. She gives positive assurance he will go, if one thousand is paid to her at once; thousand to him in gold in steamer leaving port; all the rest as cabled. Am satisfied on these terms he will go and give history to shorthand type-writer on board for brief; and no other terms possible is my positive opinion."

There was no abatement of the original demand, but a desperate endeavour at the last moment to get something out of the clients of the hon. and learned Gentleman. No doubt the hon. and learned Gentleman will rely on that telegram to show that he and his clients knew that Sheridan was deceiving them. If so, why did they continue in treaty with him? Have they entered into negotiations with that man for the purpose of producing evidence, true or false, which might again stir up the flames of prejudice against us? If these telegrams are genuine they have—and I challenge the hon. Member to cast any doubt on them, for I can produce the cipher in which they were written—I will tell the hon. and learned Gentleman furthermore that while his clients were offering these enormous bribes of £50,000 and £10,000 for men to perjure themselves against the Irish Party, neither that Party, nor any one connected with it, ever paid a penny to procure this evidence. I will not say how the information came into my hands. But let the Government give us a Commission to inquire into these matters. If they do I will prove these things, and even more. The hon. and learned Member pledged his honour and reputation to prove the genuineness of the letters. [The ATTORNEY GENERAL dissented]. Has the hon. and learned Member any defence or apology to make for the language he used during the prosecution of the case, and the still more doubtful, I will not say criminal, but regrettable and condemnable language, for one in his position, at the termination of the case for the letters, when he withdrew them? I again challenge the Government to give me a Committee of inquiry into the genuineness of these letters. I shall be able to prove from Mr. Soames himself that every one of these telegrams is genuine, and I shall have additional evidence on other matters to bring forward. The information I have laid before the House places the hon. and learned Gentleman in a serious position. The worst case we ever alleged against the hon. and learned Gentleman was that he has been associated with the former "pals" of the Home Secretary, when these persons helped to defeat the Government at Dungarvan. The honour of the profession, and the position he holds, now casts upon him the duty of separating himself in clear language from all responsibility for the conspiracy which I have unfolded, and furthermore of casting that conspiracy upon the persons who were guilty of entering into that conspiracy.

(11.28.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to move the adjournment of the debate.

(11.29.) MR. W. H. SMITH: I am sure the hon. Member will see that I cannot consent to that.

MR. MAC NEILL: Then put up some speaker on your side.

*(11.30.) MR. R. A. YERBURGH (Chester): I rise to support the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury, and in doing so I cannot but express my regret that in view of the mere rejection of the Amendment proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian the Government have not thought it advisable to alter the terms of their Motion so as to have expressed their satisfaction at the acquittal of Mr. Parnell, adding their solemn reprobation of the conduct of right hon. Gentlemen opposite who have been guilty of a treasonable and criminal conspiracy. Before the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman was placed on the Paper, the Motion of the Government appeared to me to be the necessary sequel to the result of the Judges' investigations. The fact that this special charge made against Mr. Parnell in connection with the forged letters has been proved to be false was known to all the world. For months it has been household talk, and the leader of this House has expressed in terms in which we all on this side concur his detestation of that charge. With regard, however, to the other charges, graver by far, which have been proved against hon. Members opposite, the Report has only now placed them before the country. And how has the the Government proposed to treat them? Without one word of comment, treating them with absolute silence, the Government merely propose to adopt the Commission Report, leaving the public to gather from its pages the verdict which has been passed after the most mature judicial consideration. The course taken by the Government was, undoubtedly, the right course to pursue. It was a high-minded and generous course. The Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman has, however, entirely altered the situation. That Amendment is of so extraordinary a character, inasmuch as it fails to traverse or in any way affect the subject matter of the Motion before the House, that one is tempted to ask, in passing, what can have suggested it? One reason for it may be found in the fact that if we reject it the right hon. Gentleman may be able to brand us with having refused to apologise for the injury received by Mr. Parnell. Another in the further fact that the Opposition feel the charges which have been proved to be so grave that they must, at all hazards, divert public attention from them, and endeavour to produce the belief that the gravamen of those charges consists mainly in the forged letters. These, Sir, I believe to be the reasons which have dictated this Amendment. With regard to the Amendment itself, I take the strongest objection to it. I have no hesitation in saying that it amounts to a suppressio veri. It suggests that all the charges made in the Report have been disproved. In face of this I could have wished that the Government had proposed to have placed on record in their Motion the whole of the findings of the Court in language "understood of the people," so that the country might have placed before them the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. Turning to the arguments by which the Amendment has been supported, I think I shall carry the general body of the House with me when I say that able and eloquent as have been the speeches delivered by learned Gentlemen engaged in this case, they are after all but the speeches of counsel for the prosecution and defence respectively, and as it is upon those speeches that the Judges have issued their Report, they can carry no weight in this House. The arguments and speeches which we have, I think, to consider are those which have been addressed to this House by others than those to whom I have alluded. Chief among them is the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and here I must confess that I could not resist the inducement to cheer that speech, so rich was it in eloquence, beyond anything I have before heard even from the right hon. Gentleman; but rich as it was in eloquence, that eloquence only served to bring into greater relief the poverty of its argument. Now, what are the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman? In the first place, we had reference to the Judges, on whom the right hon. Gentleman bestowed great praise for their ability, although I fail to discover that he said anything as to their impartiality. And he went on to say that he could not agree with their judgment. I read a speech a short time ago delivered by the right hon. Gentleman in 1881, in which he said that, in his opinion, the outrages in Ireland were not due to evictions or distress, but, on the contrary, were due to the operations of the Land League. It is an extraordinary thing that what the right hon. Gentleman stated in that speech now appears to be the unanimous opinion of the Judges who sat upon the Commission. He went on to say the Judges were debarred from going into certain matters, and that the scope of their inquiry was consequently limited, so that they were not able to look at all the aspects of the case. I would venture to say that such a judgment as is here indicated is one that would have been suited only to the historian, and not to Judges, whose duty it was to determine matters of fact. Then the right hon. Gentleman referred to various charges which had been proved against hon. Members opposite. He dealt with those charges in a very cursory manner—indeed in a manner that was almost calculated to mislead the House, and induce it to believe that the charges were much less serious and far less numerous than they really are. He dealt with the charges as to the dissemination of newspapers with a view to inciting to crime, and he also touched upon the £6 case and the question of the seven Members who were found guilty of treason. The general argument of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to those who were found guilty of conspiracy was that the offences were committed so long ago that it was now unnecessary to consider them. This portion of his argument goes to the question of whether there should be punishment or not, and not to the question whether this House should adopt the suggestion contained in the Commissioners' Report. He went on to the question of intimidation, and here again used the argument that the charges were so old that they were unworthy of consideration. He further dealt with what had taken place in the years 1881 and 1882, and asked whether the facts were unknown? In answer to this we reply that the facts were not unknown, inasmuch as they have been frequently insisted upon by the right hon. Gentleman himself, and laid before this House by him. But, Sir, these facts which the country in 1881 had only upon the ex parte statement of the right hon. Gentleman have now been investigated by a Commission composed of Judges of great experience and knowledge of the law, pronounced upon by them after a lengthy, minute, and exhaustive inquiry. Well, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian went on to say he had found that the hon. Member for the City of Cork was a conservative force in Ireland, and that he had rather assisted in putting down outrages than in their promotion. If that be the right hon. Gentleman's real opinion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Cork I shall anxiously wait to hear the apology the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian will offer the hon. Member for the language he has used at various times with regard to him. The right hon. Gentleman dealt with what he called the condonation of the offences that had been committed, alleging that the circumstances of the interview between Lord Carnarvon and the hon. Member for the City of Cork amounted to condonation. But that argument has been sufficiently dealt with by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bristol (Sir M. Hicks Beach). In point of fact, the right hon. Gentleman has completely disproved it; but that there has been condonation by lapse of time I do not deny; and, therefore, I am disposed to go with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian as far as this, that where there has been so great an interval no prosecution or punishment ought to follow. In defence of the Irish agitation, the right hon. Gentleman asked the House whether Ireland would ever have got the Land Act without that agitation? Surely never has a more dangerous, a more injurious, a more demoralising doctrine been heard within the walls of this House. We are told by the right hon. Gentleman that we are bound to look at all the facts connected with a great movement—that we must look around and take a complete view of the whole of the social and political condition of Ireland when these crimes and outrages were committed in Ireland before we can regard what may have been done as a fit subject for Parliamentary censure. But why, I ask, did not the right hon. Gentleman do this in 1881? Why did he not then see that it was his duty, not only to look at the crime committed, but at all the attendant circumstances by which that crime was surrounded? I now turn to the Bath speech of the right hon. Gentleman the member for Derby (Sir W. Harcourt) who is one of our most bitter opponents on this question, and in reference to what has fallen from him to account for the contempt with which we regard his attacks I shall content myself with quoting a passage from an early and unexpurgated edition of a work called Gladstone's House of Commons, written by a very able and eloquent Member of this House, one of the right hon. Gentleman's present leaders. The description given of the right hon. Gentleman in the work I have alluded to is as follows:—

“Sir Wm. Harcourt is a thorough Tory at heart. He is so notoriously, so ostentatiously, I had almost said, so avowedly destitute of all political principle that he may be trusted to take up any cry that pays.”

In conclusion, Sir, I would draw the attention of the House to the extraordinary doctrine that has prompted the Amendment of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lothian, and that is the foundation of his speech—namely, that an injury to an individual is superior to a crime against the whole body of individuals who constitute the State—that libel is worse than treason—that an attack upon a reputation is worse than outrages upon the lives and liberties of the free people of the United Kingdom. Sir, let me add a protest against confining this discussion to narrow and petty grounds. It is not a question of individuals that we have before us; it is a question which concerns the safety of the State. For the Irish Members that are concerned in it we have no feeling of vindictiveness or personal dislike; let them only avoid the paths of treason and of criminal conspiracy; let them abjure Patrick Ford, the Clan-na-Gael, and all their works; let them place their faith in Constitutional agitation, and we will be glad — nay, proud — to hold out the hand of fellowship to them. But however this may be, we are happy in knowing that by our votes and efforts in 1886 we saved our country from as grave a danger as has ever threatened her, and we feel confident that when this Report has been read, marked, and learnt, the great mass of our countrymen will look upon the Unionist Party as the saviours of their country.

MR. MAC NEILL: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is very sanguine indeed if he believes that the Report will be of any benefit to his own Party. Still, I reciprocate the good wishes which the hon. Gentleman extended towards us — and, I believe, heartily extended. I think a perusal of the Report ought to convince the hon. Gentleman that the inquiry from first to last was an attempt to strike at the reputation of our country by striking at the Irish Members. The hon. Baronet (Sir W. Barttelot) seemed to be politically out of joint. We acknowledge the kindness which lurks behind all the asperity of his sentiments. We know that he has a great deal of kindness and goodness of heart, and I may say that his real disposition has been illustrated by the contrast which he afforded in his manner of speaking of the forged letters to the skilled apology of the Attorney General in open Court. I have often asked myself what the solution was, since early last March, of an utterance of the Prime Minister. I have never been able to discover it until to-night. It is the disclosure made by my hon. Friend (Mr. T. Harrington) of the close alliance which has existed between this Government and the Dynamite Party in America, and of the fact that even after the suicide of Pigott, through some influence or other, they sought to vamp up again that letter. It explains to me the language of Lord Salisbury, who, three or four days after Pigott's suicide, threw doubt upon the forgery, and said he believed it was a genuine document. Perhaps he will do me the honour of making an explanation in the other House, but it would appear that at the time he made that statement he knew that Mr. Soames was intriguing and negotiating with the Dynamite Party. And this, perhaps, throws some light on the circumstance that the Attorney General was unable to advise in a criminal charge against obscure prisoners without consulting the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor. Lord Salisbury, as superior officer, knew about the negotiations by Soames, and, perhaps, in the same way the Attorney General was so marvellously conscientious as to feel impelled to consult his superior officers, the Prime Minister and the Lord Chancellor, in reference to a wretched twopenny-halfpenny case. By the Motion of the First Lord of the Treasury you are merely reducing Parliament to a machine for the registration of the findings of the Judges. That is not a position which the House of Commons should occupy. It is not the position taken up by the Judges, who divested their investigations of all political considerations. But that is not the spirit of the Government. I think we can point to evidences of political feeling in the way in which this Report is being treated by the other side. All through the entertaining speech of the hon. Baronet the Member for Sussex there were references to past controversies. And in this connection I am reminded of an incident, a somewhat sorrowful one. A member of the Irish Party, some years ago, lost his mind, and, in 1875, when crossing from Holyhead to Ireland, we heard him talk of events of 1866 as if they were just then current. So did the hon. Baronet the Member for Sussex. He spoke of the events of 1884, and seemed to forget that we are in 1890. But he stopped short of the Carnarvon negotiations. The hon. Baronet was justified, so far as he is concerned, for he will have nothing to do with Home Rule. But he appeared to forget that his own Party were Home Rulers in 1885. Lord Carnarvon, when he was Lord Lieutenant, invited the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell) to a Conference, which was to take place in an empty house in Dublin. The whole ins and outs of this interview have not yet been told, but I remember when the statement was first made, Lord Salisbury immediately wrote to the newspapers, saying that it was shameful to bring such accusations against Lord Carnarvon in his absence. Lord Carnarvon was in South Africa, and I happened to be there, too. Lord Carnarvon gave little lectures on Social Science to the colonists, and wherever he went, I followed, and told the whole circumstances of the negotiations with the hon. Member (Mr. Parnell). And during all the time the noble Earl maintained a marvellous silence, peace, and patience. The Attorney General the other night stated that the fetters were at last taken off his tongue. There is an expression in Classical literature of a man having the lock on his tongue, which meant that he had fee and reward. I do not understand how the Attorney General had the fetters taken off his tongue, except that, as counsel, he had ceased to have fee and reward. In this foul conspiracy—for I cannot call it by any other name—it was the Times and the Government from beginning to end. Why was the secret of the Pigott letter so long kept? The Attorney General was determined not to know anything about Pigott, and he did not put Pigott into the box until the 63rd day of the inquiry. In fact, the absence of Pigott from the witness box, and the indignant remonstrances of the Judges with regard to him, all prove one thing, that the Government did not intend to produce him, because they knew that such results would quickly follow as have been in part fulfilled by the St. Pancras election to-night.

It being midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.
